Frosh descend on Queen's

Freshmen applications are down slightly from last year, according to H. W. Sterne, assistant. Registrar. But "although there are fewer applications to handle there are not fewer valid applications," he said.

In Ontario university enrolment is down 9 per cent on the average but there will be no lack of noise and commotion here as about 1600 freshmen descent on Queen's this week.

In a survey taken by the Journal, orientation chairment from six faculties emphasized that the week was designed to acquaint frosh with the campus, help them to meet people and provide them with activities which are a lot of fun.

Rich Chown, chairman of Commerce Orientation said that "in the hope of improving our program, attendance will be taken to help gauge which activities are most successful and which are not.

Queen's gets coed res.

Queen's finally has its first coed residence - Morris Hall.

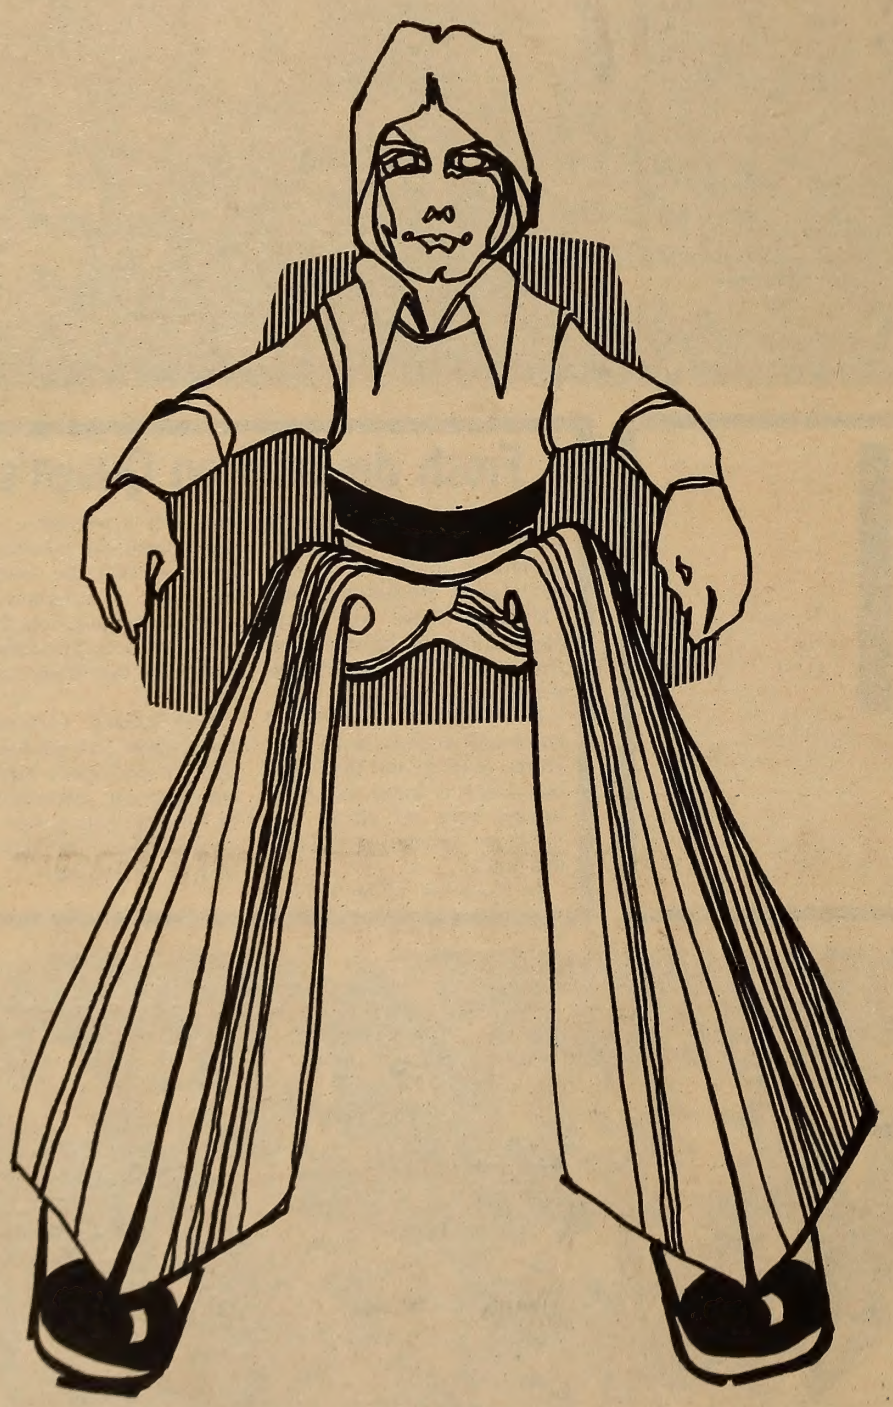
This ends three years of frustrating committee work during which time three separate plans for coed residence have been considered and then scrapped.

The first recommendations were made in 1969-70 when a report from the Inter-Residence Council (Men's Residence) said that "the residences, as part of the university, a supposedly learning environment, nevertheless severely restricted intellectual interchange between the sexes outside the classroom and that there was a disturbing lack of social intercourse between male and female students other than formal dating.

In response to this, a proposal was made to make Chown and Brockington coed. Argument centered on "whether or not women and men living in Brockington House amid four other non-integrated residences would make the atmosphere within that building any more conducive to studying and the exchange of ideas.

The proposal was dropped but reintroduced in March 1971 by AMS president Patrick Riley.

As a result of the Riley proposals a committee was set up representing the AMS, the IRC and the WRC.



A recommendation by this committee to make Victoria Hall coed did not receive endorsement from the representatives of the Women's Residence Council. But the IRC followed it up with a proposal for the integration of Morris Hall.

"Officially the coed program in Morris Hall is only a one year program, Steve Brereton, IRC Chairman told the Journal. But he was optimistic that the program would continue after it was evaluated at the end of the year.

Second Coming for all students

A new addition to the list of orientation programs is a Second Coming. It combines evaluation of university experience with various social activities for upper year students in all faculties.

Sue Dowler, one of the initiators of the project commented that the program is not designed to be a counter orientation but rather a reorientation for upper year students.

"Many people are here during frosh week with nothing to do but paint their apartments," she said. Cooking classes, roller skating and an art show are among the activities designed to keep them busy.

Second Coming will also sponsor a speech by Richard Needham, the controversial Globe and Mail columnist in Dunning Hall at 2.00 p.m. Saturday.

"The program is very flexible and we are still open to suggestions concerning other activities," Miss Dowler said.

Parking zones

There will only be two parking zones on campus this year. A green zone with 460 spaces is east of University Avenue while A red zone comprises all the parking spaces west of University Avenue, including those on the West Campus.

A memorandum from the university on Parking Regulations indicated that there were enough spaces in each of the Green and Red zones to meet the demand in these areas and circulation will not be hampered by as many boundaries as formerly.

The basic charge is about ten dollars a month.

Books on television

Three closed-circuit television cameras have been installed in Technical Supplies, the Queen's University bookstore.

"These are designed to measure traffic flows and therefore, aid in setting up a store in the proposed new University Center," F. M. Gauchie, manager of tech supplies said. "Their value as surveillance equipment is secondary, he added.

Gauchie said, a random sorter is also in operation which will help keep track of books that are ordered."

Last year a Senate committee report recommended that tech supplies become more than a text book store. "We are endeavouring to do this, Gauchie told the Journal.

Books other than required texts are now ordered on a three month basis and can be returned if not sold.

Elrond not ready yet

Elrond College, the Princess Street housing co-operative is not yet ready for full occupancy. Many students are being housed in hotels and one of the nurses residences but every day some are moved in to completed apartments in Elrond.

"No one will have to stay in a hotel more than a week," John Blanchard, director of Elrond said and added "we hope to have everyone in by the 22 of September."

"Elrond has been plagued by strikes and slow work" Blanchard told the Journal, but the project is finally near completion after several years.

Welcome to the deep well of knowledge

Welcome to university, the home of deep wells of knowledge, floor parties, football warm-ups and other assorted phenomena not found anywhere else. Unless you are one of the unlucky ones whose classes are already in progress you are presumably here at Queen's this week for one of two reasons. Either you are a freshman who does not know his way around Queen's or you are a gael or frec or boss supposedly possessing such a deep understanding of Queen's that you have been specifically chosen to introduce freshmen to it. In either case, you have a new room or apartment, new friends, courses, documents, keys, books, computer forms, dishes, luggage and debris. From summering at the cottage or simmering in the city, you are back at university and you are probably wondering why you came.

In the economy of the 1970's, it is clear that a university degree will not guarantee you a meaningful job. And yet you are here at a university prepared to pay almost seven hundred dollars in fees for the right to be here.

A university such as Queen's consists of a vast and loud presence of students, a quieter, smaller and supposedly more learned presence of faculty, a very visible and confusing presence of administrators with papers in their teeth and the invisible hovering background presence of "tradition" and "spirit" represented by the graduates who occasionally come back to look around campus and wonder nostalgically where all the trees have gone.

All of us, from the confused freshmen to the solemn body of professors are in the learning process together. The subject matter of the university is inexhaustible for there will always be now discoveries about the simplest microbe and the most complex novel. All who come to university find the same challenge, to master what is already known, at least in some small corner of the universe of knowledge and then to discover a little more.

But the challenge to learn is not confined to the academic arena, it is also to be found in extra curricular involvement. Students, faculty and administration alike influence the development of Queen's university. They must criticize one another frankly and freely for this is the very life force of the university.

From the minute they arrive, freshmen are Queen's students as good as anybody else. They are set apart merely by their unfamiliarity with their surroundings. Although they are here this week primarily to absorb the knowledge that senior students disseminate, in the "community of scholars" at Queen's they are all equal until their accomplishments prove that there is a distinction.

Frosh Regulations

Four Hundred Frosh Learn Rigid Rules Governing Their Behavior - Fussing Taboo - Tams - Ribbons Compulsory.

With palpitating hearts and trembling knees, about four hundred freshmen gathered in Grant Hall last night to hear the pronouncement by their superiors, the lordly sophs, juniors and seniors, of their fate during the next few months.

Tams and ribbons must be worn henceforth and a non fussing rule is also in force. During the week commencing Monday next the faculty umbrellas, which must be procured at the Union Tuck Shop at a price of 50c each, will be carried open and in full view. Sidewalks will be out of bounds for all frosh next week when they are on the campus as it has been ruled that they must use the cinder walks when moving from building to building. Compassion is shown to some degree however, by the provision that on rainy days they may use the concrete walks but must then walk in single file.

Frosh Sex

Second on the Vig's (A VIG IS NOW A GAEL) list seems to be the lonely Frosh's sex life. Feeling that propinquity cannot overcome their advantage of Sophomore sophistication, Frec's and Vig's do their utmost to throw frosh and freshettes together through dances, scavenger hunts, parties and group calisthenics. Their general opinion of the frosh's abilities in the chase is disparaging, except in a few exceptional cases which they admit with obvious reluctance. According to them, first year as a whole is much inferior to second year, although quite probably it will outstrip the others eventually.

September 21, 1966. Doug White.

Frosh Uniforms

They will be crowned by the inevitable Queen's tams and they'll be wearing their bangs in three little pigtails, tied with red, yellow and blue ribbons. At such an hour, one can hardly expect expert muscle coordination, so it won't be surprising if they are wearing their blouses backwards and their skirts inside out.

The Freshmen

The Frosh are now in the throws of "Hell Week" and are wearing pyjama tops, neckties, one running shoe and one ordinary shoe in class. They must carry, and know how to operate, a slide rule, and last but not least, must supply and endure any soph, on request, with the vital statistics on the coeds.

The Sciencemen must suffer and endure the general rules as well long after "Hell Week". Frosh pins and ¼ inch haircuts are the rule until after the November tests. Tams are to worn until Christmas "in the manner of the Scots."

e day comes that a Freshman rrives at Queen's looking like ut a Freshman, then-and only ill in the words of the prophet something." Try as he may the eenhorn cannot conceal his e tries as hard to disguise it as in sin the Freshette tries to rs and he is quite unsuccessful. uccessful.

efore he dons that stamp of e tam- there is little difficulty in m. Could anyone (we assume ln't) have the same vacant d anyone else make a complete books for sale in the library? ne else look for the Registrar's e top floor of the Union? Could e when asked where he was live say "Oh, the Men's' (we assume he meant Ban)? Could anyone else do a thousand and one different things equally naive? The answer is they wouldn't- but they all have. People who claim to have been in a "different" year make an idle boast. All years of Freshmen are the same. Why shouldn't they be? There's nothing to make them different from each other. And everyone would be sorry if they weren't. It gives the Senior the chance to say "I remember when I was a Frosh" in a dignified but cheerfully reminiscent way. It gives the Junior a false sense of pride when he sees their awkwardness. It gives the Sophomore someone on whom to try his new found and questionable authority. It gives the Frosh something that goes under the doubtful heading of experience. Queen's would hardly be the same without its Freshmen class. But then there must always be a Freshmen class - so why worry.Answer p we aren't.

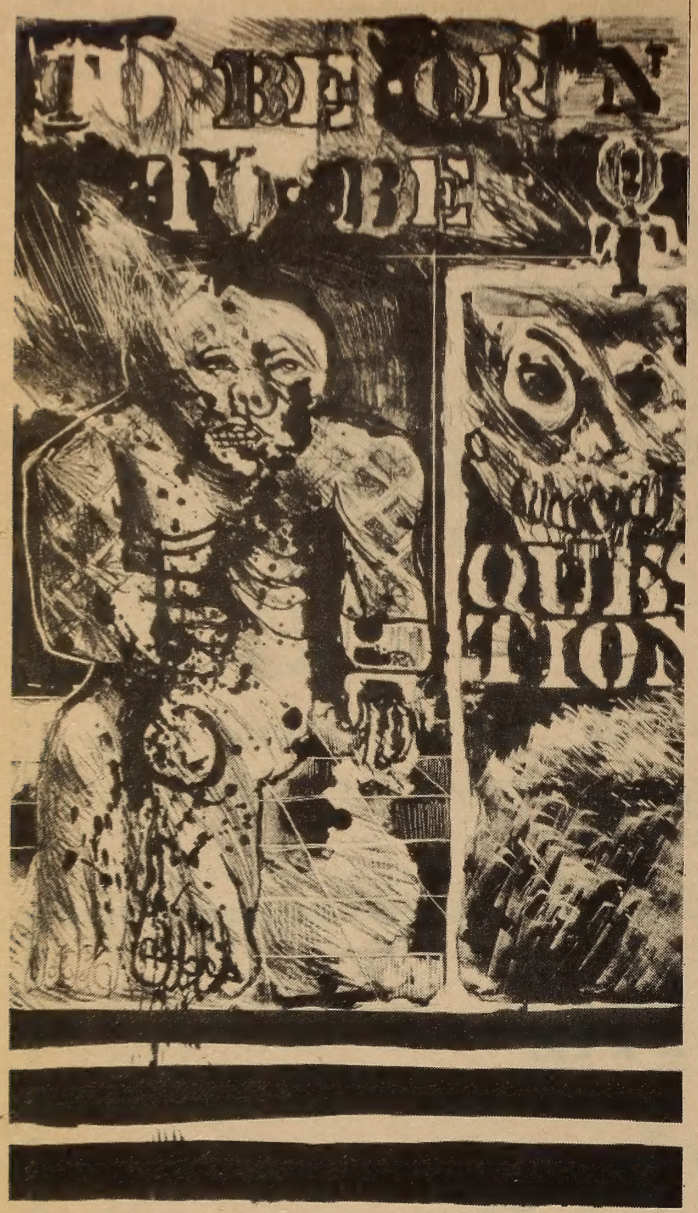
Do We Get An Education?

Take a close look at the Queen's University environment, for example, and it will become evident that in many direct and indirect ways the process of selfrealization and individualization is retarded and passionate and personal involvement in any single area of study is discouraged.

The students first campus activities, the orientation activities, impress upon him what kind of person he must be to "be with it." He should attend football matches participate in the campus fun and games, and do as well in his courses as he can. In other words, he should be a well-rounded loyal and sociable Queen's man.



The pressures during this first week, when the initiate is searching for the criteria for acceptance in the Queen's community are enough to significantly delay the students's development and acceptance of himself as a unique individual.

. . . . The student comes to see himself as isolated from society, incubationg preparing himself. He does not use the knowledge he acquires to criticize existing social institutions and programs and to initiate new ones.

. . . . Is the university to be a centre for the pursuit of truth, or is it to be merely another service organization, responding to the declared needs of society?

. . . . .A number of students, fortunately, are beginning to realize that what society needs most today is informed critics who can initiate the changes that will enable it to continue to exist and to develop in a way that will allow its members increasing freedom to understand and enjoy their human nature.

Walter Sawron's art at Agnes

by Peter Johnston

Some people may find the work of Walter Sawron difficult to come to terms with. Young, German born and uncompromising, Sawron in his first one man show, presently at the Agnes Etherington Art Centre, fuses a great variety of influences ranging from Durer to Bacon. He has created works which are powerful and yet symbolically enigmatic.

Sawron's works display a variety of techniques ranging from crudely carved wooden crosses to meticulously painted eggs. Lithography is among the variety of printing mediums in which Sawron excells, and the partial representation in this show of the 'Hamlet Series' of lithographs combines the power, expressiveness and tensions, (both spatial and spiritual), which some of his other work falls shy of achieving. Like this Hamlet series, many of Sawron's works appear to be the manifestation of a medieval-like fear of the unknown, comparable to the ominous twentieth century fear expressed in Yeats' "The Second Coming".

Sawron revels in the irrational and survives on contradiction. Not only do forms of beauty and horror, the rational and irrational, and the two and three dimensional, often assert themselves within the same composition, but schizoidal solitude also isolates individual groups of works.

It seems ironic that the same man who painted the quiet, though whimsical, egg series, also created the Hamlet lithographs. In one conte drawing, perhaps a self portrait, the alter-ego of the eggs appears behind him as he holds a fragile butterfly in one brutish hand and his confused distorted head in the other.

Sawron is young, passionate, and very talented. Clarifying restraint is perhaps all that one could hope for in his future creations.

Now this is what we call splitting the seam of a zone defense, class. Grad end backs Dave Campbell and Doug Cozac (39 and 15), for yet another reception of Peter Thompson (71) has cut between linebacker Geoff Hamlin (35) and deep a Don Bayne pass.

Grads great, but Gaels must improve greatly

by Chris Boon

When you assemble a football team from a group of former college stars, some of them very former, you expect them to be a little bit rusty, especially if they have only one practice session together as a team.

Also, the usual script calls for the Old Boys to look respectable for about a quarter or so, then fade as the accumulated weight of prosperous stomachs takes its toll. Unfortunately for the current crop of Golden Gaels, nobody had given the Grads the word.

Led by quarterback Don Bayne, a two-time OQAA All-star and the Most Valuable Player in the 1968 College Bowl (we won it that year), the Grads looked more like a title contender than most recent Gael squads.

Using only seven running plays (one of them a draw that was added at halftime because Bayne thought it would work) and twelve pass calls, Bayne mixed carries by backs Mike Hartley, Ron Clark and Peter Quinn with pin-point passing to the likes of Peter Thompson, Rick Van-Buskirk, Don McIntyre and Ron Cunningham.

The Grads' offensive line helped a little too. Guards Bob Climie and Brian Parnega didn't miss a shift, and blew people out of the way like it was 1968 all over again. Cam Innes, an All-Canadian centre last year, didn't hurt things much, nor did Al Dresser, or Ken Skeoch, of more recent vintage.

Bayne had good pass protection all day, and the running game spoke for itself. The result was overwhelming, a 44-21 stampede for the Grads.

The Grads' defense didn't do too badly, either. Although Gord McLellan got good yardage to the outside, especially in the first half, the likes of Carl Digiacoma, Jim Tait, Ace Powell, Garry Lamourie, Larry Dolecki and Pierre Pinard shut off the Gaels' power game inside, and put a strong rush on the Queen's QB's.

The deep backs, notably Ron Brooks, Jim Turnbull, Ron Faulkner, Jim McKeen and Jay Graydon, played with more co-ordination than certain recent deep fives I could mention.

The "old men", did slow down a little in the fourth quarter, allowing the Gaels to score two quick TD's on bombs from Tom Taylor to Stu Lang and rookie flanker Bruce Pollock. Before that, they had led 44-7. 'Nuff said.

Back to the present version of the Gaels, or at least the survivors. The game cost the Gaels Gord McLellan and Mike O'Shaughnessy (out for at least two weeks with knee problems), linebacker Ian Anderson, and a lot of general aches. John Booth will do a good job in McLellan's spot, but the defensive line corps is mighty thin right now.

There were some bright spots, now and then. Taylor threw the ball well, especially to tight end John Hollingsworth, who caught a touchdown pass that gave the Gaels a short-lived 7-3 lead. Hollingsworth took the ball out of the hands of Ron Brooks after Brooks had almost intercepted the Taylor throw.

Geoff Hamlin, a fullback from Ottawa via the University of North Carolina, is a devastating pass-blocker, but could well end up on defense.

Keith Taggart, a big transfer from Waterloo, was the class of the offensive line (which is not really saying too much), while Andy Sakell, Daryl Penner, and Ian Anderson all looked promising at linebacker. Greg Anderson, tall, lanky rookie, was very agressive at defensive end but may lack the bulk to be really effective.

The Gaels' defensive backfield, a sore point last year, appeared to resemble a gaping wound during the first forty minutes of Saturday's game. On the other hand, Bayne is likely to be the best quarter-back the Gaels see this year, and his receivers knew all about splitting the seams on a zone defence.

The Gaels tightened up their coverage later in the game, after the deep backs had a chance to get used to each other. Dane Tutton, late of McMaster, looks like a useful aquisition, probably in combination with Joe Pal (an OUAA All-Star last year, although he was burned a couple of times Saturday) Doug Cozac, Dave Campbell, and Alex Morris. Gil Labine, Russ Arbuckle, or Chris Durant could break in, with Labine the most likely candidate.

The Gaels open their league schedule next SUNDAY in Ottawa, taking on the Carleton Ravens in Lansdowne Park. Game time is 2:00 p.m., and fans are badly needed.

The Gaels should be a little better off by then. Don Smith, an all-star defensive tackle last year, will be off the injured list, as will (hopefully) Bob Grimm, a middle linebacker from Western Michigan and the Bramalea Satellites. These two should stabilize the defense a little, at least inside.

Tom Dickinson, a tough centre, has hopes that a badly injured finger will have healed enough by then to permit him back. He is needed. The offense, even without McLellan, is still potent. Dave Hadden, Brian Warrender, Booth, and possibly Hamlin can do the job, but the offensive line is going to have to hustle. If they do, look for a high-scoring game, with the Gaels on top. If they don't, it could be a long Sunday afternoon.

Rugby '72 - Back at it

by Ron Easteal

The Golden Gaels Rugby teams will be again attempting to capture the OUAA championship. The Rugby team was the first Queens team to win an OUAA title; in fact, it's still the only Queens team to have accomplished this.

The Rugger Gaels have perhaps been the most successful representatives of Queens in the past few years. Queens has only lost two games in the last four seasons -- both in the playoffs. Last year the Gaels won every game amassing 280 points while giving away only 23 points.

Unfortunately, only seven players from the first fifteen remain eligible to play for the Gaels this year and some important positions need to be filled. The largest holes in the team are in the backs where only one veteran remains.

The Rugby team starts to practice officially this week, the practices are held at 6:00 p.m. on the rugby field at the west campus. All returnees and newcomers are urged to attend these sessions -- transport will be provided at 5:45 in front of the gymnasium.

To people who have no experience, but who are interested in trying out, you will be more than welcome. Rugby is not a game that is played simply for the purpose of victory and glory, but is a game played for enjoyment both on and off the field. -- Especially off the field!!

This year will be something of a rebuilding year and the Gaels will find winning the championship a battle. The OUAA is split once again into an East and a West Conference. Queens will be in the East along with RMC, York, Trent and Toronto.

The league will be run on a home and home series of games -- in all. The main opposition this year should be York University, with a very experienced team. Unfortunately, the Gaels' first game is in Toronto against York on the 30th of September.

The Queen's coach of the last seven years, Gavin Reid, is on sabbatical this year and will be sorely missed. However, Mike Booth, an Australian via Calgary, is a well qualified replacement and should be able to get the best out of the teams. He will be ably assisted by this years captain and vice-captain Lee Doney and Warren Smith.

The club is running a raffle this year in the hope of generating enough funds to go on a tour either to the west coast or to Europe. The prize for the raffle will be a PAID TUITION, or its cash equivalent ($663.) Tickets are a bargain at 50c each or 3 FOR $1.00. All members of the club are urged to sell tickets both as individuals and also by donating time in the booth in the registration hall. Naturally every student at Queens should purchase tickets for this, the worthiest of causes. Just think of what you could do with an extra $663.!!

Rugger is a game played with 15 players per team and no substitution. The game is played with an oval football - slightly larger than a football, with the main objective being to score a 'try' or touchdown.

The team that scores a 'Try' gets 4 points with an additional 2 points if the try is converted. A major infringement is penalised by a free kick which may be kicked (as in a convert) through the posts for an additional 3 points.

There is one other method of scoring 3 points and that is by dropkicking the ball through the posts from the field of play during the course of the game.

As in football, possession of the ball is most important. The ball is won by one of the teams from scrums (scrimmages) analogous to the line of scrimmage in football - and lineouts.

A lineout is played when the ball goes out of bounds. The ball is thrown between the 'forwards' of the two teams lined up in single file. Whichever team catches the ball passes it back to the backs of his own team.

Again as in football with its linemen and its backs, a rugger team has 8 forwards and 7 backs. The forwards win possession of the ball and pass it to the backs who by means of running and passing try to score a touchdown.

We hope that the students and staff of Queens will support the rugby teams.

National council proposed

Canadian student council representatives will meet in November in an attempt to organize a national student union. The proposal has received strong support from western Canada but only minor support in Ontario.

At a preliminary meeting last May in Windsor, the Ontario Universities' representatives said that they preferred to consolidate the Ontario Federation of Students which was formed last spring.

However eight western universities and technical schools meeting in Regina endorsed the idea of a national body, claiming that it would prove the best vehicle for dealing with problems facing students.

The May conference approved a preliminary draft of a constitution for a national body and it will be further discussed at the meeting in November.

Deutsch addresses meeting

Canada's civil service is suffering from "bureaucratic inflexibility", according to Dr. John J. Deutsch, Principal of Queen's University.

In an address to the delegates at the annual conference of the Institute of Public Service Employees of Canada, Principal Deutsch claimed that "the same qualities that contribute to civil service integrity and day-to-day competence are also responsible for their inability to adapt."

Most civil servants have specialized skills; he stated, but have difficulty developing the policies required to deal with the broad social problems facing the country.

"When we look at the obvious need for long range strategy in order to achieve even larger social aspirations, we find that the traditional civil service is handicapped by a preoccupation with today's crisis and yesterday's failings", Principal, Deutsch stated.

The civil service's inability to cope with an accelerating pace of change has resulted in the growth of a "quasi-public service" of special aides and advisors, he said.

Volunteers and "help bank"

The Queen's Student Volunteer Bureau is looking for students who are interested in devoting part of their spare time to performing volunteer work in the Kingston community.

Although S.V.B. usually doesn't get under way until October, the agency has already received requests for over 400 volunteers from many Kingston organizations.

Among the jobs that the S.V.B. is recruiting for are the Coop Day Care Center, the Kingston Psychiatric Hospital, the Birth Control and Abortion Center and "The Center", a drug oriented referral agency.

The S.V.B. has also formed a "help bank", a listing of students willing to help in "one-shot" or short-term projects, such as canvassing for the Heart Fund, Sunday School Teaching or aiding old people or children at specific events.

Those interested in helping are asked to apply in the S.V.B. office on the second floor of the Students' Union.

Commissioner takes holiday

Jim Thompson, Services Commissioner for the Alma Mater Society has resigned his post to take the year off.

He will be replaced by Andy Pipe at least until a by-election has been called to find a new Arts and Science representative at large.

John Aitken, has also resigned as Junior Law representative. His position will be contested in October.

U of T: day-care dispute

The University of Toronto Governing Council has announced that it will provide capital subsidies for a campus day care centre, but refused to provide operating subsidies.

Parents have been occupying an unused University building since April to protest a two year old decision of the University in which they approved the idea of a day care centre but would not provide a building.

Bob Davis, one of the protesting parents, claimed that without operating subsidies, day care services could not be provided to the financially needy.

An advisory committee was set up by President Claude Bissell in 1970 to study the university's social responsibilities concluded that support should be given to a day care centre for both the university and the community. However the Governing council rejected the proposal.

Fee strike referendum for October

by Jennifer Grass

Students at Queen's and across Ontario will vote October 11 and 12 on whether to conduct a strike in January in protest of government directed increases in university and college tuition fees.

The referendum which will follow province wide study sessions was called for by the Ontario Federation of Students at a meeting in Toronto in July. It is part of an intensive educational campaign to protest increased student fees and decreased student award grants which were announced in the provincial budget on March 28.

Provincial Treasurer Darcy McKeough declared that "the government believes it is inequitable for the taxpayers to bear all the costs of increases in this area (post secondary education). The students who benefit directly should bear a larger part of the costs."

The OFS is asking all students to pay their fees in two installments which most universities allow - half in September and half in January, so that students are able to participate in a fee strike if it is called in January.

Wally Palmer, vice president of the Alma Mater Society, the Queen's student Government explained the AMS position, saying we're not telling students necessarily to withold the second installment of fees but rather to examine the issue and decide for themselves."

After the referendum Queen's, along with universities across Ontario will re-examine their position and determine their course of action.

The increases mean that fees will be $100 higher for undergraduates, $400 higher for most graduate students and $20 per course higher for part time, summer and extramural students.

With the increase in fees, a simultaneous increase in the ceiling on the loan portion of a student award from $600 to $800 was also announced.

The executive of OFS has asked the government for several changes in the Ontario Students Awards Program: an extension of the program to cover part-time students; a substantial reduction of the minimum age presently at 25 at which a student can be considered independent of all parental support and a reduction from $800 to $600 in the share of an OSAP award which may come in loan form.

One of these demands was partially met by education minister George Kerr following a meeting with OFS representatives. He agreed to reduce the age of independence from 25 to 24 making up to 2000 students eligible for more student financial assistance. In past years, students had to be married or 25 before family financial resources were not used in determining eligibility for aid.

The OFS has also attacked the governments abolition of a summer stipend ($37.50 or $50) for rehab therapy students. These students are not paid for their summer work because the Ministry of Health has declared that this is part of their education. As a result of recent government moves they are not eligible for loans during this period because the Ministry of Education has declared that they are working.

Rev. Dr. Donald M. Mathers

The Rev. Dr. Donald M. Mathers, Principal of Queen's Theological College, died on September 12 at the age of 51. Dr. Mathers was also the head of the department of Religion, a professor and an active member of the University Senate.

A native of Scotland, Dr. Mathers attended the University of St. Andrews where he obtained his M.A. in 1942, his B.D. in 1949 and last summer an Honorary Doctor of Divinity degree. He also had a Ph. D. from Columbia University and an honorary Doctor of Divinity degree from Victoria University in Toronto.

Dr. Mathers was one of this country's leading theologians and ecumenists. He was a delegate to the World Council of Churches, chairman of the United Churches standing committee on Faith, and co-chairman of the Special Commision on Doctrine that fostered the dialogue between the United and Anglican Churches of Canada. He was also past president of the Canadian Theological Society and a member of the Canadian Society for the study of Religion.

Since coming to Queen's in 1953, Dr. Mathers had written several books; The Word and the Way, The United Church in Canada, The Future of Philosophical Theology and Belief.

Principal Deutsch said, "Dr. Mather's death is a severe loss to the Queen's community. He was an outstanding head of Queen's Theological College, a distinguished leader in the Church and a highly respected teacher of Queen's students. He was a personal friend whose humanity and courage was a great inspiration and he will be keenly missed by his colleagues and by all who knew him."

CFRC considers new transmitter

When channel 6 (CJOH Ottawa) goes on the air in Kingston this fall, some people may find that the sound from CFRC-FM interferes with the CJOH signal on their television sets.

CJOH, having anticipated this problem offered last year to modify CFRC's present transmitter to broadcast on a different frequency.

Andrew Marshall, Station Manager of CFRC told the Journal that this would destroy the identification of CFRC-FM audience with 91.9 on the dial.

"However, we were willing to change if they complied with certain conditions," he said.

"We hoped to get adequate compensation for the inconvenience of changing frequencies and for losing part of our audience in the process," Marshall commented.

This compensation involved a request that CJOH buy CFRC a stereo transmitter to replace the monaural one which they already have.

Negotiations bogged down because CJOH, owned by Bushnell Communications was unwilling to buy one and declined to discuss the matter between February and August of this year.

"We may change the FM frequency after Christmas," Marshall said. "But the problem has still not been resolved to our satisfaction." he added.

There is strong sentiment for installing the new transmitter on the west campus because the current transmitter blankets Fleming Hall thoroughly when it is on the air, making some electrical engineering experiments impossible from Thursday to Sunday.

A west campus transmitter would open up those days for experiments and make it possible for the CFRC to expand to daily broadcasting.

Marshall explained that although it would help to have daily broadcasting he did not forsee moving the transmitter to the west campus in the next year because of space and technical problems, but hoped to do so within the next two years.

Needham at Queen's

By Richard Asier

Richard Needham comes to Queen's to speak on Saturday at 2.00 in Dunning Auditorium and brings with him a wit and penchant viewpoint that has made his column in the Globe and Mail engaging reading for the last nine years. He ranks as one of Canada's most outspoken writers whether in his column, his book (Needham's Inferno) or in his myriad speaking engagements across Canada.

Needham's scope seems unlimited. He is a mordant wit bemooning the plight of the single Bay Sweet Belle in one paragraph and an astute and biting social critic come philosopher in the next. Whatever his means, by fable, storytelling or aphorisms, Needham disects morality, philosophy and social mores in our society with a heavy clank of his aged "faithful Underwood" which he always comes back to in spite of his romps with that "Smith-Corona trollop."

Since its founding, the Queen's Journal has tried to include selections from the literature produced on campus. For a long time the majority of the better work was included in a yearly magazine called Quarry, consequently the Journal was usually restricted to Queen's-oriented doggerel exploiting engineers, quick lays and cheap booze. In 1952 a combination of two factors introduced a change in the quality of literature printed by the Journal. First, the Quarry magazine began looking for contributions from outside Queen's; and second, the gaunt, romantic, literary genius became one of the "right" people to be (especially at a university).

From 1952 to 1970 the material being produced not only increased in quality and quantity, but also in media. By the time the arts section of the Journal had passed through the Levana Journal, Poet's Corner, The Ivory Tower and Princess, photography and artwork had come to be included. In 1970 Paul Barron decided to begin a separate magazine specifically for the artistic material of Queen's students. This magazine was called Sweven which is Chaucerian english for "dream". The following year the title was changed to The Third Eye but due to a large demand to return to the former title, sweven is being reinstated.

The purpose of this magazine is to make Queen's students familiar with the artwork in general, to be found on campus. This year, however, the Journal plans to publish the magazine regularly on a monthly basis. Contributions of photographs, poems, plays, stories, fairy tales, art, etc., are constantly in demand, and any one wishing to leave material for sweven should leave it at the Journal office, in the basement of the Union.

Classes start on Yom Kippur

By Sandy Nairman

In spite of annual reminders from the Canadian Jewish Congress to all Canadian Universities, Queen's will begin classes this year on Yom Kippur, September 18th, the most solemn holy day of the Jewish calendar.

Rabbi Judah Mintz, of Kingston's Beth Israel Synagogue and Director of Hillel House, states that to his knowledge, "No action has been taken challenging the university, by the students". He estimates that there are approximately 400 Jewish students on campus but that many of them don't want to "ruffle any feathers". He states further, that so many of them are "alienated and on the defensive" that they will attend services on the eve of Yom Kippur and attend classes during the day.

Rabbi Mintz states, "Ignorance on the part of the University, as to what Yom Kippur signifies" is probably the reason that the holiday was overlooked. "I hate to sound so pessimistic", Rabbi Mintz says, "but the kids just don't seem to care."

When informed that York University had cancelled classes on Yom Kippur, he stated that this was a result of the larger number of Jewish students there, and that York is part of an acitve and thriving Jewish Community.

"In Kingston," he says, "Most of the Jewish businesses stay open on High Holidays, even though the Kingston Jewish community is an old and established one."

Last year, classes at Queen's began on Rosh Hoshana, the Jewish New Year, and if students did not attend, they dealt with their prospective professors individually. No notification of the holiday was issued officially.

Miss Medland, assistant to Principal John J. Deutsch of Queen's, was totally non committal in response to inquiries made regarding the beginning of classes on Yom Kippur. She stated that "the Principal really has nothing to do with setting the date for the beginning of classes," and she indicated that Registrar George Leech would be of assistance.

Leech in turn claimed that no calendar from the Canadian Jewish Congress had reached him. He stated, "Classes have always begun two weeks after Labour Day. That is decided by the Faculty Board of Arts and Sciences and passed by the Senate one year in advance." He stated further, that "No one has ever brought this to my attention, neither Rabbi Mintz, nor any individual students." He continues, "If students don't want to attend the first day of classes, and many don't, they are free to do so." Leech stated finally, "We never cancel classes for religious holidays, except for Christmas and Easter, but everybody observes those."

Ben Kayfetz of the Canadian Jewish Congress stated that he was certain that all universities, including Queen's were notified "formally" of the dates of the High Holidays this year, in spite of Leech's denial.

Last year, students at York University waged a battle to have classes cancelled for Rosh Hoshana. The York students got complete support from the Canadian Jewish Congress, as did students on the campuses of the University of Western Ontario.

"At Queen's," Kayfetz stated, "The Hillel Foundation is such an old organization, we did not feel we would need to intervene, so we didn't. I am baffled by the lack of concern demonstrated."

He continues, "About 12 years ago we never really thought that the first day of lectures was that crucial if it was missed, but now we realize how important it is to be there at the beginning. . . We'll give Jewish students any support needed. . .I feel it is very important to continue to investigate this matter. I am astounded that there are supposedly 400 Jewish students at Queen's. . . That's a sizable number."

Pass, fail grading system in use at St. Lawrence

By Pat Spence

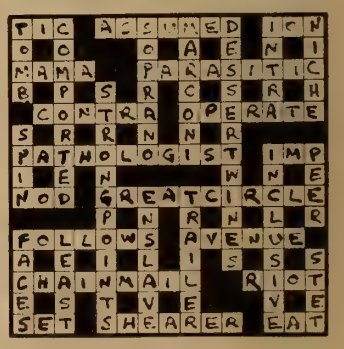
This fall St. Lawrence College will be using an honours, pass, fail system of grading. "Hopefully this new method will result in more emphasis on learning rather than in racking up grades" said Dick Tindal, a former student of Queen's and a professor at St. Lawrence.

He went on to explain that the system is really based on the attainment of certain objectives. The instructor condenses his course down to a set number of objectives which he outlines to his class at the beginning of the semester. Grading is almost nonexistant in that the student either attains the objectives and passes or he doesn't and fails. If he attains more than the required amount of pass objectives or he demonstrates a high level of performance he will be awarded an honours grade.

Tindal said that up until now few people recognized the difference between evaluation and grading. "Evaluation is the process of appraising a student's work in such a way that the student can see clearly what he is doing wrong and grading is the recording of a symbol which expresses some level of accomplishment" he explained. "St. Lawrence feels that evaluation is a lot more beneficial to the learning processes of the student than grading. A student as well as the teacher should be more concerned with why the work is satisfactory or unsatisfactory rather than the assignment of precise and accurate grades.

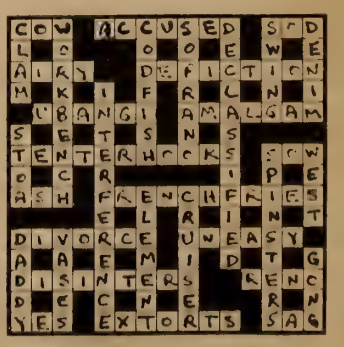
Tindal also explained that he felt St. Lawrence has two advantages in implementing the system. The first advantage would be the good student teacher ratio; twenty-five to one and the second one is the fact that as a community college rather than a university they are really more intent on the students grasping certain specifics for particular career training.

"Although we are certainly concerned with teaching our students to think it is not our primary purpose. We hope that in attaining the set objectives he is naturally learning to use his mind."



St. Lawrence College does not have final examinations and grading was previously based on an A, B, C, D, I (incomple) or F (fail) of tests throughout the year. Now completion of the courses will only depend on the attainment of the set objectives and will not be restricted by a time. "We'll see in April if we really are being too idealistic about the whole thing" he said.

"Queen's has at several times considered different forms of grading, the most recent time being the 'Appraisal 72' last January", Dean Watts, Dean of Arts and Science told the Journal.



"It must be kept in mind by both the student and teacher that grading should be an aid to learning and we have continued to feel that the present per cent method is the most helpful" he said. With this system the student has a clearer idea of how well he is doing. It is also easier for us to choose the student who should be allowed to enter graduate school and to award scholarships."

Elrond College Inc. -A Study

Kingston Faces A Housing Crisis

In the fall of 1968, due to a housing crisis for students in Kingston, a Committee for Emergency Housing was set up by the Alma Mater Society to demand from the University administration financial assistance to enable the expansion of co-operative housing.

Several factors, dating as far back to 1966 had effect upon the concept of student co-operative housing at Queen's. Under the leadership of Howard Adelman the Co-Operative College Residences Inc. (CCRI) had been formed in Toronto. Adelman was responsible for various co-operative ventures such as the development of Rochdale College. Student government leaders at Queen's were in contact with Adelman and following closely this co-operative housing movement.

In the summer of 1968 at the Canadian Union of Students (CUS) conference, held at Guelph, student controlled housing, as a means to produce change within the University community was of utmost importance on their agenda. CCRI by this time was in the final stages of Rochdale College and had already completed Waterloo co-ops. Rochdale's role at the conference gave direction and guidelines to other student delegates interested in student housing chiefly the Queen's delegation comprised of Chuck Edwards and Jan Lichty head of the AMS, Dan Burns a member of Science '44 Co-op, Tom Good also a member of Science '44 Co-op as well as assistant editor of the Queen's Journal and Glen MacDonnell.

A development history brief put out by Elrond College states the "in the fall of 1968 the situation was as follows: a bad housing crisis, the student government was focusing its concerns on this issue and viewed co-operativism as the solution most consistant with their ideological orientation."

Science '44 Expansion

That fall Science '44 co-operative received a large loan from Queen's for their expansion which was realized in 1969. Tom Good keeping the expansion of Science '44 in mind obtained, with the aid of the AMS, an option to purchase land near the corner of Division and Princess Streets. Then a committee headed by John Wigan of Science '44 and Lorne Musselman was set up to evaluate the use of this land to alleviate the housing situation. This committee later came under a new leadership headed by Michael Vaughn and David Peters. They contacted CCRI with their ideas and with the aid of Ned Franks of the Politics Department a clearer focus of a student co-operative as a reality was taking shape.

From Toronto Irving Grossman was chosen as architect and their plans were supported by $20,000 from the AMS. A campus survey of students' needs, plus the living style of Science '44 shaped the initial concepts. These concepts, states the Elrond Development Report "chiefly involved the idea of co-operative living, a co-educational emphasis, a large degree of choice in types of units and the embodiment of an educational program within the living environment."

By February of 1969 with the help of CCRI, the Canadian Mortgage and Housing Corp. (CMHC), Queen's and the AMS plans for the Princess Street Project (which later became Elrond College) were well under way. In March Grossman's architectural plans were available.

Financing Elrond College

Financially Elrond was supported by $30,000 (raised from $20,000) from the AMS and $100,000 from Queen's University which helped meet the contractor's reinvestment estimated $150,000 for the project. CCRI was then able to proceed with its application to CMHC which grants student co-operative residences 90 per cent loans, the mortgage being repayable over fifty years.

On March 7, 1969 the first public meeting to recruit new members of a planning committee was held where students were introduced to Grossman's sketch plans which he states are "a reaction against the practise of designing one unit and multiplying that unit 300 times." At the same time David Peters and Michael Vaughn were negotiating with CMHC and with the City of Kingston over by-law and building standard conflicts. Still more problems arose at this time for Queen's students became skeptical of CCRI because of the management difficulties and problems run into at Rochdale. Also at this time the project's mortgage application was rejected by CMHC because of a lack of funds (which had been committed to the MacArthur College residence complex).

The following fall of 1969, the housing issue reached far out to the students for immediate support. An article appeared in the September issue of the Queen's Journal stating that "The time has long past when Queen's students can ignore the housing problem of Kingston (a problem for which they have to share the blame). Students must act. NOW." In October of 1969 a User's Committee headed by Doug Fletcher was set up to consider specific design details, membership etc. Dan Burns described the proposed building as "fairly radical in design and providing more facilities and small social groups than the University owned residences." (Queen's Journal, February, 1969)

Even though the CMHC application had been rejected the project continued with interim financing by Queen's so architectural work could continue through fall and winter until a new application would be submitted to CMHC. Also, reinforcing the doubts of the student body, Elrond College became a separate entity only using CCRI as consultants.

The next crisis which had to be overcome involved the land option which had expired. Putting down $10,000, a fourteen day option to purchase the land was made. At this point a number of legal issues arose 1) neither the AMS nor Elrond were

During this crucial week Professor Ned Franks found out that Queen's was not interested in taking control of the project but was willing to increase their loan to meet the demands of Vroom Construction. Finally, with a cut of $150,000 from his bid the contract with Vroom was signed on October 1, 1970.

During the next months Elrond went through a process of intense organizational meetings, with the Queen's Board of Trustees choosing two directors to the Elrond College Board to meet with the conditions under the increased loan committment. The User's Committee expanded subdividing into Furniture, Cafeteria and Commercial Space committees. These committee members also sat in on the Board meetings.

As well as focusing on internal matters, external factors created more difficulties in the construction of the building itself. Vroom had hired members of a Toronto Union to work on Elrond to save costs. On October 26 an information picket was set up at the site protesting the lack of local Kingston workers employed by Vroom. By December at least two unions were ready to go on strike over this issue. Alderman Cook charged Vroom with exploitation of Kingston labour. David Peters then issued a statement to the Editor of the Kingston Whig Standard that Elrond could not be held responsible for Vroom's actions. In this letter dated December 17, 1970 Peters states that "Because Vroom took the job when no one else would, the project is still alive and some Kingstonians have been hired. In a nutshell, no Vroom, no project and no jobs - for anyone. This is helping Kingston Labour not "exploiting it."

As construction slowed down and ground to a halt over the winter the dispute was placed before the Ontario Labour Relations Board. Eventually, an out-of-court settlement was reached on March 26 forcing Vroom to employ 50 per cent Kingston labour.

Elrond To Pay City Taxes

Also in November-December of 1970, the City of Kingston would not permit Elrond to continue until a definite committment was made by Elrond concerning the payment of property taxes. Because of Elrond's status as a College and educational institution the City as well as the community and Press were wary of Elrond becoming a tax exempt property. Cliff Bowering writing in the Kingston Whig Standard on November 4, 1970 stated the people's concern." Elrond is welcome to establish itself in the city for the reasons already stated. But it must expect to carry its fair share of the tax burden just as every citizen is expected to carry its share. The tax-exempt disgrace in Kingston is bad enough as it is without making it worse. The main institutions, enjoying that enviable status are Queen's University, Kingston Psychiatric Hospital, Kingston General Hospital and Hotel Dieu Hospital. With the university as the one most heavily tax-exempt these four represent an annual tax loss of $3 million or more to the city." At a meeting with the City officials Elrond repeated its stand assuring the City of tax payments. Peter stated in a letter dated December 9, 1970 to Mayor V. E. Swain Elrond's position on the tax issues: "Included in it (budget for the fiscal year, 1971) as well as constructions costs, carrying charges etc. is a full provision for all taxes which the College may be assessed for."

In the October 3rd, 1970 edition of the Kingston Whig Standard is a description of Elrond's unique architectural and living design: "The building will offer seventeen different living accomodations. The 97 units will range from two and four man apartments to six and twelve-man units. The design will group the units into modules of four storeys, which will be served by just five corridors and five elevator stops. The design is such that 80 per cent of the units will face south towards Lake Ontario."

In April 1971 John Blanchard was elected President Jack Smith, Secretary and Ned Franks reelected Treasurer. New members included Ray Stemp; John Blakney, Beatrice Bryce and Jim Whitley. Also, that May, Alan Broadbent (Rector of Queen's) was appointed Education Program Advisor. In June, 137 Collingwood became Elrond House which was rented from Queen's and housed offices and meeting rooms. (Elrond House on completion of the building is imminently moving to the College itself) John Blanchard became Project Director on July 1, 1971.

That same July bad luck once again struck the Elrond project. The form workers on the site quit the job because of possible bankruptcy. This lead to the dismissal of two supervisory personnel of Vroom Construction and the hiring of a new job supervisor in August. Meanwhile work had been subsequently slowed down and considerable time and money lost.

By September 1971, construction was speeded up and they projected July 1972 as the completion date for the sixteen storey building. Meetings also were being held on campus explaining Elrond and membership applications were made available to the student body.

The Present Situation

In the Spring of 1972 Jane Linsay became President of Elrond College Inc. John Blanchard was hired as General Manager. Applications were filled quickly by students wanting to be part of and live in Elrond College starting in September 1972.

Unfortunately, this past summer with its opening within sight, Elrond came into conflict with Vroom Construction over the complex building design. It was obvious that due to work slowdowns and construction problems the building would not be able to meet the expected date of occupancy, September 1. Vroom was persuaded by Elrond to continue with the practical construction taking the legal difficulties to arbitration and litigation. However, the students arrived this month without a place to live. Elrond has attempted to hold the contractor responsible for the costs of accomodating these people in hotels and temporary living quarters till they are able to move in.

Already, amidst surrounding construction, some occupants have been able to move into the apartment units in various areas of the first three storeys. Various unfinished fire alarm installation systems, and the kitchen have prevented any other possible occupancy. According to John Blanchard (General Manager) the kitchen facilities should be ready by this week. Occupants will be delayed no more than one week in temporary residences until the City Fire and Building regulations can be met.

The Elrond staff seems quite optimistic and feel that perhaps facing these difficulties will only draw together the members of Elrond College. By working together and overcoming problems collectively (as the members have in the past) is what co-operativism is all about. Once all the tenants do move in they will have something to be optimistic and proud of - for Elrond is the first student co-operative housing project to open with almost 100 per cent occupancy.

Peter Raymont (an ex-Queen's student) states in a film proposal about Elrond for the National Film Board of Canada: "Finally the sharing of the community facilities plus the educational and co-operative aspects of the College encourage a community of the building as a whole . . . these objectives are to point out the relation between intellectual activity and practical activity; the relation between doing and thinking." He concludes his brief by saying "Elrond will not be treated as a model by which other projects may be judged, but rather as another step - - - a major step - - - in our continual struggle to secure a stronger control over our environment and our destiny."

Students must vote where they live, but...

Queen's students are expected to vote in the "riding in which they normally reside" for the October 30 federal election, officials of the Kingston office of Elections Canada said Wednesday.

"Normal residence" is officially defined as the place a person is "physically residing" on enumeration day, September 11, with the exception of single students who normally return to the home of their parents at the end of the academic year.

Kingston election officials however, conceed that a single student has two choices in voting at his parents home, or in Kingston, although if a student does not tell the enumerators "all the informations, he may find himself challenged and not able to vote at all."

They say that a student who continued to live in Kingston this summer, even if he visited home, qualifies to vote in Kingston as well as a student who worked somewhere other than at home and then returned to Kingston. Married persons, whether they be students or not, living in a room, an apartment, a university residence, or eleswhere, are considered to normally reside where they physically lived on the enumeration day.

The Kingston officials did not know what is going to be done about enumerations in the University residences. Enumeration in the residential areas of the city is now being done.

A student who has been enumerated at home may either vote in the advanced poll on the Saturday previous to the election, or may ask to have a proxy voter.

To vote by proxy, a student must ensure that he is on the voters lists in the area in which he normally resides; obtain a statement from the registrar confirming that he is a "properly registered full-time student"; and a "form 47" from a federal returning officer. These documents must be given in person to the returning officer of the home district by 10 pm of the Friday preceeding election day.

Further information regarding proxy voting and enumeration can be obtained from the returning office at 335 King Street East, 549-2500.

Urban vehicle fails test at GM

An urban vehicle designed by nine mechanical engineers, at Queen's was unable to finish the course in the Urban Vehicle Design Competition held in Milford, Michigan last month.

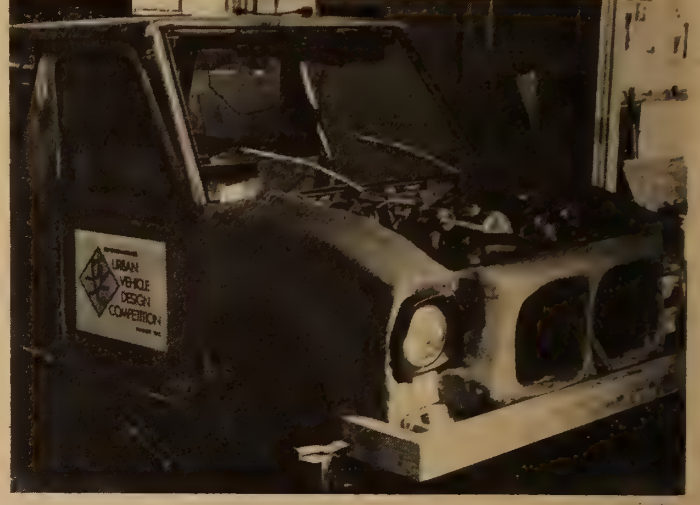
Dr. E. F. Kurtz, project advisor explained that the car just wasn't ready for the contest.

"There was nothing basically wrong with it but we needed two weeks to finish it," he said.

Unfortunately the announcement of the contest did not come until the spring examination period in 1971 so the project did not get under way until the following September," Kurtz commented.

However, before breaking down the car did cover 18-20 miles of the rough handling loop at the General Motors Proving grounds.

"We didn't expect to be put through such a rugged test," Jim Secord, project co-ordinator, said.



"The car was drivable but the steering wheel had to be replaced three times and the team was finally forced to stop when a $3 bearing broke," he added.

The competition which was organized by students in the United States, was designed to prove that it was possible to build an urban car, suitable for city type driving which would meet consumer cost requirements as well as emissions the US federal requirements set down for 1976.

The Queen's project was financed through grants from the Transportation and Development Agency, from Queen's and from the federal Opportunities for Youth program. Parts were donated by a variety of local and international companies.

A few adjustments will be made before the car is put through the Canadian emissions tests. The Queen's team hopes to demonstrate that at a constant level of speed their car, which is equipped with a diesal engine and a hydraulic drive system, has a low level of exhaust emission.

The car will be on display in the Industrial Art shops in McArthur College next week.

Apartment hunting

Rent was a vial of blood

By Bill Lower

I faced the crowded Vancouver Airport, prior to labour day weekend - undaunted. I pressed through stand-by status with the firm persistance expected of only the best Queen's students and stoically said goodbye to dear ones on thirty second notice. I endured a night flight, middle seat, milk run, and arrived in Toronto at 7.30 in the morning having had only ten hours sleep in the past three days and even this I faced like any suitable Captain America.

However, when it came to apartment hunting in Kingston even I was weakened. I lined up at 12.30 every day to get the local paper luke warm off the press. Each day I found two or three apartments in the local listings and proceeded to telephone each one. But my calls were usually met with a gruff reply that either the place had been rented or that an exorbitant rent would be a vial of blood each full moon.

But there were a few apartments open, down in one part of town where the sun never shines and the street lights are left on 24 hours a day. People suspended like spiders on their stoops watched with cold stares as I approached. Tenicles of hatred moved out sharply as I passed. At my destination I discovered a note reading "key on the door." I couldn't quite understand why he didn't come down to show me the place himself. There were many other key on the door apartments but I didn't check them out.

At Clark Hall, the Queen's Housing Agency I thought there would be hope of finding an apartment. Here students band together and try to find themselves nooks and cranies into which they could submerge themselves for another year. To my surprise and delight there were a few left.

I rushed down at the appointed time to the appointed place where I was to meet Claude. He arrived just seconds before I was about to leave and informed me as he dashed into his apartment so that he could make a business call, that he was a Queen's student also. Renting out houses and apartments was just his summer job.

I glanced around the apartment while Claude was on the telephone and managed to catch strains of his conversation.

"I'm calling about that house on Earl Street," he said. "It's gone? But I thought that we had made an arrangement. I've got six people down there now waiting to move in. Yes, I did go down there yesterday and I made the arrangement with your son. Well, what am I going to tell those people who are waiting. They have all their stuff with them and are just waiting to move in when I return. I really think you should make good your arrangements. Well, yes, alright. Why don't you come down— and see me tomorrow. Fine goodbye," he said in disgruntled tone and slammed the phone down with vigour. Turning to me he said, "I guess you're looking for an apartment?"

I replied hestitantly that I was and he led me away to a rooming house where I met a seemingly imcompatible bunch of students. However, as I was searching for an apartment I declined to take the room. Claude gave me his phone number and told me to call the next day as he was sure that he would have something for me by then. But my confidence in him had dwindled so I deposited the number in the nearest garbage recepticle.

The following day I returned to the newspaper listings and discovered something that looked at least passable I phoned only to discover that the place had already been rented. "But I do have a couple of apartments which will be ready for occupancy this afternoon," he said and we arranged to meet at his place at 7.00 pm.

However, the address he gave me reeked with familiarity. It was Claude's so I decided to pass it up. By now I was ready to turn around and go back to British Columbia. I repacked and bought my plane ticket and was just about to leave when I received a call from a friend in Kingston. He had decided to move out and find an apartment. Well, one last token gesture, I thought. We roamed the streets on bicycles checking out the apartments that promised to be rat free. To my surprise we found one which needed a paint job but it was habitable. I began to write a cheque feeling that never before had my signature had such a profound effect on the outcome of my future. As I slammed the middle initial down, visions of the campus of the University of British Columbia floated through my mind and the sound of the Pacific pranned in my ears. Even though it was a sacrifice to leave BC, it was the right decision. Queen's is a good university, if only there weren't so many hassles trying to find living quarters here.

AMS blasted

Sir:

I wish to bring to your attention the fact that the AMS is no longer working for the students of this University.

Over the last two years, I have had frequent occasion to park on University Avenue in front of the Douglas Library. Yesterday (August 24), when I parked there, I received a parking ticket.

I immediately phoned City Hall to protest against the change in parking regulations. The alteration had been made, I was told, because the University demanded it. So I phoned the University, and eventually managed to find someone who knew something about the matter. He said that the University's appeal to City Hall to have the parking regulations changed was made after repeated entreaties to do so from the AMS.

From this incident, I can only conclude that the AMS is made up of charlatans and knaves. Their action makes George Kerr, and those advocating still higher tuition fees, appear to be the best friends that the students of this university ever had.

Gary Simpson.

Ed Note: The request regarding parking on University Ave. was made by the previous AMS administration. They actually wanted the street turned into a mall. We agree.

Prof. leaves

Dear Sir,

In view of the present uncertainties at Queen's University I have decided to accept a position as Associate Professor of Mathematics at Sir George Williams University in Montreal, starting this Fall.

I should like to thank the students of Queen's University for some very enjoyable classes during the last four years and also for the continued support and encouragement which I have received.

Yours sincerely,
Prof. Richard L. Hall.

Collins Bay Guys and Dolls is coming

by Sandy Naiman

"Last year when we were doing 'One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest' Rocky said, 'Why don't we do Guys and Dolls?", but we thought it was just a joke. Then we found ourselves roped into it."

So mused Kip Kully during the second run through of the first act of this year's Collins Bay Drama Club production, Guys and Dolls, which will run Friday and Saturday night, September 22nd and 23rd at the Grand Theatre, at 8.30 p.m.

"I thought a musical would be easier, but. . ." and Rocky Thibeault laughed. Even though Guys and Dolls is a challenge for the Collins Bay Drama Club, (last year's show demanded only acting, this year's involves singing and dancing too,) and even though the rehearsal in the gym of Collins Bay Penitentiary was constantly interrupted with suggestions from Director Peter Lichtenfels and Producer Nancy Helwig, the atmosphere was charged with excitement and nervous energy. Twenty three members of the cast plus numerous crew members, assistants, bystanders and musicians watched as the first act unfolded, was halted, and unfolded again.

Damon Runyon's stories, a book by Jo Swerling and Abe Burrows, and finally Frank Loesser's immortal music and lyrics all revolve around the New York underworld, a place peopled by gamblers and gangsters and a varied assortment of loose women. Into this delightful den of iniquity marches Sergeant Sarah Brown and her "Save the Soul" Salvation Army mission, dedicated to the conversion of all the sinners that inhabit the moral sewers of the world.

As showtime draws near, both actors and crew are becoming more and more tense and anxious, for only three cast members of this show have had the experience of last year's Grand Theatre success.

Since the beginning of July Mr. Lichtenfels and Mrs. Helwig, plus eight women, including choreographer Jill Hodkinson and pianist Shirley Hicks have been trooping out to Collins Bay to rehearse three times a week, and now every night, for the show that will ultimately just run two nights.

But Jacki Berry, an 18 year old LCVI student, who innocently plays Sarah Brown opposite Kip Kully's sexy Sky Masterson stated that she's "enjoying every minute of it." Tonight, when she and Kip had to repeat a delicate kiss-slap scene, the entire cast was hysterical with laughter and asides of "Slap her back" and "Really give it to him". All Kip said quietly was, "Thanks alot guys" and tried it again.

Certain areas of the show are strong, and even bordering on the professional, particularly the chorus numbers, when the gamblers get together to praise "The oldest established, permanent, floating, crap game in New York" which is run by Rocky Thibeault's raucous Nathan Detroit. Jill Hodkinson and her chorus of Hot Box girls burlesque beautifully the "Bushel and a Peck" number and Barbara Marrison is almost spellbinding in "Adelaide's Lament". Stage Manager Paul Lavigne assured me "She's probably going to steal the show". Kip Kully, who remarked, "I'm no singer", counterpointed Miss Berry's "If I Were A Bell" routine with vitality, humour and dash and Francois Molyneaux and Sam Matto began to capture the fast paced subtelties of the show's title song.

During the rehearsal, which was broken by several guards who appeared to have lost an inmate in the shuffle of inside and outside people connected with the production, and who recalled all cast members to their cells for a head count, Jill Hodkinson remarked that another play will be produced as soon as this one closes, "so that the disappointment the men feel after its all over won't be too harshly felt. Nancy hasn't chosen a play yet," she said but Rocky Thibeault mentioned that he is very interested in directing a short one act play about the drug scene and Kent Irwin, who plays gambler, Rusty Charlie, has already written one on a Christmas theme that he is anxious to see produced.

Many of the men connected with the production are taking courses either at St. Lawrence College, in visual arts, business administration, behavioral science or by correspondence, as is Al Quatrochi, in journalism from the University of California, and he assured me of a job when he starts his own newspaper.

The show is filled with laughs, toe-tapping tunes and genuine musical and comic highlights, although few of the men are confident after their four hour session which was fraught with brow mopping and frustration.

Although few have seen the sets which are being designed and built by inmates Robert Monteith, Terry Dinneen and Ralph Longstaff, Lichtenfels stated that "they are top notch, comparable to any professional sets you'll see".

In nine short days, always the hardest push in any production, the public will gather in the Grand Theatre and undoubtedly be thoroughly entertained with a Guys and Dolls that epitomizes two and a half months of line memorizing, and dance and voice instruction, which many have never had. This accomplishment will place another feather in the caps of a group of people of whom someone once said, "It can never be done". That was two years ago before Nancy Helwig mounted her first production which eventually got to the Dominion Drama Festival.

Well, whoever you are, it can be done, it has been done and it will be done, again and again, by the Collins Bay Drama Club.

Tickets are $2.50 for adults and $2.00 for students, but group rates are available for groups of ten or over. They can be obtained at the Grand Theatre, 218 Princess Street.

Keith Mckie is at Bitter Grounds tonight and tomorrow night.

Keith McKie at grounds

Keith McKie will be featured at the Bitter Grounds Coffee House, Saturday and Sunday, September 16th and 17th, between 9.00 pm and 1.00 am on the 2nd floor of the Students Union.

English born McKie came to Canada at an early age and at 24 has begun to make a mark on the folk club scene. He did a six-day engagement at Grumbles Coffee House on Jarvis St. in Toronto last December.

In his third set, there, the quiet, relaxed, almost shy McKie, refined in his white slacks, long brown hair tumbling over his collar showed how his supple, melodic voice could glide like some graceful bird through beautiful passages of songs backed by his guitar.

Good songs, if somewhat light in meaning, all originals, such as Golliwog, Moonstone, and his best Freedom. And gentle tunes such as Spring Winds and One World which McKie devised using lyrics written by his girlfriend, Lynn Ernewin.

McKie's talent is no surprise if rather unexposed lately. At 17, he was in the Vendettas, a rock group Ronnie Hawkins discovered in Sault Ste. Marie and brought to Toronto to manage. McKie later became a major force in the 30-month existence of Kensington Market, a Toronto group of the late '60s which produced two of the best albums to emerge from the stormy Yorkville days.

He said he wanted to form another group but denies the rumor he is to replace David Clayton Thomas in Blood Sweat and Tears.

Admission to the Bitter Grounds Coffee House to see Keith McKie is $1.50.

While the football Gaels have been sweating under verbal lashes wielded by Bill Miklas and Jim Sherritt, a baker's half-dozen of other sports got under way this week. For the men, rugger (oops, RUGBY), soccer, track and field, and cross-country practices are proceeding at the west campus (straight west on Union Street to the first traffic light, then turn left into McArthur College and follow your nose to the practice fields), with newcomers more than welcome. Tennis, both for men and women, has its practices on the arena courts 4:30 to 6:30 daily, while women's track joins its male counterpart at the Stadium track at West campus. Soccer goes 4:30 to 6:00,Track (both) and cross-country 5:00 to 7:00 pm and Rugger (there we go again) 6:00 to 7:30. Take your pick, and join in.

Back to football for awhile. The Gaels meet Carleton Ravens this Sunday at 2:00 pm in Lansdowne Park in Ottawa. AMS buses are available at $5.00 a head return for this game. A big turnout would help the team to no end, since a foreign park the size of that one can be pretty empty. Look for John Booth to see quite a bit of action in Gord McLellan's halfback spot; Geoff Hamlin will play some offence as well, especially when his superb blocking is required. On defence, watch Don Smith, Bob Grimm, and Dane Tutton. They could be the pick of the line, linebackers, and secondary respectively.

Switching sports again, Swimming coach Larry Brawley needs a student manager for this years team. Anyone interested can apply to him at Room 214, Physical Education Centre.

John Booth will play Sun.

We apologize

It has been brought to my attention that a statement made by Ron Easteal in his Rugby story in Tuesday's paper is partly incorrect. Easteal stated that "The rugby team was the first Queen's team to win an OUAA title; in fact it's still the only Queen's team to have accomplished this." The first part is correct. The second is a slight to last year's fine Volleyball team, the defending OUAA champions On behalf of Ron and myself, our apologies.

With the school year about to begin, attention is once again focusing on the Bews competition. This is the first of a series of columns which will appear every week in the Journal about Bews. It is appropriate at this time that we pause for a moment and reflect upon the importance of Bews to Queen's men.

The Bews program is named in honour of James Bews, director of men's athletics at Queen's from 1919 to 1936. The program was founded in 1938 with participants competing in three events: softball, harrier and track and field - for the championship and the Bews Trophy. Since that time it has grown considerably until this year when there will be 26 different sports offered. It has been estimated that more than 30 per cent of Queen's men participate in at least one sport, making Bews one of the best programs of it's kind in Canada.

Queen's athletics are organized under the University Council on Athletics, which derives its powers from the University Senate. The U.C.A. is made up of five departments; men's and women's intercollegiate, men's and women's intra murals, and recreation. Bews comes under the men's intramural department, and is operated by the Men's Intramural Athletics Committee. This committee is composed of a student representative from each of the 24 competing units. As well, there are faculty sticks representing Arts and Science, Applied Science, the Graduate Society, Law, Commerce and a combined faculty team of Physical Education, Medicine, and the Faculty of Education. The three remaining members are Howard Pearce, the recreation co-ordinator, a member of the Physical Education Department staff; and Bob Carnegie, the executive officer of the Men's Intramural Athletic Committee.

Safety has always been placed in high regard by the M.I.A.C. Students are required by law to have health insurance under the Ontario Health Insurance Plan. In addition, a low cost Health and Accident Plan is available through the university; its purpose is to cover such things as dental care, which is not covered by O.H.I.P. Information about this program may be obtained at the Physical Education Centre.

The Bews program gets under way this year shortly after the start of classes. Golf will begin on September 21st, and Monsterball and Tug-o-War will start a week later. Those years which have not appointed an athletic stick as yet, should do so as soon as possible. All athletic sticks should register with Mr. Carnegie at the Physical Education Centre and pick up their handbooks as soon as possible.

All students are urged to consult the bulletin boards in the locker room of the Physical Education Centre for news of upcoming activities.

World: Viet Cong offer peace

MOSCOW — In the wake of a campaign against alcoholism, the Soviet Union has passed stringent laws against drug addiction. The new law required compulsory treatment of addicts in rehabilitation centres for up to two years or more. Those found trafficing in narcotics will be liable for up to ten years in prison.

KAMPALA, UGANDA — Entry visas have been granted to 600 of the 5750 Ugandan Asians who applied for entry into Canada during the first week. The processing of the application forms was held up due to the late arrival of the equipment for giving the medical examinations of the applicants. Officials estimate that about 20,000 applications have been distributed to date.

SAIGON — The Viet Cong have issued a new peace statement calling for a "provisional government of national concord that shall be dominated by neither side." The statement called for the United States to withdraw their troups from Viet Nam, to cease supporting the regime of President Nguyen Van Thieu, and to stop all bombing and mining of North Viet Nam. The proposed government according to the plan would be a three part coalition including members of the Provisional Revolutionary Government, members of the Saigon administration, excluding President Thieu, and representations of the other political elements in Viet Nam.

MUNICH — Avery Brundage, President of the International Olympic Committee for two decades, closed the games Tuesday as his official act of office. As the olympic flame was allowed to die, Brundage told the crowd "together we bore the difficult hours of deepest darkness", referring to the Israeli massacre. Brundage is to be succeeded by Lord Killanin of Ireland.

NORWICH, ENGLAND — British Climatologist Prof. Hubert Lamb claims that a new ice age is creeping over the Northern Hemisphere and that the rest of this century will grow progressively colder. He stated that we are past the best of the interglacial period which occurred 7,000 to 3,000 years ago and that temperatures have been floating downward ever since according to Lamb temperatures will continue in a downward trend for the next twenty years after which warm periods will return for only short periods of years. The last great ice age occurred 60,000 years ago, the sixth in a period of one million years.

ATLANTIC CITY, NEW JERSEY — Terry Anne Meeuwsen, Miss Wisconsin, was crowned Miss America 1973. Miss Meeuwsen sang with the New Christy Minstrels for two years before entering the contest. She stands five foot eight inches, weighs 120 pounds and measures 36-25-36.

Canada: Bennett to resign Socred leadership

VICTORIA — Former Premier of British Columbia, A. C. Bennett, defeated in the August 30 provincial election, has announced that he will not contest the Social Credit Party leadership in a May 1973 convention. The August election was won by the New Democratic Party with 38 seats compared with the Socreds holding 10. The Liberals won 5 seats and the Conservatives 2.

KINGSTON — The Kingston City Council held their last meeting in the north wing of city hall on Tuesday night. The meetings will now be held in the County Council Chambers in the County Court House on Court Street while renovations are being made at city hall. Taking about eighteen months to complete the renovations will cost approximately two million dollars. The offices of the mayor, the city clerk the comptroller and the city treasurer along with the Welfare Office, Accounting and Personnel Departments will be in the old Post Office Building on the corner of Clarence and Wellington Streets.

TORONTO — Formal approval has been given by provincial Transportation and Communications Minister Gordon Carton to the construction of a four lane highway to run along the Spadina Expressway route in Toronto. In granting approval, Carton stressed that the highway is to be only a temporary measure until a more permanent solution is found.

OTTAWA — Canada's Postal employees are technically able to legaily go on strike after a 33 day waiting period as of Tuesday. Among the complications that could ensue is the fact that a newly elected house of Commons would not be allowed to sit. Each newly elected member is required to submit a writ by registered mail to J. H. Hammel the Chief Electoral Officer before he can sit. However, Mr. Hamel stated that in the event of a postal strike, he will personally fly to the members to collect the writs.

TORONTO — The 1971 budget has been officially tabulated and Queen's Park has announced that the budgetary deficit was $103 million higher than expected. On a revenue of $4,703,813,000 expenditures totalled $5,223,004,000. The large deficit was blamed on increased spending on winter works projects, capital projects and higher family assistance.

Staff association may be formed but CUPE wants a union

The non-academic staff at Queen's may form a staff association or union soon according to Evelyn Flint, a secretary in the office of the Secretary.

All other groups on campus have some sort of association or union but the staff as yet has no central focal point.

A staff association would bring members of staff together to discuss common concerns. It would also provide an informal body to meet with university officials to discuss greivances.

The association would handle subjects of concern such as the system of job transfers and career planning as well as mundane items like the high cost of parking at Queen's, Mrs. Flint said.

A committee of non-academic staff members is in the process of setting up an association but at the same time the Canadian Union of Public Employees is attempting to organize clerical, technical and office employees. 500 out of an approximate total of 1000 members of the non-academic staff are eligible for this union.

"Many of those eligible for membership are concerned about the union coming in," Mrs. Flint said. "They don't wish to be forced out on strike when the local CUPE union does."

Some are also concerned with the fee structure which demands that $2 of each members dues be sent to national headquarters.

CUPE must get support from 35 per cent of the clerical, technical and office employees before they can apply to the Labour Relations Board for certification as the official bargaining agent for this group. A vote is then held to determine whether those concerned actually want the union. But if CUPE is able to get 65 per cent of their prospective members to sign up, certification is granted without a vote.

Members of the committee hoping to set up a staff association have not yet decided whether or not to apply to the Labour Relations Board for certification. "But we can become a bargaining agent as an informal body," Mrs. Flint commented.

The advantage of a staff association Mrs. Flint said is that "each individual has the right to belong or not to belong."

Certain groups at Queen's have expressed opposition to both a union and an association. Mrs. W. Bernabei, a computer systems analyst told the Journal that "many of us in computing science object to unions of all kinds because of the specialized work that we are involved in."

"Unions are traditionally associated with seniority and job descriptions. As a result, you are not as free to diversify. Our whole business is change, we cannot conform to rigid job descriptions," she said.

Plans for new campus centre

A preliminary report of the University Centre User's Committee gives the first concrete idea of what the new university centre is likely to contain if a representative committee gets its way and doesn't change its mind before the building is started two or three years from now.

The report is being circulated among all student clubs this month.

Dan Norman, chairman of the committee told the Journal that "we are asking people to send their criticisms of the report to us before October 15."

Meetings will be held late in October to discuss specific concerns.

The highlights, of the centre are a bookstore, food services including a "buffeteria" and pub, outside terraces, a bank, a drugstore, billiards and table tennis, offices including the Alumni Association, and lots of lounges, informal areas, and "crush space".

Left out, on the other hand: the health service, the counselling service and other inhabitants of 165 University, the housing service, the padre (he "does not wish to re-locate"), a big area for pub dances, and the development-information-public-relations complex of offices.

The site of the building is defined; to nobody's surprise, it is the block west of the Union and north of Dunning Hall, running up to Earl Street and west to Alfred. But there is no discussion of when building might start or end.

Other matters, discussed at length in earlier planning reports, are ignored as well: parking is one, and another is the housing tower which, it was suggested earlier, could be attached to the centre. But these omissions reflect the direction of the committee which wrote the present report -- the univeristy centre users' committee, chaired by Dr. R. D. Norman of the math department.

Leading student representative on the body, and one of the sparkplugs in planning the new university centre, is Sue Dowler of Artsci 74.

Tension continues, though it is reflected only slightly in the report, over the advantages of building a major university centre building when the future enrollment and orientation of the university is uncertain. Some participants have strongly favoured decentralization, which the draft report does mention as "essential" in terms of "subcentres" around campus. Others have simply suggested that the university wait and see. But the planning committee's report, now presented for comment from

Instalment fee axed

The Board of Trustees has announced that it will waive the $5 instalment fee usually leveled at students who pay their fees in two instalments. This move was made last Friday upon the request of the AMS.

It provides added incentive to students to pay their fees in instalments so that they are able to participate in a fee strike if it is called in January.

The possibility of a strike will depend upon the outcome of a referendum to be held across Ontario on October 11 and 12.

This is all part of the campaign to protest increased student fees and decreased student award grants which were announced in the provincial budget on March 28.

Bus projects

The Kingston Public Utilities Commission has agreed to a request from the AMS to provide free admission to Queen's students on all bus routes throughout Kingston for October 2 to 28.

Admission to buses will be gained by showing the green student ID card issued to all full time students.

The AMS is also planning to run a pilot bus project to Toronto and Ottawa. A round trip ticket to Ottawa will cost $6 and to Toronto it will be $9 return.

This project is designed to provide students with the "best and most economical travel arrangements possible.

The Voyageur Colonial buses will be departing from Ellis Hall at 3 pm Sunday evenings. Tickets will be available Monday to Thursday in the AMS office.

The Toronto drop off will be on Edward Street west of Elizabeth Street, near the Grey Coach Terminal. Pick up will be on Haytor Street between Bay and Yonge Streets. In Ottawa the bus will be running to and from the Voyageur Colonial Terminal.

A charter bus service to and from township areas to the west of Kingston has also been planned by R. Tinline and R. Hough of the Queen's geography department.

This move came as a result of a study done by Tinline and Hough last year which showed that there is a real need for such a service in this area.

The plan is to charter a 48-seat travelways bus to drive from Amherstview to Kingston and back daily, starting on October 2 at a charge of $17 a month. For details contact Mr. Tinline at the geography department.

New Chaplain

Rev. Eric Howes has been appointed the new Anglican chaplain for Queen's University. Rt. Rev. J. B. Creegan, Bishop of the Diocese of Ontario announced the appointment last spring.

Howes, who received his Bachelor of Divinity degree from Waterloo Lutheran last year, is also to act as part time assistant at St. James Anglican Church in addition to being Anglican Chaplain to the students, faculty and staff of Queen's University.

In commenting on the appointment Howes stated, that although he has been appointed Anglican Chaplain he wishes his work not to be limited only to members of the Anglican Community. "My services are available to all who might need them", he said.

Mr. Howes' office is located in the St. James Church Hall at 10 Union St., the corner of Union and [illegible]

All students registered in each course in each member Department of the Faculty of Arts and Science, or in each section of a course when a course is sectioned, are entitled to elect in a regular class session within the first two weeks of the beginning of classes, one student as Class Representative. The Class Representatives in each department will together constitute the Departmental Student Council (DSC) for that department. Membership in a DSC is not limited to students registered in the Faculty of Arts and Science. If an unsectioned course has more than 100 students, additional Class Representatives may be elected, one for every 100 students or fraction thereof.

Each Departmental Student Council will elect before October 6 one representative to the Arts and Science Faculty Board and forward the name of the elected member to the Secretary of the Faculty. The Nominating Committee of the Faculty at its meeting on October 6 will nominate student members of the Board to fill positions on the Admissions, Curriculum, Orientation, Nominating and Procedures Committees of the Faculty.

Queen's campaigns for United Fund

October is United Fund month and the Queen's quota has been set at $50,500, a thirteen percent increase over last year.

According to Queen's division co-chairman G.J.H. Wattsford the size of the quotas depend on the size of faculty and staff, the percentage who gave to the fund last year and the fact that "we have always carried our fair share". Some divisions experienced as much as a fifty percent increase Wattsford stated.

During October, sixty-one volunteers will be canvassing the faculty and staff of Queen's. Last year the Queen's campaign fell short due to the fact that only 25 percent of the staff contributed.

The student drive will start Friday, September 22 when all profits from the afternoon operation of the Pub will be donated to the Fund.

On Friday night the AMS will sponsor a dance in Grant Hall. The following day United Fund volunteers will be selling noisemakers at the Queen's-Ottawa football game.

Another student project is the paper drive being organized by Pollution Probe. Old newspapers will be picked up by students from homes around Kingston. Help from all is requested for this project which will take place in late October.

Moore leaves Queen's

Director of Public Relations, Larry T. Moore is leaving Kingston at the end of the month to take up the position of Director of University Relations and Information at the University of Western Ontario.

Moore graduated from Queen's in 1965 with a B.A. in English and Politics after which he was appointed assistant director of the university's information service. In 1967 he was appointed to the position of director of Public Relations.

A Western he will be succeeding Cameron Macdonald, who is leaving the public relations office to join the private staff of Premier William Davis.

Moore explained that his position at Western will entail a much greater challenge. There will be elements of his job here but the new position also comprises a number of other areas.

Dr. D. C. Williams, Principal of the University of Western Ontario and President of the Council of Ontario Universities has appointed Moore as press liaison officer for COU.

Moore considers this to be an extremely important responsibility, stating that "in a time when the university is becoming increasingly publicly financed, the public has a right to the information passed in such governing bodies."

Moore stated that many factors at Western make for an easier job of communicating with the community. The community is represented on the Board of Governors at Western. Moore felt that mutual problems could be worked out more effectively in such a forum.

"Western has recognized the need for a public relations department", he stated, mentioning the larger number of staff there and the fact that their operating budget is three times greater than Queen's.

Moore's new duties will also include being on the President's Advisory Committee. "A public relations Officer must be a part of the decision making process", he stated and pointed out that he felt he could not perform at his best here for that reason.

Moore has run three times for Public office. He ran in 1959 for the CCF in the provincial election, in 1960 for city council and in 1963 for the Federal NDP. However he missed election in each case.

Corkin dismissed from Heffalump

Jane Corkin, Manager of the AMS owned Tumbleweed Craft Shop was dismissed from her position last week. She had held the post since the shop's opening over a year ago.

The craft shop was originally called Heffalump but the AMS was forced to change the name this past summer due to problems with the copyright of that name.

Tumbleweed will remain open until further evaluation can be made by the AMS as to its future. In the interim David Morel and Holly Clarke are managing the shop located on Princess Street.

the university community, concentrates on one major building and the facilities it might contain.

Under "Services", the report lists an information desk, a ticket office (to be coordinated with the division of concerts), the bookstore, the career planning and placement service, an office for clergymen (other than the university chaplain), and the AMS printing, typing and duplicating services.

Food services are also discussed -- the "main food service" with a capacity of 700 to 800 people in "a number of interconnecting rooms" capable of housing the pub, Bitter Grounds coffee house, a coffee shop and so on; meeting rooms with food service; the "buffeteria" during rush periods; outside terraces suitable for use as sidewalk cafes; and something the present Union lacks, vending machines as appropriate.

Although the present Student Health Service accomodations are unsatisfactory, the committee does not deem it necessary to place this organization in the University Centre. With the development of the Medical Complex, one of the existing medical buildings could be designated for this purpose.

The report also says that it does not seem useful to relocate the student affairs offices in the new complex. We prefer to think of the house, located near the union as part of the Univeristy Centre. Relocation in the University Centre did not meet with much enthusiasm anyway.

Commercial services in the centre should include a bank ("high priority") and a drugstore, the report declares. Other recommendations are for a dry cleaning service and laundromat, a barber shop -- possibly replacing the Campus Barber Shop on Alfred Street, which will be displaced when the building goes up -- and a sports shop. One "not recommended for inclusion" is a boutique and gift shop -- because, the report says, it would conflict with the full operation of a comprehensive bookstore and drugstore as suggested earlier.

Recreational facilities, the report says, should include billiards (twelve tables), table tennis, and games area of 1000 square feet "to be integrated with lounge areas" for quiet games. Expense rules out a bowling alley, the report continues, and curling is also expensive, although "it might be desirable to investiagte the possibility of purchasing the Kingston Curling Club premises on Clergy Street". A sauna bath, which has been suggested, would be more suitable in the phys ed centre when it is next renovated, the report says.

Lounge areas are discussed at some length: "The concept of small, open lounges along corridors is strongly favoured. These areas would be natural conversation spots." Music listening rooms, reading rooms, a small television lounge and other specialized lounges are listed as possibilities.

Finally, the report discusses organizations: clubs need mailboxes, filing space and occasional meeting rooms, it says, but the major groups needing permanent office are the AMS (student government) and its adjuncts, including The Queen's Journal; the faculty association; the international centre, which presently has "poorly designed" and inaccessible space; and the alumni association.

(The Journal has learned that some committee members dissent strongly from the idea of putting the Alumni Association's offices in the centre, since most of their operation is a filing and mailroom business far removed from student-faculty activity. However, the $1 million alumni investment in the building apparently is a strong argument.)

A brief paragraph dismisses the need of the public relations department or the vice-principal (development and information) to be in a university centre.

At the end of the report, re-emphasis is placed on sub-centres, notably the recreational areas of the arts-social sciences complex, and possibly a redesigned Ontario Hall for fine arts departments.

It also emphasizes that much of the square footage involved in the project -- hence, some of the facilities listed -- may be in the present Students' Memorial Union after suitable renovations, not in a new building across the street. And, as a final note, "we wish to see some thought given to locating other functions (for which an informal setting is useful) in houses on the proposed site."

FEES: ARE YOU WILLING TO PAY?

With the announcement of the one hundred dollar fee increase by the Ontario Provincial Government in March of 1972, the whole question of the financing of post secondary education institutions was raised. Thus far, the Provincial Government itself has done a poor job of keeping the public as a whole, and the student population in particular, informed about this system of financing.

The purpose of this article is to explore the background of the current debate. Immediate reaction to such an attempt might, understandably, be one of alienation -- a feeling of distance from the abstract economics of the matter. However, when this reaction is reconsidered, it can easily be seen that every student is caught in the middle. After all, it is each student who has to make up the hundred dollars extra to attend classes this year.

Does the Provincial Government have the legal right to call for such a drastic increase in fees? Why has such an increase been deemed necessary? To ask such questions demands the asking more basic questions: Where does the Ontario Provincial Government get the money it uses in the post secondary educational sector? How much is alloted to education? How do the post secondary educational institutions receive financial aid and how is the amount each institution receives determined?

These charts and explanation, along with articles to follow, bear on the whole subject of post secondary educational financing. The immediate value of an understanding of these finances is obvious - a clearer picture of the implications of the $100 fee raise. The information contained in these articles however, has a wider significance for the individual student, for the area of student loans and other assistance as well as other basic issues, will be covered in detail.

Each student in the near future, will be called upon to decide whether any action opposing the recent government move should be taken. It is the aim of this article to place at the convenience of each student the information necessary if the student is to make a rational decision. If action is to be taken, the reason is equally as important as the action itself. No one will act if dissent without knowing why or simply because certain student groups advise such action. Individual students make the decisions, the goal of these articles is simply to make this task as easy as possible.

A glossary of terms on the financing of post secondary education

To provide the above charts without an explanation of what all the initials, acts etc. mean would be (in the words of A. Broadbent-Rector of Queen's) as satisfying as a bowl of puffed wheat. It is with this in mind that we provide the following glossary. The explanations presented are brief (further articles will delve with each in more detail) and in order that the reader obtain maximum data from these explanations it is advised that he use them in connection with the provided charts. In brackets () following the name of each act will be between who the transfer takes place, the former being the provider, the latter the receipient.

If more detailed information on any of the following is desired prior to the publication of future articles, it may be obtained by contacting the AMS External Affairs Commissioner.

FEDERAL PROVINCIAL TRANSFERS ACT OF 1967 sp. Part 2 (Fed. Gov't-Prov. Gov't) re: The Financing of Post Secondary Education in each Province

The B.N.A. Act places education under the provincial domain. - It did not however, exclude the Federal Government from participation in the financing of education.

In 1967, after research performed for the Federal Authorities into the costs of post secondary education and other associated factors, the second part of the Fiscal Transfers Act came into being. By this Act it was agreed that the Federal Gov't would transfer to the provinces 50 per cent of the operating costs of post secondary education in that province or, $15 per hundred people living in the province between the ages of 18-24; whichever was greater.

Ontario opted for the 50 per cent of operating costs formula and via this scheme in 1971 received 335 million dollars (38.5 per cent of the total nationally)

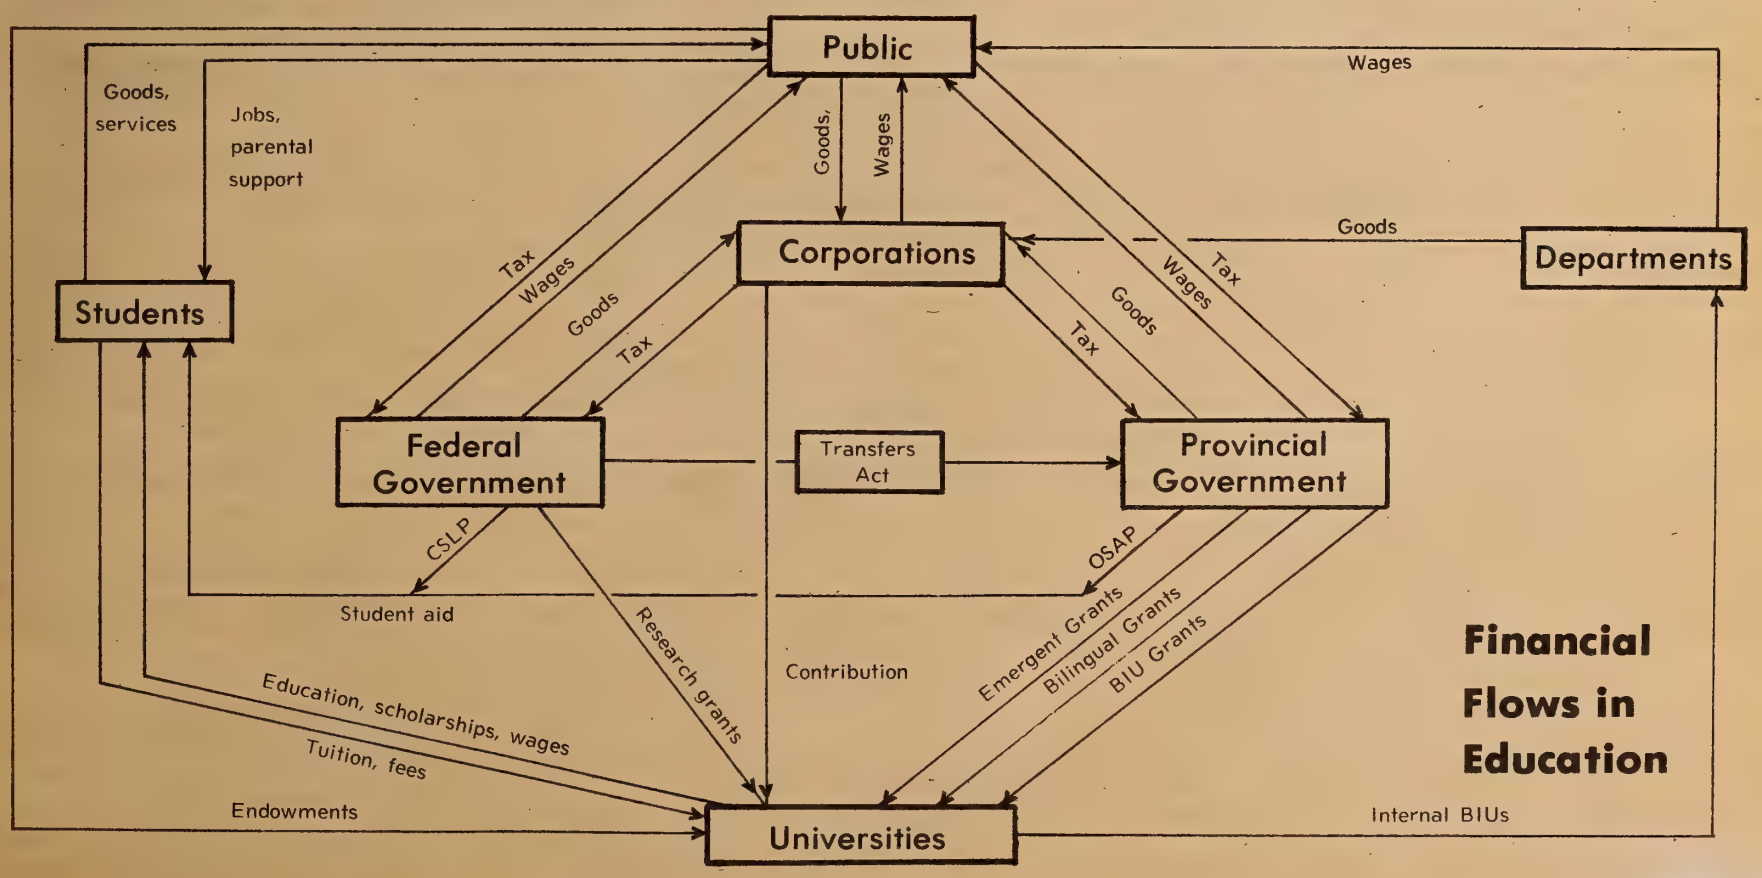
Yet, as aforementioned, despite this massive contribution towards the financing of post secondary education, the Federal Government was not permitted the right of intervention in how the provinces administer these funds. In fact, theoretically the provinces may at their descretion even reallocate these funds into departments other than education if it so desires. As was stated before, legally the provinces are free to use these funds as they wish.

This act was to come up for review this year but by an Act of Parliament was extended for two more years with a maximum of 15 per cent set as a ceiling for increments to the provinces yearly.

BIU-BASIC INCOME UNIT (Prov. Gov't - Institutions)

This was a formula devised by the CUA - a member of which at the time of its creation was Douglas T. Wright (chairman of the Wright Commission and Deputy Minister for Social Development in Ontario)-and is used to determine the amount which each institution will receive as an operating grant from the Provincial Government. Perhaps Mr. Wright explains it best . . . "About 8 categories of students are defined and weights range from unity, in the case of a liberal arts college to 6 for a Ph.-D. student. The formula grant for any institution is found simply by summing the weighted enrollment, multiplying this figure by the basic grant, and subtracting fee (tuition) fee income. The only thing which changes from year to year is the basic grant"

Mathematically this is simply;



(total No. pts at the institution) X (basic grant) - (fee income) - formula grant

EMERGENCY STATUS GRANTS (Prov. Gov't-Institutions)

This is a grant given to institutions deemed "emergent" by provincial authorities. To the best of our knowledge they are given to institutions with less than 4000 BIU points. They are rare, the most known institution receiving a E.S. grant is Laurentienne U.

BILINGUAL OPERATIONS GRANT (Prov. Gov't Institutions)

This is a provincial grant given to institutions which carry on bilingual administration and operations. As with emergent status grants, they are a rarity, the best known institutions receiving these are Laurentienne and the University of Ottawa.

OSAP-ONTARIO STUDENT AWARDS PROGRAM (Prov. and Fed. Gov't to Students)

Basically this is a method of student assistance used to supplement student resources in providing funds for a "needy" student to attend a post secondary institution. The amount of award to be given a student rests on two broad factors which can then be broken down into smaller parts. Briefly they are;

1) Educational Costs
a) Tuition and Fees
b) Book and Instrument Allowance
c) Room and Board
d) Misc. Expense (laundry, cigarrettes etc.)
e) 1 trip home per year (if non resident) at most economical rates
f) in some cases, a "commuting subsidy"

2) Student Resources
a) Parental Contribution (if dependant or Class A)
b) Assumed Summer Savings
c) Scholarships (over $150)
d) Other Awards and Burseries
e) Other Resources (eg. car, or access to a car)

By subtracting from your Educational Costs (1) your Student Resources (2) the amount of award a student is eligible for is determined; the first $800 of which is loan via the CSLP, the remainder in grant form.

Eligiblity requires 12 months residence in the province prior to registration. Should you be 24 years of age or married, you are considered an Independant Student (Class B) and parental contribution is not included in your Student Resources. If you have successfully completed four years at a post secondary institute or have been working for four years, or any continuous combination of the two, you are con-sidered a TYPE A MODIFIED STUDENT and thus 6000 subtracted from your parents index number on the parental contribution chart.

You also qualify for Independant Status if in previous years you met the requirements. This is especially important in the light of the changing requirements for Group B status.

The major issues here are the raising of the loan ceiling from $600 last year to $800 this year, and the requirements for Group B Status.

CSLP-CANADA STUDENT LOANS PLAN (Fed. Gov't through Prov. Authorities - Students)

This was to quote the actual act, "An Act to facilitate the making of loans to students" Its goal is accomplished via the Guaranteed Loans Scheme, which enables a student to secure a loan guaranteed by the Federal Government from a certified monetary association (persuent to sec. 2 CSL Act Revised Statutes 1970) This loan is interest free, and becomes repayable with interest on the first day of the seventh month following your termination of studies. Interest on the loan starts to accumulate only after termination of studies (until then the Federal Government pays the interest), and its rate determined in proportion with the interest rate on gov't bonds. Repayment varies with whom you arrange your loan with, but the loan must be repayed within ten years of termination of your studies. The default rate of loans in the past has been low, to our knowledge last year it was only 4 per cent. The Eligibility for and Administration of the CSLP varies from province to province with the Ontario method being the same as with OSAP (the two are used together in OSAP)

The major issues here are the Independant Status, Provincial Variences in Administration of the Plan, the parental contribution table, and Assumed Summer Savings. More detail will be given on this in future articles, as the AMS is presently endeavouring a nationwide poll-study of the plan, centering on student recommendations and criticisms of the plan

INTERNAL BIU (Institution-Departments of Study)

This goes under many alias (dept. operating grants etc.) This is similar to the BIU except there is no set formula that carries province wide. The internal distribution of funds to the different departments is left to the autonomy of the individual institution's administration.

Major issues here are the public accountability, etc. Actually up to now never really a great deal of discussion has arisen on this sector of the financing scheme, although the Wright Commission states rather emphatically that certain economies etc. in the operating of institutions should be used.

The following presentation is the first in a series of articles dealing with the general field of the financing of post-secondary education. This first presentation concerns itself specifically with the tuition fee increase announced by the Ontario Provincial Government in the spring of this year.

Because this article takes a dramatic form, many of the views expressed are based on speculation. The part the Ontario Provincial Government takes in this play is not intended to coincide exactly with the government's actual sentiments. Evaluating the government's reasoning on this issue has been a difficult task, simply because it has never been made public -- thus, the need for speculation. The inaccuracy of the authors' speculation is directly proportional to the degree to which the government itself has failed to make its rationale clear. Any correction of the possibly inaccurate explanations attributed to the government by the authors can only be made by the government itself with publically announced explanations.

The views expressed by the presecuting attourney are the personal views held solely by the authors of the article. These views and opinions are based on all the available information pertaining to this issue. If further relevant information is made available fy the government, perhaps these personal views will have to be revised.

SETTING: The scene is a courtroom as could be found anywhere. There exists, at the time of this case, a high rate of unemployment, while the cost of living has risen 30 per cent in the previous decade. Economic theory (Phillips Curve) suggests a necessary tradeoff between unemployment and inflation, the theor being that as your economy tends towards full employment, prices rise.

The government's educational expenditure is a sizable part of the budget, yet the public remains discontented with the educational system. They have seen that the age old myth of a college degree guaranteeing a job no longer holds true, and feels that, for the most part, students are not pulling their own weight as far as educational costs are concerned.

The case is entitled: Students vs. The Ontario Provincial Government, which is charged with the offence of using the students as a scapegoat for the province's economic difficulties.

CHARACTERS:
Prosecuting Attorney
Defence Attorney
Judge
Defendant, The Government of Ontario

JUDGE: Is the attorney for the defence ready to make his opening statement?

DEFENCE: Yes, your honor . . . .In the eyes of the defence, the problem at hand is the question of whether the defendant, the Government of Ontario, is justified in making its recent move to raise tuition fees this academic year. This fee increase should be considered as the inevitable result of the infla tionary pressures which have built up in this country over the last decade. However, this government move has not been received in this way. On the contrary, it is seen as as an attack by the government on the student population.

In the last decade, the cost of living has risen over 30 per cent nationally, while this fee increase means only a 20 per cent rise in tuition over the same period of time. Thus, it can be seen that this fee increase does not place the rise in educational costs on a par with the rise in the Consumer Price Index.

The students attack the government's decision to raise fees, however they neglect to point out that it has, at the same time, made Student Aid available to more students by easing the restrictions to qualify for Independent or modified Class "A" status.

In addition to these basic economic causes for the fee increase, the public, which the Ontario Provincial Government represents, is, quite frankly, fed up with such large educational expenditures. They feel that the students, themselves, are getting a free ride on public money.

Both the economic pressures and the government's responsibility to legislate the public's wishes work together to force such a decision. The move is not an attack on the students, but the only practical action which can be taken at this time.

JUDGE: Is the prosecuting attorney ready to make his opening statement?

PROSECUTOR: Yes, your honor. . .We have attempted to place ourselves in the government's position, to try to discover any basis for their somewhat drastic action. We realize the implications of a 30 per cent increase cost of living, and agree that as the cost of every commodity has risen, so also must the cost of edu rise. We also see that the government cannot be ex to pay this difference if the public is not behind the evidence, however, will hopefully be brought to l the course of this case which will define, beyo shadow of a doubt, our differences in opinion w government's.

The course our case will take will be an explorativ The most obvious question in our minds at this t why? Not why the inflationary pressures – the ec depends on too many variables to pinpoint weak and deficiencies. The question is: why the governm attitutde that students are getting off so easily? Th of resoning, followed to its limit, would mean a min raise of $150 to put the educational costs on a par wi 30 per cent increase in the cost of living. Why is t increase actually only a half-measure on the part government?

Why is the student in the precarious position whe alone, is expected to bear the greatest weight of suc per cent increase in the cost of living? Why has the opinion of higher education deteriorated to the where it sees education only in terms of personal g the education student, father than in the more far-re implication of an educated nation?

Finally, and most importantly, is the question of h government can, in proper conscience, take needed by an ever-growing student population and, charge specifies, rechannel it into the Provincial power Operations?

It is our hope, in the following case, to ask questions, as indeed they will continue to be asked answers are given – answers which may necessitat opening to the public of certain doors the govern should have already opened.

The Prosecutor calls the Government of Ontario stand.

PROSECUTOR: In March of 1972, was a decision m increase government expenditure on methods to unemployment in the province?

GOVERNMENT: Yes, the growing rate of unempl made such a move necessary.

PROSECUTOR: Was a decision also made to red provincial taxes on corporations?

GOVERNMENT: Yes.

PROSECTURO: Was it also decided that the expe on post-secondary education should be reduced?

GOVERNMENT: Yes, that is correct.

PROSECUTOR: In the year 1971, approximately how money did the Ontario Government receive fr federal government under the arrangements of p of the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements 1967?

GOVERNMENT: I believe the figure for 1971 w proximately $335 million dollars.

PROSECUTOR: Was this figure of $335 million equa 50 per cent of the operating costs of the post-sec educational institutions in this province?

GOVERNMENT: Yes, this is the method by whi figure was arrived at. The provinces in Canada ca funds from the national government for education either on 50 per cent of the operating costs of th secondary institutions in the province, or on the b $15 per capita of the population between the ages of 24, whichever figure is greater. Ontario decided first scheme.

PROSECUTOR: Under the arrangements of the North America Act, is it possible to direct the received via the Fiscal Arrangements Act into channels?

GOVERNMENT: Yes, the distribution of the money to the discretion of the provincial government.

PROSECUTOR: How, then, is this money distribute post-secondary institutions, themselves?

GOVERNMENT: The formula grant for each instit arrived at under a method called the Basic Incom

s A Lot Of Bucks

PROSECUTOR: Could you please give a brief mathematical explanation of how the formula grant is arrived at under the Basic Income Unit scheme?

GOVERNMENT: Certainly. Each student, depending on his faculty and year is assigned a weight measured in points ranging on a scale from one point to six points. By adding the number of points which the student population of an institution totals, and multiplying this total by the basic grant per point and then subtracting from this figure the tuition fee income of the institution, we arrive at the formula grant for that institution.

PROSECUTOR: If the fee income to the universities were to increase by any amount, would this infer a reduction in the allocation made to each institution, presuming enrollment remained the same?

GOVERNMENT: No, not necessarily. Under the Basic Income Unit scheme, the basic grant per point is allowed to chan ge, and indeed it has. For the academic year 1972-73, the basic grant has been set at $1825, while in the previous year 1971-72, the basic grant was $1765, which is an increase this year of 3.4 per cent or $60 per point over last year.

PROSECUTOR: Could we therefore assume that any increase in the fee income over and above $60 per point would reduce the formula grant for the institution from the Provincial Government?

GOVERNMENT: Possibly. However, this conclusion might or might not hold true depending on the number of undergraduates attending the institution, as the $60 increase in the basic grant is on a per point basis, and most undergraduates fall within the 1-1.5 range of points.

PROSECUTOR: If enrollment were to remain at a constant level, would a $100 fee increase for undergraduate students not lowere the formula grant to each institution since, as you pointed out, the 1-1.5 points awarded to these undergraduates, when multiplied by the $60 per point increase amounts to between $60 and $90?

GOVERNMENT: Now necessarily. As I mentioned before, a Ph. D. student receives a weight of 6 points, which, when multiplied by the basic grant increase amounts to $360.

PROSECUTOR: To restate the situation, then . . . please interrupt me if I'm wrong: The government has raised its expenditure for the undergraduate level anywhere from 3.4 per cent to 5.1 per cent over last year, depending on the number of points awarded. The students themselves, on the other hand, have seen an increase of nearly 20 per cent over last year. The government has also raised its expenditure to the graduate level, up to a maximum of 20.4 per cent for a student awarded a weight of 6 points, whereas this tudent, working towards a Ph. D. has met with an increase more in the 80 per cent range over the last year. Thus, we can see that the range of the increase in government expenditure in the last year is anywhere from 3.4 per cent - 20.4 per cent, whereas the range in the increase for the student population is anywhere from 20 per cent - 80 per cent over last year. Is this correct?

GOVERNMENT: Well, yes.

PROSECUTOR: You stated before that a Ph.D. student would be getting $360 more this year than last year because of the raise in the basic grant. Is this correct?

GOVERNMENT: Yes.

PROSECUTOR: The graduate student level also met with a rather sizable increase in fees this year also, did they not?

GOVERNMENT: Yes, they did.

PROSECUTOR: What would be your estimate of the average fee increase for these graduate students?

GOVERNMENT: Roughly $400.

PROSECUTOR: Isn't it true that the government's most generous increase in the basic grant of 3.4 per cent is, in most cases, totally paid for by the student, himself, when the increase in fee income is subtracted from the product of the number of points multiplied by the basic grant. And isn't it also true that, if anything, the government is making money on this scheme?

GOVERNMENT: This could be true in some cases, but the pressures from the public to cut back on educational expenditures makes an increase in the educational budget impossible at this time.

PROSECUTION: The prosecution rests, asking the court's permission to recall the witness at a future time.

JUDGE: Permission granted. Council for the Defence, your witness.

DEFENSE: No questions, your honor.

ACT 2

PROSECUTOR: The prosecution wishes to recall the Government of Ontario to the stand.
(Government of Ontario returns to the stand).

PROSECUTOR: It is my understanding that at the present moment, you are attempting to fight unemployment and inflation at the same time. Is this correct?

GOVERNMENT: Yes, in our opinion, such a move is in the best interests of the public we represent.

PRESECUTOR: Does this action imply any reallocation of your budgetary finances?

GOVERNMENT: Yes, In our budget, you will notice an increase in the expenditure in areas which provide employment, such as our highways program.

PROSECUTOR: Is it not true that economic theory dictates that moves such as this towards full employment calls for the public to pay higher prices?

GOVERNMENT: You are referring of course, to the Phillip's Curve which, in theory, holds true. However, by reducing corporate taxes, we hope to keep prices down and with this increase in employment, with prices remaining relatively constant, improve the economic situation which will, in turn, provide jobs in the future for students such as yourself.

PROSECUTOR: Could it then be concluded that the government's decreased expenditure in the area of post-secondary education has been reallocated in an effort to ensure employment in future years and cure the provinces present economic ills?

DEFENSE: Objection, your honor. The prosecutor is asking the witness to draw a conclusion.

JUDGE: Objection sustained. The jury will disregard the prosecution's last statement.

PROSECUTOR: I apologize, your honor. Allow me to change my line of questioning. The defense stated, in its opening address that, in the light of certain changes in eligibility requirements enabling easier accessibility to student assistance, students have, in a sense, been spared the impact of a full $100 fee increase. Is this correct?

GOVERNMENT: Yes. The student who would feel the greatest pressure from this increase, is, in fact, in a better position to draw funds from the government's loans and grants.

PROSECUTOR: Could you briefly outline this student's assistance plan?

GOVERNMENT: Certainly. It is our policy each year to arrive at a figure which the average student would be expected to meet for his educational costs for one year. We then deduct from this total, the resources the student is expected to have available to him from such sources as a summer job and parental contributions. The difference between these two figures is, then, the amount of award the student is eligible to receive, the first $800 of which is in loan form, and anything over and above, in grant form.

PROSECUTOR: Am I correct in assuming that the $100 fee increase called for by the government is to be added to the educational costs of the student?

GOVERNMENT: Yes, so as you can see, this greater accessibility to our student aid program will, indeed, act as a buffer on the effects of the fee increase for those students who would be hit hardest by the increase.

PROSECUTOR: Have there been any other changes besides those regarding eligibility?

GOVERNMENT: Yes. Previously, the first $600 was in the form of a loan, with the remainder available as a grant, whereas this year, the first $800 is loan.

PROSECUTOR: In other words, the student is required to pay back $200 more of the assistance he receives this year than in former years.

GOVERNMENT: Yes. That is true, however, this change was necessary because such assistance is available to a greater number of students.

PROSECUTOR: Has your government ever totally depleted the amount which the federal government has agreed to guarantee for the loans portion of your program.

GOVERNMENT: Not to my knowledge.

PROSECUTION: The prosecution rests its case.

JUDGE: Defence, your witness.

DEFENSE: No questions, your honor.

JUDGE: The court will recess in order to allow time for the attorneys to prepare their final statements.

ACT 3

JUDGE: Have the attorneys prepared their final summations?

ATTORNEYS: (together) Yes, your honor.

JUDGE: I now call upon the defence attorney to give his concluding statement.

DEFENCE: We have allowed this farce to continue without interruption so that the public and the press could witness the unfounded allegations of the prosecution. After all, any organization which would endanger the academic future of its members by supporting a fee strike cannot possibly have the best interests of the student population at heart. I must state at this time that I am totally unaware of the origins of the prosecution's allegations. However, I rest assured that those who have witnessed these proceedings will come to the conclusion that the government does, indeed, have the best interests of the public at heart, and to claim otherwise is merely an unfounded attack by a group of young radicals.

JUDGE: Is the prosecution ready to present its final summation?

PROSECUTOR: Yes, your honor. The statement by the government just a few seconds ago which charged us with fully supporting the planned fee strike is indicative of the faulty general view that if one group of students recommends a certain plan of action, automatically they have the support of all students. Students are, first and foremost, individuals. A decision on whether or not to support this proposed fee strike is an individual decision. In our opinion, a proper decision cannot be made until the principles upon which the government has based its decisions, are made public.
The government has also charged us with unfounded allegations. The foundation of any allegation should be based on fact, as our allegations are, to a point. It is our opinion that these allegations would find even more foundation if the government's logic was made clear. At least then, the public would have an easier task, for there would exist two clearly defined sets of proposals on this issue.

CURTAIN

Author's Note

You will notice that in the final summation of the play, the prosecuting attorney does not ask the jury for a definate verdict of guilty. We did not have him do so because, unlike some people in some places. we could not ask for nor make a decision with first understanding fully the affected party's situation.

Furthermore, we did not ask for a verdict of guilty because that was not the intention of the article. As stated, it was first and foremost an exploratory piece. We were not and are not out to convict the government of any crime. Rather, we desire only to know why - in short communicate. Communication can and should remain open at all times, and should not be broken by a decision (such as asking for a "guilty" verdict) convicting an action.

This is one point we hope the government will bear in mind before initiating further action - we certainly shall.

by Richard Osler

It had past the midnight hour and Needham, enveloped in a big armchair was still piping up and interrupting the conversation in his typically dogmatic but engaging way. Between his moments of reading, drinking, and discussing women his friends had been trying to convince him all evening that he was not as hard boiled as he wished us to believe but he just smiled. He had boasted earlier with due pride that he had walls eight feet thick and as such he was strangely untouchable. Surrounded by a benign pompousness he had no scruples about discussing his personal life simply because he seemed so undetached and unconcerned about it all. His lack of emotion seemed a mark of pride and complemented his statement "like, not love.

Love and marriage are to him curses that stunt one because to him deep emotional involvement is a vast web of chains that are in most cases deeply destructive. Be it with mother, father, sister or wife he regards involved relationships as a threat to freedom and individual growth which is not suprising in view of his statement that the one value he puts before all others is his personal freedom. He sees all human relationships as expendable and replacable. Needham sees men and women as owing nothing to each other and believes we should mean 'to let be or set free.' Perhaps this reflects his dissatisfaction at any situation which isn't black or white and easily controlled inferred when he says "successfully directing an empire is easier than successfully directing a love affair."

He has yet to find a substitute for marriage, an institution he detests and would abolish if he became Prime Minister. However, he finds the institution partially tenable if indulged in after the age of thirty and if the four S's, secrets, silences, separations and solitudes are upheld. With sinister glee he told a story to prove his point. He told of a spy apprehended in Russia and suitably punished for his sin. He and his mistress of whom he was extremely fond were bound face to face nude for a month. The spy at the punishment's end never spoke to his mistress again. As Needham chuckles insidiously 'it is better to be dead than wed.'

The major thread in his philosophy on life as evidenced at his discussion at Dunning is based on the fact that he regards life as reeling from one disaster to the next and simply being able to enjoy and appreciate it. He does not see life in terms of right or wrong decisions or mistakes. As long as any decisions are not fatal they form the skein which is life and in which there is no right or wrong way. As he said "if one is driving along and decides to turn right at an intersection and subsequently hits a truck, it is senseless to regard it as a wrong decision for if one had turned left perhaps a grizzly bear would have been there to devour you.

To be your own man or woman, to be constantly finding out who you are, to have a full belly, a set of clothes and to be enjoying what you are doing constitute his view of success. His ideal for human existence is to live and be happy on twenty-five dollars a week and to be able to do one thing in life really well. This philosophy of creating your own life is again evident in his statement to his three children in which he said, "You owe me nothing, get out in the world, find your own thing and stay out of jails." Needless to say he is proud of his uninvolvement with his children.

Needham on Canada and her various institutions is unecquivocal to the extreme and in typically indomitable fashion when asked about being a writer and feeling the pulse of Canada replied that 'there isn't a pulse in Canada.' In the same vein and just as unmitigated he stated that High Schools were the worst disaster area in Canada and whose main purpose was not to educate or broaden but to baby sit, keep kids off the labour market and off the streets. Universities are also for him just another chain in the hassling of young people and for the majority of students a place of brainwashing and stultification. Too many students to his mind never question why they are at university or what they truly want to do. Therefore for Needham, society made up of institutions such as the education system and marriage is a stygian region where the greatest problems are peoples lack of simple happinesss in life and inability to find fulfilling human relationships. Part of the problem he equates with Canadian's obsession with and worrying about the future which he considers a sublime futility.

As most discussions do nowdays Needham touched on Quebec and the problem of Canadian Nationalism. He said he wouldn't oppose Quebec seperation which he believes will occurr in four or five years and he would do nothing personally if the United States invaded Canada. He didn't think most Canadians would fight either but conceded that the Italians probably would.

Any hope of maintaining Canada's independence from our rapacious neighbour to the south was lost, according to Needham, during the historical events of the 1860's. At this time the Canadian government decided to make English their native language instead of French. To remain distinquishable from the Americans we should have had an original type of currency. His suggestion consisted of one peaso equaling one hockey puck, one hockey puck equaling one Royal Commission, etc.

Needham for all his pompousness, his defeatist, approach to Canada and his pat answers to everything is a unique speaker singularily lacking stock cliches and boring regularity. Whether or not one condemns or condones his outlook on life, he stands as a prime mover in Canadian journalism and stands as a man who lives strictly by what he professes. However facetious or strange sounding his ideas they all contain an element of thought provoking truth and establish him as one of Canada's most refreshing thinkers.

Richard Needham is a self-acclaimed 'Idioces' - a greek word meaning a private person who goes on his own way with basic disbelief in his society and its mores. Such original and provactive statements as - "I am a better man than Churchill, Rooseevelt or Stalin because I am alive and they are not" or "If I were Prime Minister I would hang any man who was not in the company of a woman," support his claim to uniqueness and originality adding new insights into the complex character or 'Idioces' which is Richard Needham.

Defense stars as Gaels dump Ravens 33-0

by Chris Boon

Queen's Golden Gaels started out on the trail to the 1972 College Bowl Sunday as they dominated the Carleton Ravens 33-0 before a crowd of 6000 in a windswept Lansdowne Park. The Gaels got a tremendous team effort on defense, leading Offensive captain Brian Warrender to comment after the game, "No one knocks the defense any more!"

The Gaels took a costly 1-0 lead in the early moments of the first quarter on a 47-yard single by Dave Campbell. Starting centre Tom Dickson suffered a knee injury while covering this punt, and will probably be lost for several weeks. Fortunately, his replacement, Rick Koski, took advantage of the opportunity to play the best game of his life.

Minutes later, with the Ravens pinned in their own end and a stiff wind at the Gaels' backs, tight end John Waddell recovered a fumbled punt on the Raven 26. Some power running by Dave Hadden and Geoff Hamlin put the ball on the Raven 7, and QB Tom Taylor pitched a scoring pass to Alex Melvin for the first Queen's major. Cozac added the convert and the Gaels led 8-0

The tempo of the game slowed considerably for the next few minutes, with Carleton being unable to move in the face of the Gaels' defense (and the wind) and the Gaels missing two field goal attempts. The first was blocked by a Carleton linebacker, while the second was inches wide and went for a single point 9-0.

The Ravens got the wind in the second quarter, but it didn't help much.

The Gaels' Joe Pal picked off the second pass attempted by Carleton, and while the Gaels collected only the single by Cozac, the turnover set the tune for the rest of the game.

The defense, led by middle guard Don Smith and tackle Dave Devonshire, threw the Ravens for repeated losses. Carleton didn't get a first down until the ten-minute mark of the second quarter. Devonshire set up the Gaels' second touchdown of the day when he recovered a fumble on the Raven's 3-yard line. Warrender quickly converted this into six points. The convert was blocked, and the score remained 15-0 at the half.

The Gaels' missed another golden scoring opportunity in the dying moments of the first half. Defensive halfback Alex 'Mercury' Morris picked off a pass by the Raven's Mike Ruddy and ran it back to the Carleton 11.

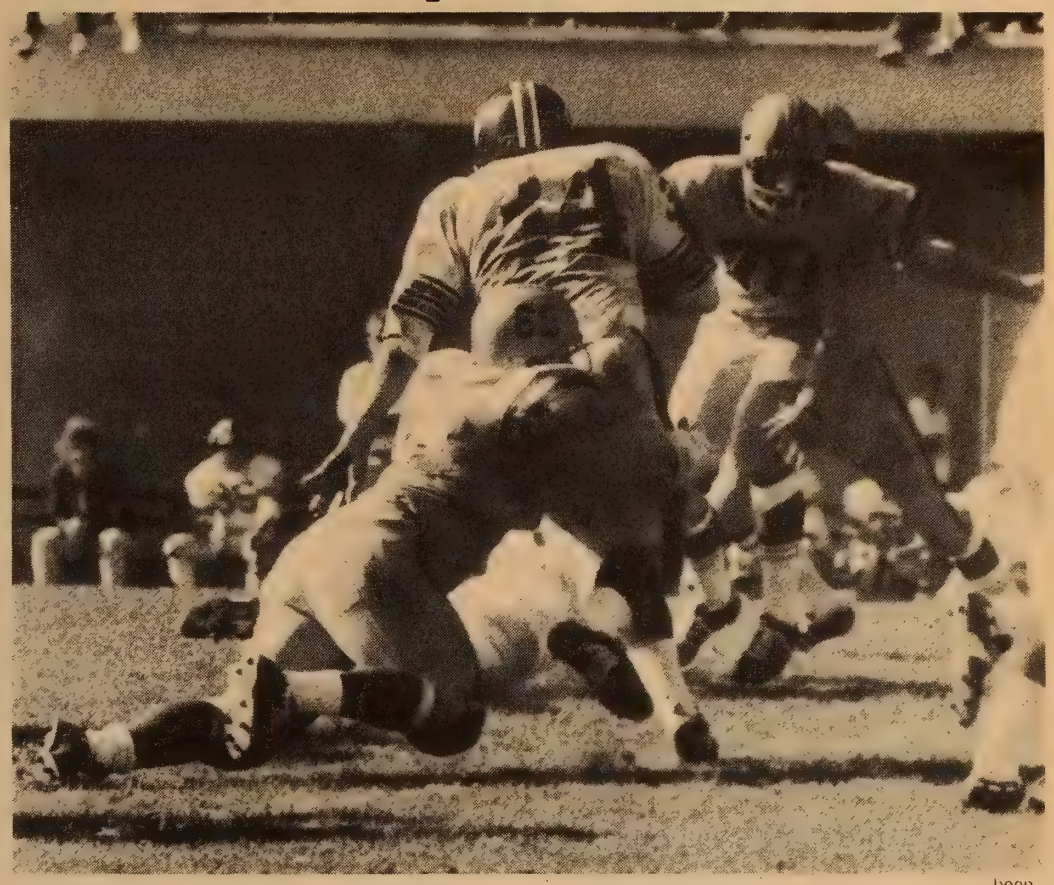
Morris made a great effort to score, but was caught from behind when he started to run out of gas. The Gaels failed to score, prompting Assistant Coach "Moose" McCarney to moan, "Aargh, you gotta score yourself, Morris, you can't rely on the offense."

Up to the half, the offense had been inconsistent, but after the break, the name of the game was ball control. The Gaels marched 74 yards in 11 plays, eating up the clock, before Tom Taylor wedged into the end zone from one yard out.

A bad snap from centre on the convert attempt turned holder Dave Campbell into an offensive back, and he bulled into the end zone for a two-point convert. (I rather doubt that the incumbents regard Dave as a real threat, though.)

Carleton's offence made a little more headway this time, but two stuffs by Don Smith, who was continuing to remodel the Raven centre, forced a punt. The Gaels drove to the Carleton 35 before Cozac managed to bounce a field goal try off the crossbar and through for three points. This ran the score to 26-0, and put the Ravens under the gun.

The final Queen's score came on a 65-yard march that ate up most of the remaining clock. After Warrender was stopped from the 1, Taylor faked Geoff Hamlin into the line and drilled a pass into the hands of flanker Stu Lang, who had beaten his defender in the end zone. Rookie kicker Will Kennedy, who had been doing a good job on kickoffs all afternoon, added the Gaels' final point. Cozac had been injured moments earlier in a mid-field pileup.



Carleton kept trying, putting together their only long drive of the day in the dying moments. Aided by two sensational catches by flanker Scotty Alexander, the Ravens drove to the Queen's two yard line. The defense, who had begun to sag just a little in the 80-degree heat, put up one last effort, and the shut-out was theirs.

The only unpleasantness of the afternoon came after the final gun. A small but active herd of Queen's fans, mostly Science '75 and '76, managed to break off one of Lansdownes' expensive metal "Slingshot" goal posts. This piece of brilliance is likely to cost, in one way or another, about $400 to $500 to repair. The likely recipient of the bill is the AMS, and in the opinion of this reporter, it should be paid. If students, at least ostensibly under the supervision of AMS constables, want to openly damage property, then the onus must be on the supervisory body as well as on the students.

Back to the game for a moment. There are a few more names that should be mentioned. Darryl Penner, a rookie cornerback, has to be one of the best open-field tacklers ever to come to Queen's. Look for big things from him next week.

The offensive line, as a whole, looked orders of magnitude sharper than last week, although there was still room for improvement. Taylor completed only 5 of 16 passes, but two were for touchdowns, and a third set up another major score. He had several balls dropped, and had to contend with a thirty-mile-an-hour wind to boot; this end of things should pick up if the winds die.

Next week the Gaels face the Ottawa U. Gee-Gees here at Richardson. McLellan should be back, but where do you put him, or rather who else do you move. We'll have more on Ottawa U. in the Friday paper, so keep reading for further developments.

Introduction to Intercollegiate Athletics 1972-73

by Anne Gardner

With a number of the fall sports already underway, the Men's and Women's Intercollegiate Athletic Committees are holding an evening of Introduction to 1972-73 Intercollegiate Athletics at the Physical Education Centre this Wednesday between 7:00 and 9:30 pm. Interested students will be able to meet and talk with the coaches of some twenty men's and women's intercollegiate teams. There will also be a chance to become familiar with the administrative structure of athletics at the university, intercollegiate, and national levels, and to see where the intercollegiate portion of the $20.00 student athletic fee is spent. All past, present, and future team members, as well as any interested students, are urged to drop by the P.E.C. to see what is up for 1972-73. First year students and newcomers to Queen's are especially welcome. Refreshments will be served.

World: Israeli forces enter Lebanon

BEIRUT — Israeli planes bombed two bridges across Lebanon's Litani River in a bid to cut Arab guerillas off from their headquarters and block their escape route while ground troups swept into the area.

The Lebanese government declared a state of emergency after Israeli tanks moved through 13 Arab villages destroying houses harboring guerillas. The dawn raid went 12 miles inside Lebanese territory within six hours.

Commando headquarters at Nabateyeh were bombed but Lebanese anti-aircraft guns intercepted Israeli jets flying over Beirut.

WASHINGTON — Secretary of Defence Melvin Laird announced that the United States would be ready to cut off all military and economic aid to South Vietnam in an attempt to reach a settlement in the Vietnam war.

He was replying to the North Vietnamese offer of peace which demanded the removal of American troups from South Vietnam, cessation of bombing and the removal of President Nguyen Van Thieu.

Laird also reiterated President Nixon's speech of last January which proposed the withdrawal of U.S. troups from Vietnam, the exchange of all prisoners, an internationally supervised ceasefire and a new presidential election by the Saigon government.

NASSAU — Independence has become the major issue in the upcoming Bahamas election. Prime Minister Lynden Pinding's Progressive Liberal Party, representing most of the islands' black population, announced in early August that he plans to lead the colony into independence early next year and called an election for September 19.

SAIGON — Permanent closure of 14 daily newspapers and 15 periodicals in South Vietnam has been ordered after their non-payment of large bonds ordered by the government of President Nguyen Van Thieu. The papers had been ordered on August 4 to post bonds of an amount equivalent to about $47,000 each as a guarantee against possible fines to be levied against the publications under the press code. The new code prohibits any criticism of the government and armed forces.

In making the announcement, President Thieu claimed that the plan was to drive publications out of business as they were becoming an avenue for communist takeover of the country. He also called the measure of democracy granted to South Vietnam excessive.

WASHINGTON — The United States Senate has approved a U.S.-Soviet five year agreement to limit nuclear arms. The pact, which will freeze intercontinental ballistic missiles to those already deployed or under construction, came as a result of President Nixon's talks with Russia last spring.

So far the Soviets have an estimated 1618 atomic weapons and the United States 1054.

VATICAN CITY — Pope Paul has barred women from taking any position in the Roman Cahtolic Church. At the same time the Pope restated celibacy rules for deacons and priests.

BONN, West Germany — West Germany and Poland have formally established diplomatic relations and raised the status of their trade missions to Embassy with full consular rights. It was also agreed that the fate of an approximate 250,000 Polish citizens of German descent who wish to emigrate west would be taken up at the governement level.

KAMPALA, Uganda — President Idi Amin has announced that the deadline for the 55,000 Ugandan Asians to leave the country is to be November 8, after which they will be placed in military transit camps. The expulsion was announced by Amin last August when he claimed that the Asian Nationals were undermining the country's economy.

Canada: Davis demands disclosure

TORONTO — Premier William Davis has established tough new rules for regulating the financial holdings of Cabinet ministers in an attempt to prevent conflict of interest claims from arising.

By the new ruling, Cabinet ministers must disclose their own holdings and those of their immediate family. The ministers will not be able to purchase land or interest in land development companies, nor pursue a business or professional activity on a day-to-day basis. All members of the Cabinet must divest themselves of holdings in public corporations or place them in a "blind trust". If a minister might personally benefit from a decision of his department, another minister will be appointed to look after the matter.

Davis stated that failure to comply will mean dismissal from the cabinet. Claiming that the move will limit a minister's income, Davis suggested that he is considering boosting their $35,000 a year salary.

KINGSTON — A$350,000 facelift on Kingston's Norman Rogers Airport will be getting underway this week with completion scheduled for December 1. This first phase will upgrade the main north-south runway, involving strengthening and resurfacing. Phase two and three will extend the runway to 4,000 and 5,000 feet respectively, allowing the landing of executive jets.

OTTAWA — Immigration Minister Bryce Mackasey stated that only between 3,000 and 5,000 Ugandan Asians will be accepted in Canada and that a firm quota will be established when it is determined how many will actually apply to enter. The first plane load of 145 Asians will arrive in Montreal on September 24.

TORONTO — Premier William Davis has announced that the provincial government will not contribute to the costs of building an arterial four lane highway on the route of the Spadina Expressway. Metro council approved the $1.5 million project on the condition that they receive a fifty per cent subsidy from the province. They were acting on the report of a joint provincial-Metro committee which recommended immediate construction. Davis also stated that he will be looking for ways to prevent the Metro council from financing the project themselves out of tax revenues. Davis claimed that a more equitable solution to the Metro traffic problem would be found within six months.

Queen's group refute American pipeline claims

A group of Queen's scientists yesterday refuted a number of the arguments used by the United States Interior Department in granting approval for the Trans-Alaska Pipeline.

Brian O'Leary, Rick Lake, and Cecil Law, of the Institute of Guided Ground Transport at Queen's, say the claims of the US that it will lose a billion dollars because of a year's delay in the exploitation of the Prudhoe Bay oil fields are incorrect, and are "misrepresenting the results of an analytical model which in itself does not give an adequate measure of the cost of delay."

The Institute calculates that a one year delay in the removal of the Prudhoe Bay crude would in fact, result in a net savings to the US of half a billion dollars.

The US Council of Economic Advisors calculates the cost of delay using three basic assumptions:

+ that the cost of Mideast oil (delivered in Los Angeles) will be $2.80 per barrel in 1975 and will remain the life of the Prudhoe Bay Oil fields.

+ that the cost of Prudhoe Bay oil for the same period will remain at $1.30 for the same period, and

+ that a constant discount rate of ten percent is appropriate.

The Institute says that the use of constant costs is 'hard to justify' in the face of oil company predictions that the cost of Mideast oil could be as high as $10 per barrel in 1985, and the increasing US dependence on foreign crude imports. They also expect that the costs of production of the Alaskan crude will rise, but not as dramatically.

Senate will study report on Course Evaluation

A sub-committee of the Senate committee on Academic Procedures will present a report on Course Evaluation at the Senate meeting on September 28.

The study was made at the request of Senate after serious errors were discovered in last years evaluation guide produced by Peter Raymont.

It was compiled by Dr. D. Holden, Sociology Department Dr. R. Willmott, Math Department; Dr. R. Bernabei, Classics Department; John Bankes, fourth year Economics student and John Demarteau, third year medicine.

The report was written on the basis of information and opinions which were collected from various faculties as well as from universities throughout North America.

Though course evaluation guides are a relatively recent phenomenon at Queen's, they have existed on some campuses in North America for 50 years.

"Reaction to it from the faculty here has been varied," Dr. Holden told the Journal. "Some feel that it is a waste of time, some that it is a valuable exericse while others are very worried about it," he said.

"There are still many problems to be discussed but course evaluation cannot be dismissed. It is having an effect," he commented.

Students may vote at home or here

The controversy as to where students vote continues as the major political parties take measures to get as many students as possible to register for the October 30 election.

Changes in the Election Act officially removed the option students had to be enumerated either in their home constituency or in the constituency where they attend an educational institution.

Students registered in their home ridings by their parents must first remove their names from those lists before they can apply for enumeration in another riding. Three days have been set asside for enumeration in the Kingston and the Islands riding: October 11, 12, and 13. All those not already enumerated will appear then before the district returning officer. For the polling district which includes the residences, the revision officer will be in the County Court House on Court St. between 11 am and 12 noon and from 8 to 11 pm on those days. For further information phone 549-2500.

Those enumerated in their home riding also have the alternative of applying for proxy, in which case someone may vote for them.

Observers have estimated that the political parties will spend more than $26 million in the election, compared with $21 million in 1968.

It is expected that the 265 ridings in Canada will have a combined electorate of 13.5 million voters but a more precise figure will not be available until enummeration is completed. Students and other first time voters will number some 2.8 million.

Engineers produce grad resume book

by Dave Colburn

This year the Engineering graduates will have added assistance in their quest for jobs. The Engineering Society is compiling a Directory with a resume of all the graduating students. Each resume will include a photograph, the student's work experience, and his field of interest. The Directory, which will have resumes of approximately 325 students, will be distributed to 250 companies across Canada. By publishing this directory the Engineering Society hopes to reach the companies which do not actively recruit new employees on campus. The President of the Engineering Society, Steve Mansell, is very optimistic that this project will be a great help to the graduating class.

Another new project for the Engineering Society this year is a pub. This pub will be located on the second floor of Clark Hall. Hours are to be Fridays from 4 to 7 p.m.

Youth hit hardest by unemployment

Young people were the hardest hit in the August unemployment picture according to the Statistics Canada information for the week ended August 19 and released September 12.

Unemployment rates for 14 to 24 year-olds (32 per cent of them students) rose from 10.6 per cent in July to 12.1 per cent in August on a seasonably adjusted basis. The age group accounted for more than 50 per cent of total unemployment, using unadjusted figures.

At the same time, the hard core unemployed without jobs and on unemployment insurance for over seven months took a giant leap from 94,000 in July to 107,000 in August.

This would mean students returning to classes this fall will have less money than they earned last year, if they are able to return. With a decreased income during summer months, the number of students aid applications should also be higher, in numbers and amounts. Increased tuition, particularly in Ontario which has 80 per cent of postsecondary enrolment, should also provide problems for returning students.

Students needed for Senate committees

Vacancies exist on the following Senate Committees: Academic Procedures, Budget Committee, Fine Arts & Public Lectures, Library, Scholarships & Student Aid, Student Affairs, Advisory Council on Statistics.

Members of the University community are invited to submit to the Secretary of the Senate, Room 225, Richardson Hall, the names of full-time faculty whose interests, knowledge and experience seem to qualify them for the positions on these Committees.

Names suggested need not be those of persons who are already members of the Senate, but should be those who have a special interest in the particular problems related to the responsibilities of these Committees. As a matter of courtesy, the sponsor should obtain assurance that the person being sponsored is willing to have his or her name considered.

Application should be submitted by Friday, October 6th.

Experimental West-End bus proposed

A charter bus service to and from the townships to downdown Kingston has been proposed by R. Tinline and R. Hough of the Queen's geography department. Route -1 was to collect from Henderson Place and surrounding subdivisions, but Kingston's Public Utilities Commission PUC) has agreed to extend it's service to this area, starting on Monday September 25. Route-2 will remain a charter service from Amherstview and Bayridge. The route will proceed along Front Street arriving at Melborne at 8 a.m., Chelsea and Front by 8:10 a.m., St. Lawrence College at 8:15 a.m. Queen's Union by 8:25 a.m. and Kingston General Hospital at 8:30 a.m., eventually arriving at the downtown section at Bagot and Brock Streets.

The return pick-up times will also be in effect: KGH 5:05 p.m., Queen's Union 5:10 p.m., St. Lawrence College 5:20 p.m., and Front and Welborne at 5:30 p.m. Cost for this charter service will be 30c per trip, 50c return-which is considerably less than the cost of parking around the Queen's campus. The service will be on a trial basis for one month. Later the possibility for extensions of service will be evaluated. Details of routes will be posted around the University.

Only 60 of Elronds 400 units occupied

The continuing nature of Elrond's problems is highlighted by the disclosure that of the potential four hundred living units only sixty are occupied.

Much of the building is still not ready for occupancy. However, this situation has been acentuated by the fact that in the past week city inspectors have refused a permit which would allow two more floors to be used.

This hesitancy on the part of the building inspectors is based on a cautious approach to a new system of fire control devices incorporated in the building. Improvements and modifications have been made and it is hoped that this immediate hurdle will soon be overcome facilitating the residency of about one hundred more students.

Many of the yet unhoused Elrond members are boarded in motels, hotels and Nursing residances. This distressing state of affairs has prompted some to drop out of the Project altogether. About 10 per cent of the Elrond members have already taken this course of action. Yet as Ray Stemp, an Elrond director points out, an important factor is that new affiliations still outnumber drop-outs.

Despite all the problems, some Elrond residents are happy with their new home. Bill Henry, a second year economics student expressed this sentiment and ascribed the disenchantment of others to the factors which have delayed moving in.

It is evident however, that even with most optimistic projections it will be some time before Elrond achieves the status of a complete community.

AMS discusses fee strike, Elrond, pub, and buses

The AMS outer council discussed the fee strike at their first regular meeting on Wednesday night. Debate centred on whether or not the AMS should take a stand on the issue before a referendum is held on October 11 and 12.

Wally Palmer, vice president of the AMS said that "it is our responsibility to provide some sort of leadership on this issue."

However, Ross Dunsmore, Education Commissioner commented that "the utility of a strike is minimal as the increase has already been budgeted by the provincial government. We felt it was more useful to negoitiate with government for future changes," he added.

Vice president of the Graduate Society, Stuart Clark complained that the AMS had waffled too long on the issue already. "It is six months after the fact and we haven't a hope if we don't act now," he said.

"The credibility of this council in the eyes of other universities and of the government depends on our taking a stand," Ken Wong, External Affairs Commissioner suggested.

The AMS will try to determine their official position at the outer council meeting on October 4.

However, "we are already in the process of trying to educate students about the fee issue, Palmer pointed out.

President, Greg LeBlanc, vice president Wally Palmer and External Affairs commissioner Ken Wong spoke to groups of freshmen last week and posters recommending that students pay their fees in two installments will go up today.

The problems of Elrond and their relationship to the AMS were also discussed at length. Ray Stemp and John Blakeney were AMS representatives on the Elrond Board of Directors were on hand to explain the situation.

Elrond has been unable to get a permit this week which would allow occupancy above the third level because of a new type of fire systems which have been installed. Modifications are being made and it is hoped that the building inspector will issue a permit soon.

John Blakeney explained the AMS agreements with Elrond Incorporated. "The AMS lent Elrond $30,000 under the condition that three members of the eight member Board of Trustees be appointed by them. If Elrond shows 3 per cent a defict over two years or 6 per cent over one year, the university can place it under receivership.

Other business included the pub, buses and the firing of Jane Corkin from Heffalump.

Andy Pipe, acting Services Commissioner expressed the hope that the pub would "move away from the Steve Amey beerfest atmosphere." "To ensure a quieter atmosphere, entertainment will probably be reduced to one or two nights, Leblanc assured him.

The charter bus project to Toronto and Ottawa may be even cheaper than expected if the AMS decides to cancel its agreements with Association of Student Councils, Palmer said.

He stressed that only full buses would leave, the rest will be cancelled the previous evening.

The dismissal of Jane Corkin last week from the post of manager of Tumbleweed Craft Shop was the result of absenteeism and overspending according to Leblanc. Dave Morrell, the student manager will handle her duties until the operation of the store is reviewed this fall. The craft shop is $600 in overdraft and has $12,000 accumulated debts.

Several appointments were made at the meeting. Ned Franks, Ray Stemp and John Blakeney were appointed to their second term as AMS representatives on the Elrond Board of Directors. The AMS court will include the following members; Chief Justice, Stu Hendin; Associate Chief Justice, John Stodwell and Junior Justices Ron Kimberley, Rodney Birrell and Smirle Forsyth.

AMS buses start next week

The AMS-AOSC charter bus service to Toronto and Ottawa will start next Friday, the 29th of September.

Tickets will be for sale in the AMS office in the basement of the Union on Monday.

Fares for the charter busses are considerably lower than those of the commercial carriers. Busses will leave campus at 3 pm on Fridays, and return from Ottawa and Toronto on Sunday evenings.

Group says US gains by delaying Alaskan oil

The Queen's group calls the use of a constant discount rate "unrealistic and irresponsible," and see it as equivalent to saying that oil saved for the next generation is of little or no value. They use a smaller, time dependent, decreasing discount rate to represent the depletion of a valuable and necessary resource.

The Institute is quick to point out that they are not questioning the methodology of the US calculations, but only the underlying assumptions. In fact, their model, using the US assumptions, gives the same cost of delay figures.

They also point out that the US would retain a strategic advantage by conserving its domestic reserves and continuing to use foreign oil supplies while they last; especially since the whole of the Prudhoe Bay reserves would only replace imports of crude for two years.

In addition to the cost of delay, the Institute took exception to statements made by US Interior Secretary Rogers Morton and the President of Atlantic Richfield that Canada could not raise the necessary capital to ensure majority ownership of an oil delivery system. They point out that using a typical ratio of ownership to debt of 20 to 80, Canadians need only provide ten percent of the costs of such a system, not half as Morton said.

Earlier this summer, the Institute proposed that Prudhoe Bay oil should be moved by a $2.4 billion, 1200 mile railroad from the arctic down the MacKenzie to a pipeline terminal near (100 miles) Hay River, NWT.

They say such a railroad will have fewer detrimental affects on the Arctic environment; be of less cost; and as fast to build as the Trans-Alaska pipeline. In addition the Institute claims that the railroad would have strong economic impact on both the Canadian national and Arctic economys, and could reduce unemployment in Canada by as much as 88,000 during the five year construction period.

The rail system would operate at one-third capacity, but would deliver the same volume of crude as the proposed 48 inch pipeline, and leave capacity for Northern commercial transportation, and the possible transport of Canadian Arctic oil, which would not be put through the Trans-Alaska system.

(Their proposal calls for transfer to a pipeline after the route leaves the Arctic, as the rail alternative only has an advantage in the Arctic wilderness.)

The Trans-Alaska pipeline, owned by a consortium of oil companies, has been around for a number of years, but has been held up in the courts because of law suits claiming that the US government could not issue building permits for the pipeline until all the alternatives had been investigated.

Morton, in his statement announcing his intention to grant the pipeline permit this summer, said that the TAPS could be completed faster; that Canada could not raise the required funds for a Canadian system; and that the delay would cost the US (national economy rather than the oil companies) a billion dollars a year.

He granted the permit in the face of US Interior Department findings that a MacKenzie Valley route would be less damaging to the environment, as fast as, and safer in the event of hostilities than the Trans Alaska system. No mention of the CIGGT rail proposal was ever made, although it had been known for a number of months.

Petition calls for grants on tax exempt property

by Steve Winnett

Mrs. Irene Mooney's campaign to seek grants from the provincial government "in lieu of taxes for all tax-exempt property in the city" is in a temporary state of limbo due to several factors, but in a telephone interview on Wednesday she told The Journal that if she did not have any further word from the Ontario government by the end of September she would write them once more.

Mrs. Mooney headed a 25 member delegation which presented a 14,000 signature petition in July to the Treasurer of Ontario, Mr. McKeough, calling for action to solve Kingston's tax problem. Both Mr. McKeough and the Premier, Mr. Davis, have stated that they will look into the matter, but action may not be swiftly forthcoming because of the need to collect data before the next fiscal year, at the earliest March 31, 1973. As well, the resignation of Mr. McKeough and his replacement by Mr. MacNaughton have resulted in further delays. Mrs. Mooney confessed that she herself has been busy with several other civic action programs which have taken up some of her time, government activities lapse during the summer months.

- egger

Mrs. Mooney contends that the tax-exempt status of such corporations as Queen's, St. Lawrence College, R.M.C., the hospitals and the churches forces an unfair burden of taxation on groups which can least afford this in times of continuing inflation: homeowners trying to make ends meet, and especially those on fixed incomes such as senior citizens. The problematic issue of relations between the city of Kingston and Queen's naturally enters into Mrs. Mooney's campaign. She pointed out that the exemption from provincial land taxes granted to Queen's is granted to all provincial properties. "No one", she said, "is knocking Queen's. It's just that Queen's is the biggest offender". It's the expansion of the minority which has increased the burden on Kingston homeowners. Queen's has the money to buy land or houses. Once these are purchased, they are tax-exempt, hence Kingston homeowners have to shoulder more of the tax burden.

Mrs. Mooney would like the provincial government to grant sufficient funds to the city to keep down the rising taxes of homeowners. She argues that such action would not only give a breather to those who pay taxes, but would also enable the city to undertake much needed civic projects, such as roads and sewers. Ideally, she feels, no property should be tax-exempt, even churches, which "are a paying concern". She argues that perhaps such institutions as universities could, after paying their share of taxes, receive some sort of grant.

Mrs. Mooney told The Journal that her committee is not campaigning against such institutions as Queen's, but at the same time, she feels that their benefit to the community should be reassessed. Queen's and other institutions may be of great economic benefit to such groups as landlords and businessmen, but the tax-exempt status of these institutions forces an unfair burden on people like old-age pensioners who wish to occupy the house they have leved in all their lives. The present tax structure makes this "almost impossible".

Despite the delays since the presentation of her petition in July (which she understands), Mrs. Mooney remains optimistic about the success of her cause. "Everything is just going up, up, up--it has to stop somewhere. The 14,000 people who signed the petition all knew what they were signing. As we told Mr. McKeough, 'Don't just throw that in the garbage can. Remember that these are people.' ".

Dunning Trust Lectures October 23-26

This year's Dunning Trust Lecture Series at Queen's will be held October 23-26 on the "Social Problems in Environmental Reform". Three speakers -- an ecologist, an architect and a town planner -- will present formal lectures and meet with smaller groups on campus.

On October 23 in Dunning Hall the first of these speakers will be Dr. Garrett Hardin, Professor of Human Ecology, University of California, Santa Barbara. He has been on the faculty of the University of California since 1941. His academic interests are evolution, the history of science and human ecology. As well as having written several important books, he is the author of numerous articles which have appeared in such learned journals as Science and Nature, and in the magazines Redbook and the Saturday Evening Post.

Raymond Moriyama, who will speak on Tuesday, October 24, is a graduate in architecture of the University of Toronto (1954) and in town planning from McGill University (m. Arch. 1957). He is also the winner of the 1961 Massey Medal for Architecture. Moriyama has won numerous awards for his designs, including the Ontario Science and the Japanese-Canadian Cultural Centre in Toronto.

The following night in Grant Hall Mr. McHarg an expert on town planning will deliver his address. Mr. McHarg has masters degrees in landscape architecture and city planning. He is a member of the faculty at the University of Pennsylvania and involved in private practise in Philidelphia. Mr. McHarg's work has won him a number of awards, including the 1967 Bradford Williams Medal from the American Society of Landscape Architects. He has carried out a number of ecological studies and appeared in several U.S. television network documentaries, as a guest on the Today Program, the Mike Douglas and Garroway shows.

Why not pay half

Open Letter to the students of Queen's

In the past week during orientation I made available to many students a sheet asking them to wait until they could obtain more information on the $100 fee increase before they made a decision about how they intended to pay fees.

In the course of the distribution of these articles the frosh were most inclined to ask two questions; do you think there will be a strike and do you think payment in two installments will really help?

I was pleased that they had asked for it showed that they were not the dumb frosh that they are made out to be and that the conviction we made in our article in The Journal about "students dissenting without knowledge of the wherefore and why of action" was affirmed. However, at the same time I was disturbed that I could not answer those questions, for only a fool would venture to gaze into the capital ball of politics and give them an answer.

There was only one thing which I could say in response to those questions and that was simply to ask another question, "why not?" By banking the remainder in a savings account, they accumulate interest equal to the penalty for paying in two installments, in fact if they are willing to risk it on Government Bonds they can make money. Thus, it costs them nothing to do so.

Meanwhile, they are leaving open the option to withhold 2nd payment of fees should they feel it justified and are showing some form of protest towards such "arbitrary" decisions about education - even if the payment in two installments proves to be little more than an exercise in dissent. They will also add credibility and representation to the AMS when they go to bargain with provincial authorities on the behalf of students.

Finally, I must stress at this time some fundamental facts about the payment of fees in two installments; it is not a committment to strike, it is a practice which I personally do every year as do many other students irregardless of a fee increase and if at any time between now and January they feel so compelled to pay the rest of their fees they can do so quite easily.

In short, don't shut the door. Payment in two installments is not costly, radical or even dangerous to your academic future. Rather it leaves you free to decide what to do, when all the information is made available. So why not?

Yours truly
Ken Wong
External Affairs Commissioner

Postscript

Between the time of the above letters conception and the present moment, the University has decided to remove the $5 penalty fee for payment in two installments. This naturally implies that anyone who does not pay in two installments is not only closing the door but is not taking full advantage of the system. By payment in two installments rather than one, a student cannot help but make money by following the above procedures.

Finally, I wish to thank the administration of this university for the instigation of this measure. I feel this is more than just an aid to our cause, it is support of our cause. Notice of this fact I hope will bring more people to the realization that our measures are indeed in the best interests of students and not purely a chance for some young political bucks to lock horns with the present government. Moreover, it is a chance for students of this university, and in fact for the people of Ontario to set the government down and ask why?. . . and expect an answer, for it is their right to know the answers.

If you think this is a "political game" or a "radical move", that's your opinion but if the term "radical" or "political heavy" embellishes the rights of individuals then feel free to call me the above. . .

We were wrong

Dear Sir;

May I just point out one unfortunate error which occurred in The Journal of Tuesday September 19th. I refer to your article concerning the Queen's - A.O.S.C. Bus Service to Ottawa and Toronto. The times for arrival and departure of the buses were reported incorrectly. The following are in fact fare and time schedules for this service:

Air conditioned, washroom equipped, express Voyageur Colonial Coaches will in fact leave for Toronto and Ottawa from Ellis Hall at 3:00 p.m. every Friday afternoon. Buses will return from Toronto (parking lot on south side of Haytor St., between Bay and Yonge) and Ottawa (Voyageur terminal) each Sunday evening at 8:00 p.m. Round trip fare to Ottawa is $6.00 and to Toronto $9.00.

Tickets may be purchased in the A.M.S. office from Monday through Thursday; and are good only for the dates issued. Dependent upon ticket sales an appropriate number of buses will be provided.

I hope this will clarify the errors as they appeared in your article; and that students will take full advantage of this service.

Andrew Pipe,
Acting Services Commissioner,
Alma Mater Society.

What is poetry

Dear Editor, Contributors, Readers of Sweven,

What is poetry? Personal definitions, or can there be shared some agreement on certain aspects? In these past two years, reading first Sweven, then Third Eye, I found it almost completely trivia.

I had hoped to see poetry; not such absurdly maudlin, stale sentiments, prose chopped (randomly is my only guess) into lines, mimicing the form of poetry without any knowledge (so it seems) of poetry.

Total, abyssmal lack of knowledge of techniques, perhaps, I said - a lack of background. (?) On the other hand, though, I know that the role of "poet-poetess" is much lusted after by those wanting to find their "specialness", their uniqueness; as well, it can only add to one's "mystique"; to impress others, or awe them.

This being such a middle class university, there are many people who, because of the particular mental necessities of their social class, find it necessary to impress others with their "sensitivity", their "heaviness" - possibly to assuage the dearth of confidence, caused by never having to have struggled with basic physical, economic needs.

Or maybe those claiming to write "poems" here are just too lazy to work at the craft-technique-expression end of poetry, depending rather on their "innate poetic genius", and whatever lifestyle they use to further their "sensitivity" or narcissism.

Too bad, because intuitive poetic genius, for the most part, is a myth. Poetry among students at Queen's, judging by previous Sweven-Third Eyes, is only boring, tawdry, and ludicrous, one more mask for ego-inflation sustenance. I have yet to find one image worth remembering, an illumination of any sort, a feeling well expressed, or communicated, any light, or energy; on, to ask even the most basic quality, the least though of craftsmanship.

There has appeared no writing on poetry or poetic techniques of any sort, no controversy, no indications of influence outside one's own whims, no discussion of poetics or reviews of other poetry outside the university.

Is there no interest? Not even any interesting prose, experimental or otherwise. And no creativity. And Sweven calls itself a "literary" magazine, now plans an issue a month. Appalling, if it continues as it has in the past. I would rather it disappear than carry the garbage it previously has. It is a travesty to see such juvenalia passed off so lightly as "literary".

The material, and magazine, has been so dead, so drab, I would really rather not have it appear - its existence depresses me, as one more example of foolishness and onanistic ego-tratification on the part of some university students.

The pretentiousness of printing its so-called "poetry"! I wonder if this intentionally abusive (from being so well-deserved) rejoinder will have the least effect other than an unjustifiable ego-retreat into baseless rhetoric by those who feel attacked.

I leave myself deliberately open to more real arguments, but doubt if I will get them. Can any one of you who "write" (god forgive my loose usage) justify your technique, or begin to explain it? Have you a poetic theory?

The more necessary question, I think, is whether you have any conception at all of what you are trying to do-say, and why your particular way, rather than another. If you have so little to say, I suggest silence.

Otherwise, think about what you are doing. Simply because you wrote it, does not mean that (wahtever you wish to call it) it is good, or even the least bit talented. The terming of such drivel as I have seen "poetry" is sad; why let it see the light of day in print? Keep it hidden in your rooms, and try for something original, some experience or feeling truly communicated, in an interesting, effective way, that more approaches literature, or at least is within intelligent range of it.

Your "poems" must stand by themselves, unprotected, in print, by your aura which so comforts your ego and insulates you from doubt. Poetry here at Queens, by students? Absurd. Can anyone do better than "my poetry is poetry because I say so!"?

I could as easily label this letter a cabbage, with just as much claim to truth. Are there any people here interested in serious literary, creative endeavour? Why not "come out" and put some guts into this embarrassing travesty, Sweven? Otherwise, let's just forget about a "literary" magazine of Queen's, let it die the death it deserves.

I suggest masturbation as a more relevant form of expression than I have seen in the pages of Sweven-Third Eye. All I ask is that someone indicate they are interested in poetry other than a means of self-gratification. Poetry is something other, and more, than I have previously seen in Sweven. The dillettantism that pervades its pages is only saddening.

Yours,
James W. Smith, Arts '76.

Upset with ad

Dear Sir,

As I flipped through the pages of Queen's Journal volume one hundred, No. 3 (September 19), my eyes beheld an advertisement on page 4 inviting students to enquire after an American essay writing firm by the name of "Termpaper Arsenal, Inc." This is just another example of blatant U.S. cultural exploitation. Can not Canadian students be relied upon to write their own essays? And can not a Canadian university student newspaper be relied upon not to officially or unofficially condone such exploitation through the printing of such an ad? You could have at least given equal space to a competing (but not subsidiary) Canadian essay firm.

In all seriousness though, I believe that essay factories are too serious an issue to handle for even a small "1" liberal newspaper such as yourself. They threaten the very fabric out of which an honest Arts student attempts to weave his degree.

I'm hoping, as I'm sure many others are, that I don't see any more such advertisements in the Journal again.

Sincerely,
John Thomas, Arts '75.

Tory talks

Dear Sir,

I am writing to you to express my concern that a significant number of students may be deprived of their rights to vote in the coming Federal general election, October 30, because of a recent amendment to the Canada Elections Act.

As you will perhaps know, this amendment greatly – and in my view, unnecessarily -- complicates the procedure many students will have to follow to cast their ballot. Specifically, the Act now requires that the name of the student who is eligible to vote must be placed on the list of electors for the polling division in which he or she ordinarily resides.

In the case of a single student who lives part of the year at home, the amended Act defines ordinary residence as the home of his or her parents or guardian.

I fear that many students in this category who attend university or college in a Federal constitutency other than that of their parents may assume erroneously that they can vote in the constituencies in which their universities or colleges are located. As a result, they may not be aware of the need to take certain steps before they can vote.

The steps which such students will have to take are as follows. They must arrange to have their names placed on the list of electors in the Polling Division in which their homes are located. If they are going to be absent from home on election day, they may vote by proxy. To do this, they first must obtain a statement from the Registrar to confirm their status as full-time students. Secondly, they must obtain a Form 47 from a Returning Officer, fill it in and attach the Registrar's Statement. Thirdly, these papers must be handed, either personally or by the proxy voters, to the Returning Officers in the constituencies of the student's ordinary residence before 10 p.m. of the Friday preceeding polling day.

I think you will agree that this system greatly complicates the exercise of the franchise for many students. To eliminate this for future elections, I have been urging that serious consideration be given to changing the Canada Elections Act to allow a student to vote either in his or her home constituency or in the constituency in which his or her university or college is located.

I would always welcome your comments on such a proposal.

In the meantime, may I urge you to publicize as widely as possible at your campus the procedures students must follow under this present legislation in order to vote in the coming election. I think it is absolutely essential that the voice of Canada's youth be heard on October 30th.

With good wishes,
Yours sincerely,
Robert L. Stanfield

The Arts at Queen's

The Agnes Etherington Art Centre

The Agnes Etherington Art Centre serves as a strong, major link between Queen's University, which finances it, and the Kingston area. Its viable role as a Community gallery is in keeping with the spirit of the donor, Agnes Etherington, in whose Georgian style family home, with elegant reception rooms, the Centre was established in 1957.

The history of the Art Centre begins even earlier when Mrs. Etherington, in the 1920's created the Arts and Music Club, from which developed the Kingston Art Association. The enthusiasm and generosity of Mrs. Etherington was matched by the work of Dr. R. G. Trotter, who as head of the History Department for many years, and as first chairman of the University Art Committee, foresaw the value and real need for the creative arts within a University structure. As a result of their efforts, Queen's University, assisted financially by the Carnegie Corporation, established in 1934 one of the first Art Departments in a Canadian university. The first resident artist was Goodridge Roberts, who was succeeded in 1936 by Andre Bieler of Montreal.

At the time of his appointment as resident artist, Queen's University had only a very modest collection of paintings, but in 1940 an Art Foundation was established in the name of the University so that Queen's would have a collection of the works of outstanding Canadian painters, to form a "foundation" for a future gallery.

During the Foundation's brief existence of five years numerous works were donated and a substantial beginning was made, in spite of the fact that, at that time, the University had no funds that could be allocated for the purchase of works of art.

In accordance with plans made by Agnes Etherington in consultation with Andre Bieler, and upon her death in 1954, the house was willed to the University to further the development of art and music for the enrichment of the lives of those both on the campus and in the community. And after considerable reconstruction the house was reopened in September 1957 as the Agnes Etherington Art Centre.

A skilful transition from Georgian to modern architecture, added 4500 square feet of exhibition space plus studios, storage, office and shipping areas in 1962, assisted by a grant from the Canada Council.

Since its inception, the Art Centre has been guided with vision, first by Andre Bieler, who retired in 1963 and then by Ralph Allen, who retired as Director of the Arts Centre on August 31, 1972 and who has become the University's resident artist, a post which was vacant since Bieler's retirement. Mrs. Frances K. Smith, who has been with the centre since its opening, as secretary to Bieler and assistant to the Director is presently acting Director of the Art Centre.

Its permanent collection has grown in recent years with important gifts, such as that of 90 works by contemporary Canadian artists presented by Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Zacks in 1962; a group of Daniel Fowler water colours given by Mr. E. C. Gill in 1966 and continuing gifts of early Europeon works by Dr. A. Bader. As well as a collection of British domestic silver dating form the 17th century given by Dr. Stuart W. Houston and Dr. J. F. Houston in 1967, additional works are purchased continually, both in the older historic field as well as in the contemporary.

Limitation of gallery space at present prevents the display of a great part of the collection at all times, but exhibition of a major part of it is regularly planned each year.

Each year over 224 different exhibitions are presented in the galleries. A balance is attempted between the national and the international, whether of the past or the present, but the emphasis is on Canadian expression in the arts. Some of the exhibitions originate with the National Gallery of Canada; some are planned by other major galleries; some are organized by the Art Centre itself and may in turn, circulate to other centres across the country. Local artists are encouraged to submit works to the jury for the Annual Spring Exhibition.

The Gallery Association, formed in 1965 brings together a wide cross-section of citizens interested in the development of the visual arts in the Kingston area in co-operation with the Art Centre. Membership, at nominal fees, $2 to students, is open to all and the active assistance of the association has made it possible to extend the basic programs of the Art Centre and to plan special events from time to time.

The regular program includes Illustrated public lectures on art, bringing notable scholars and teachers to the city; films on art add much to art education and enjoyment. Annual Series of programs are planned in this area, open to students and public alike. Experimental films by young Canadian and American film makers will be presented on Tuesday, September 26, at 8:30 pm in Dunning Hall. Sunday afternoon recitals, of an unusual or "avant-garde" nature, are held three of four times during the winter, open to all without charge; the teaching studios of the Art Centre are extensively used for university students and for extension classes in drawing and painting and there are facilities also available for work in the graphic arts. St. Lawrence College, however does offer courses to the general public in many of the visual and creative arts, including life drawing, etching, colour theory, jewelry making and sculpture. Childrens art classes in the city are developing under the sponsorship of the Gallery association.

Ralph Allen, who will be teaching as well as furthering his own artistic endeavors, stated that he will be exploring "realisms which I am interested in at the moment" in painting over the next two years. He will be available at certain times to any students who are interested in painting and the related arts and is planning open workshops in the near future.

The Department of Art History is housed in the Art Centre and offers an extensive and developing academic program to University students. The Bachelor of Art Education program is also under the auspices of the Art History Department and is a four year professional course which prepares teachers in the in-instruction of art in the schools.

Housed in the Art Centre is an Art Reference Library a large slide collection and a Photographic Reference section.

For the first time, a Box Office will be in operation at the art Centre which will serve the Department of Music, the Division of Concerts, the AMS, the Department of Film Studies and possibly the Drama Department.

Mrs. Frances Smith, mentioned that she would be very interested in seeing if a nominal amount of the students activity fees, 25 cents, could be allocated to the Art Centre for the purchase of additional art works, of which students could participate in the choosing.

The Agnes Etherington Art Centre is a complex which endeavours to integrate and illuminate the arts to all Queen's students and faculty and all Kingston residents and it is the only Art Centre and Gallery between Ottawa and Toronto.

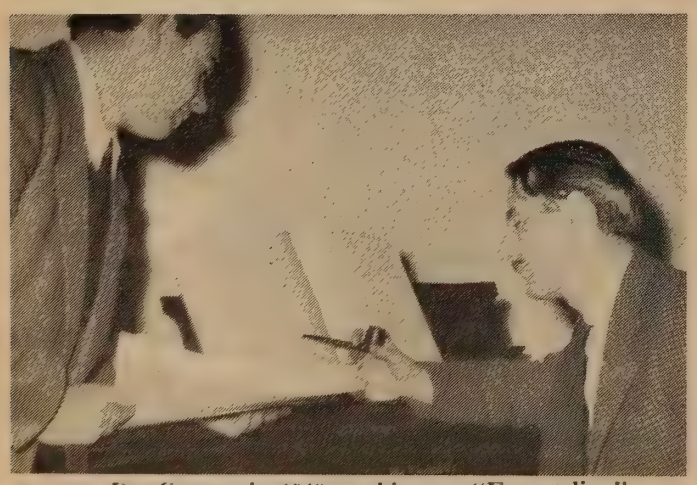
Department of Drama

Seven short years after its establishment as a department, with 38 students enrolled, Queen's Drama Department is offering a Senate-approved major and expecting a record 550 registrations this fall. In the session just past, 471 students were taking the department's 12 courses and the staff had grown to six full-time instructors and one technician.

Prof. J. A. (Fred) Euringer, on Sabbatical leave this year, has been Director of Drama since the department was separated from the English Department. Mr. Russ Waller will be acting head of the department during his absence.

Contributing to the Drama Department's exciting period of growth and popularity are facilities and equipment which have turned the Old Arts building into a real theatre complex. A refurbished Convocation Hall now seats 270 in plushy comfort. A studio-theatre begun in 1969 seats about 75 and has several stage exposures. The experimental theatre class will meet and do productions in a new studio which is located in the basement of Ontario Hall. There is a set and costume design studio; a workshop for set construction; an audio-visual room; accumulating props---made, brought and donated; and air-conditioned accommodation for the priceless collection of costumes.



The Drama Department offers two major productions each year. Bertrolt Brecht's "The Mother" will be directed by Mr. Bud Burkom during the first term and "As You Like It" by William Shakespeare will be directed by Mr. Rob Robertson during the second term.

The Chronicles Series, smaller scale productions performed in the Studio Theatre in the Old Arts building, will continue this year as well. The first Chronicles, Strindberg's "Mother Love", will be directed by Peter Lichtenfels in October.

All productions are open to the entire student body in both acting and production capacities and crew lists and audition notices are posted on the bulletin boards in the Drama Department.

Last year's "Sundays at Eight" series which offered play readings, special speakers and class projects, is not being formally offered this year but special events may be sporadically presented at this time and will be announced.

In conjunction with the Music Department and the Department of Physical and Health Education, the Drama department will be presenting a regular Eurhythmics Workshop with Mr. Donald Himes. Eurhythmics is the study of rhythmical movement and consists of a series of regimental excercises and movements integrated with musical and sonic patterns. This workshop will be offered in the dance studio of the Physical Education Centre on Sunday evenings throughout the year.

Queen's Musical Theatre

Before the Queen's Musical Theatre was so named it was referred to as the Queen's Glee Club, but according to Dr. Graham George of the Department of Music, who ran the Glee club for 25 years, "we never did a glee." (Anything of a secular nature written for a number of voices.)

Frank Harrison, who had been Head of the Department as well as the only faculty member of the department for ten years had in 1942, done a production of "Iolanthe" by Gilbert and Sullivan. In 1946 when Dr. George succeeded him there had been no formal Glee Club or Musical Theatre in existence, and Dr. George, who had a rather "snooty attitude" towards Gilbert and Sullivan, simply because he thought that students were everly exposed to it in high school, decided that he wanted to produce concerts and operas of a more serious nature.

In the spring of 1947 the Queen's Glee Club presented in KCVI Gluck's "Orpheus and Eurydice". Unfortunately, stated Dr. George, "It was more fun to perform than to listen to, and we lost $446 as well."

"Strangely enough two or three years later", stated Dr. George, "my major premise about Gilbert and Sullivan was disproved." From then on, the Queen's Glee Club did both Gilbert and Sullivan and more serious works every few years. In 1948, Dr. George wrote and conducted an opera called Evangeline with libretto by Paul Roddick and Don Warren and up until 1969 when he stepped down as Director of the Queen's Glee Club, no broadway musicals were ever produced.

"Because you can hear this kind of thing all over the place, I didn't think it would have any educational value," stated Dr. George, but when Duane Bates succeeded him, the Glee Club became the Queen's Musical Theatre and Sandy Wilson's camp musical comedy "The Boy Friend" was produced and was more popular than most Glee Club productions of the past.

Dr. George's aristocratic phylosophies, which are encapsulated by a German Composer Paul Hindemith with whom he worked from 1952 to 1953, "Composing music is a combination of aristocratic freedom and the fights of wilk animals", seemed to fall by the wayside, as "Pyjama Game", "Cabaret" and this year, Leonard Bernstein's "Wonderful Town" went into production, with flashy costumes and huge casts.

"It's a pity", stated Dr. George, "and I pity them, but the only thing that keeps up a standard of aristocratic value is power." The popular musicals make money, ergo they have the power, Dr. George indicated.

Dr. Graham George, who for 28 years has been with the Queen's Department of Music and for 18 years was the department, has seen it grow into a sophisticated teaching complex with a Library, Electronic music studio, as well as plans for a new building site of Goddwin House, on Queen's Crescent. But, the Musical Theatre, as he originally envisioned it, has changed completely and so he has been working for the past few years on a new opera, on a Canadian theme, which perhaps will bring the more serious side of musical theatre back to Queen's.

Drama Guild activities go into full swing in new theatre

The Queen's Drama Guild began, in November 1899 under a different name, the Drama Club, when a small band of students got together and read through the first act of As You Like It. Its first public offering was the fourth act from The Merchant of Venice. Seventy three years later the Drama Guild has moved from its long standing residence, Convocation Hall, to a new theatre at 233½ Princess Street.

News that the Guild had rented downtown space this past spring was something of a surprise to the campus. In recent years the productions of the burgeoning Drama Department had virtually eclipsed the activities of the Guild. Apart from one major production and its successful sponsorship of a London theatre tour last year, which will be sponsored again this year, the Guild has recently devoted its energies and its A.M.S. subsidy mainly to the support of enterprising students with good ideas for independent projects.

Last January Brian Wilson, then a final year English major who produced a highly acclaimed interpretation of The Bacchae in 1971 thought of creating, organizing and directing a Guild Theatre, off campus and open to any student. His idea was seized upon by Owen Moulton a 4th year student and Mo Bock, a queen's graduate who is now an instructor in the Drama Department. They took it to the Guild Executive and planning began.

With Mo Bock as its Artistic Director the Guild Theatre plans to become "a focal point for noncommercial, good, interesting and unique theatre" and hopes to revitalize campus interest in such classic playwrights as Shakespeare and Moliere.

If a student in any faculty wishes to produce a play in the Guild Theatre in the future, he can present his ideas to the Executive. If they approve of his project, the Guild will back his production in terms of financial, technical and even directorial assistance.

The theatre was designed and furnished this past summer with the help of the Ontario Opportunities for Youth sponsored Kingston Community Theatre and other student enthusiasts. In now offers a workable theatrical space with moveable seating for 40 or 60 people and several stage exposures, ranging from the conventional proscenium to total audience interaction and involvement.

To further the influx of enthusiasm and energy the Guild will also offer technical workshops in lighting, set design and construction, make-up and costumes. These workshops will be held at the theatre and further exposure to technical aspects will be provided through Guild productions during the term.

A creative drama and mime workshop will b held each Sunday afternoon from 3 to 5 p.m., beginning the first week of October.

Throughout the year, the Guildhall Theatre will have its doors wide open to give all who are interested the opportunity of exploring the theatrical potential of both space and movement. It will also mount experimental and innovative productions involving dance and drama.

Students should submit manuscripts, director's layouts and any ideas for productions to the Guild theatre executive. Contact Paul Moulton at 544-5453 or Eleanor Crowder at 544-6347.

An OPEN HOUSE at the Guildhall Theatre will be held on Sunday, September 24, from 2:30 to 5:00 pm. The theatre is located above the Tumbleweed Craft Shop and refreshments and the opportunity to meet the executive and purchase memberships ($2) will be possible then.

Bus trips to Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal are also being planned by the Theatre Guild in order to view shows.

The London Theatre Tour will again be sponsored during reading week, February 18 - 26, 1973. Transportation accommodation and tickets to seven shows are included in the $270 cost, $295 for non-students.

Further information about the trip can be obtained by phoning 547-3177 between 9:30 and 11:00 am, Monday through Friday.

Division of Concerts branches out

The Division of Concerts is a programming office for the performing arts for the total university and the Kingston community. As its name implies, music is its major concern. It sponsors the two major classical concert series - the Grant Hall and the Dunning Hall Series.

The concerts of the Vaghy String Quartet, Artists-in-Residence, are administered by the Division of Concerts. Other special concerts are arranged during the year.

During the past year the Division of Concerts has expanded into other art forms. It presented a dance recital in July and in conjunction with the French Area Studies Centre presented French Theatre. Another theatre production will be on Thursday, November 23rd when Beaumarchais' "Le Barbier de Seville" will be performed by Le Treteau de Paris at MacArthur Auditorium.

The Division of Concerts operates a box office for many cultural events on campus. The box office is located in the Agnes Etherington Art Centre and is open during gallery hours. At present tickets for the Grant and Dunning Hall Series, the AMS concerts, the Film Department Film Series, the Graduate Students Society Film Series and the French Theatre production are currently on sale, and Drama Department production tickets may possibly be sold there.

In the past year the Division of Concerts has expanded into lectures and now administers the residency programme of the Chancellor Dunning Trust lectures. Between October 23rd-26th, Raymond Moriyama, Toronto architect, Garrett Hardin, biologist from the University of California at Santa Barbara and Ian McHarg, landscape architect from the University of Pennsylvania will be on campus to discuss "Social Problems in Environmental Reform" in public evening lectures and in seminars with various departments during the day.

The Division of Concerts was established in 1965 and Dr. Grant Sampson was in charge of it until 1971. Mr. Barry Cole has since taken over its operation.

This year, CFRC will be offering on Friday evenings at 7:30 a 15 minute capsule program with Barry Cole as moderator. This program will provide interviews, and excerpts from the works of comtemporary composers.

The Vaghy String Quartet

the Grant Hall Series which begins with the Juilliard String Quartet on Thursday October 5. The lectures take place in Dunning Hall at 8 pm.

The Department of Music, which is temporarily housed in the Interim Administration Building on Stuart Street, will be moving to the New Music Building, which is going to be located on the site of Goodwin House, which was torn down last spring, on Queen's Crescent.

Also under the joint auspices of the Drama Department the Department of Physical and Health Education and the Department of Music, Mr. Donald Himes will be doing Eurythmic workshops with students of Music.

The most applicable epigram could encapsulate the philosophies and the activities of the Department of Music would be "a state of constant change". In fact Professor I. Anhalt stated emphatically that "change is our normal state". Professor Anhalt, Head of the Music Department since 1971 spoke very enthusiastically about the future of the department and stated, "I am most interested in students who are not in the Bachelor of Music program to perform in our various groups and ensembles." He was extremely delighted with the first overseas summer program offered in Venice this past summer in Renaissance and Baroque studies and hopes that this new program will continue in future years.

Department of Music

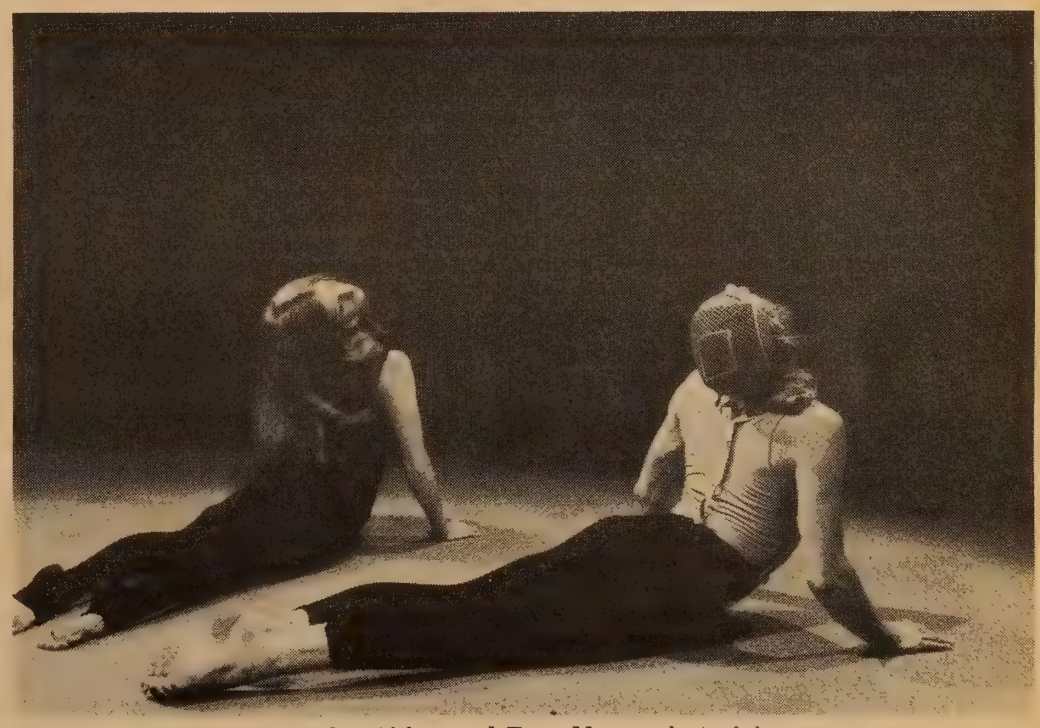
From 1936 to 1964 the Department of Music was a one man operation, which offered three elective courses, in analysis, traditional harmony and counterpoint. In 1964, one more professor was added to the department and seven courses were offered in theory, practise and performance, as well as the original courses. In 1969 the department grew from two to five professors and the department offered three different degree programs to students interested in concentrating in the study of music. Basically though, music studies at Queen's falls into three categories, choral-instrumental, history-literature and theory-composition. Although performance is an integral part of the study of music, the emphasis in this field leans towards chamber music and ensemble performance.

The department of Music offers seven different opportunities for students to gain performance experience through participation in the Choral Ensemble, the Chamber Singers, and Collegium Musicum, the Wind Ensemble, the Band, the Improvisation Group and the Chamber Orchestra.

Under the auspices of the Department of Music the Division of Concerts offers a varied program of recital, lecture-recitals, and lectures on music, but the Music department, in its own right also schedules lectures and recitals in conjunction with the Division of Concerts. On Wednesday October 18th Professor Sur will be lecturing on "Ah-Ahk" a troupe of musicians and performers from Korea, on Wednesday, November 22, Professor Maust will speak about the Waverly Consort, and on Wednesday February 7, Professor Anhalt will s,eak about vocal recitalist, Cathy Berberian. All the concerts mentioned are in

Modern Dance Company

Last April, three original compositions for modern dance were presented in the Studio Theatre of the Drama Department. The presentation was so successful that it was held over an extra evening, and still people had to be turned away. Sandra Aitken, who choreographed the program and whose four dancers had been taking evening classes with her for the better part of the school year, has started, this year a Queen's Modern Dancy Company which will be in constant training and which will present programs in the University and possibly outside it.



Billy Buxton, who engineered the electronic musical compositions of last April's program will also be working with Miss Aitken this year, as well as Tony Morgan, one of her original dancers.

Miss Aitken hopes to be able to use thematic approaches with her company, which will consist of five dancers, as well as integrating the facilities of the Electronic Studio in the Music Department, with the help of David Keane.

"We are interested in doing Master classes", she stated "where people can watch an instructor demonstrate various mechanical manoevers and a student attempts to imitate them." She also expressed interest in doing Dance Drama, and a modern media show, "we're wide open and will try to be as versatile and we can." Whey her grant from the Recreational Services Department arrives, Queen's will officially have its own Resident Dance Company, but in the meantime, Miss Aitken and Tony Morgan are in training at the moment,in the Guildhall Theatre.

Dance at Queen's will be available to students at a beginners level as well under Miss Aitken's tutelage. As has been the practise for the past four years she will be teaching movement and modern dance at the dance studio in the Physical Education Centre on Wednesdays from 5:30 to 7:00 pm throughtout the school year. There is no registration fee and those interested need only come to the first class to ensure a place. This class is open to all.

Under the Recreational Services "Sports Skills" program

Sandra Aitken and Tony Morgan in training

Miss Aitken will be teaching classes during the day in slots 11 and 2 (Mondays and Thursdays) in the Dance Studio from October 2 until December 8. Registration for these courses will be from September 18 to 22 from 1:30 to 4:30 pm in the Main Lobby of the Physical Education Centre. This program is oriented more towards Modern dance than movement. The classes will be smaller and are open, as well, to all who are interested, for a nominal fee.

And finally, within the school of Physical and Health Education Miss Aitken will be teaching the level 1 Modern Dance course which will include Folk dance.

She mentioned that Donald Himes will be teaching Eurhythmics within the Phys Ed program and she stated that "Dance must be approached as a language," wherein the body as a whole can communicate ideas, feelings and can tell a story.

Dance has never been an integral part of the cultural activities of Queen's, but with Miss Aitken's interest and ability, as was shown last April, it could very well be.

'Anyone interested and experienced, who is interested in joining the Queen's Modern Dance Company should contact Miss Sandy Aitken at 544-4815.

Film Department makes fast history

In 1967 Peter Harcourt was asked by the English Department of Queen's to teach a course in film. The course was so heavily subscribed and so popular that in 1969, Robin Wood, described by Harcourtas "A very prolific guy", came to assist in setting up a Department of Film Studies.

Today, a far cry from the first film course which was an introduction to the Europeon Cinema, four professors and instructors offer nine courses in American, Europeon, and Silent Cinema, plus various critical approaches to them.

In the study of film, practical and theorectical approaches are difficult to separate and in 1968, a production club, the Queen's Cine Guild, was formed to produce 8mm films. When these were finished and screened at the Arts Centre' " a lot of creative rubbish" Mr. Harcourt described, a precedent had been set and a 16mm unit was set up to make semi professional films.

These because known as Quarry Films and several of them, including a film of the Vaghy String Quartet and a film about Andre Bailer are now in the NFB film library.

The Department of Film Studies in located on Stuart Street in an old and unpretentious house called Film House. Two cinema subscription series are offered in the first term. The American Screen Masters Series, which begins Thursday September 21 at 9.00 pm in Ellis Hall with "The General" starring Buster Keaton, 1926. Other films included in this series which costs $5 for students and $8 for non students and includes 12 films, are Orson Wells' Macbeth, Vincente Minelli's Meet Me In St. Louis and Leo McCarey's The Awful Truth.

Le Cinema Quebecois, a series of representative films made by outstanding filmmakers of Quebec, begins Tuesday September 26 at 9.00 pm in Ellis Hall and runs through November 28, every week for the same price as the American Screen Masters Series.

The Queen's Cine Guild, not the one that made 8mm films in 1968, also runs the Campus Movies program every Thursday in the Dunning Hall Auditorium at 7 and 9.30 pm. This series begins on September 21 with Breathing Together: Revolution of the Electric Family starring Abbie Hoffman, Jerry Rubin and Timothy Leary. Admission is $1 per person.

The film program and the activities which revolve around the department are open to any interested students and faculty.

Queen's television

Although Queen's University has a very sophisticated television studio, with 12 cameras, 5 of broadcast quality, very few people ever get a chance to use the facilities. QTV is according to Barbara Lazier, the station manager, "basically a teaching devise" used in various ways by the Mathematics and Biology, Psychology, Medical, Psychiatric, Engineering and Law Departments as well as the Kingston General Hospital. There are six full time technicians, about 30 part time students and a Production Manager, Kevin Nagle, who produce seminars, practise interviews, and lectures through miles of cable in Earl Hall, where the studio is located on the third floor.

Since 1964 when the television station was opened basically to teach biology by close circuit, when classes were too large to be accomodated in one classroom the uses of it have become more diverse and helpful to students and teachers alike.

Lorne Greene announcing at CFRC last year

As both a self evaluative and informative medium it is being used more and more by many of the faculties on campus. Mrs. Lazier states, however, that there are "many more areas which haven't been touched because Professors are not really comfortable yet with television, since it wasn't used in their own educational experience. People seem to be terribly intimidated, frightened by what television can do." Some urges them not to be. "It's a new and thrilling experience, which has barely scratched the surface of its educational and cultural possibilities."

Unfortunately though, space is a real problem for QTV, and because of this, and financial limitations television programming for drama, and other more artistic endeavours hasn't often been attempted.

If students are interested in using the television medium and if the faculty with which they are working has set funds aside for the use of the studio and equipment then arrangements can be made to book it, however, only the television production crew can actually handle the equipment.

QTV has, in the past, gone out on location to shoot various sports events, the Fort Henry Guard, the Police show and the opening of the new Police Building. Open heart surgery was taped at Kingston General Hospital several years ago and several English Students produced a play in which children did the acting. Often, in lieu of presenting a written paper visual presentations are produced for television in the mathematics and biology departments. But, Mrs. Lazier urged students to book the studio well in advance so that faculty budgets would allow for the use of the equipment and the facilities.

Although not all buildings are equipped to show programs which have been taped either on campus or from commercial stations, the television station has an extensive library of films and series, such as BBC's "Six Wives of Henry the Eighth", which students can arrange to see when the equipment is not being used for teaching. Friday afternoon is usually a good time.

Finally, Mrs. Lazier urged both students and faculty to inquire about the Queen's Television station and stated, "at some point T.V. should be part of a course, in communications, maybe in the future."

CFRC to celebrate 50th anniversary

Queen's television on location

In 1922 as an electrical engineering experiment, Queen's radio, CFRC, made its first broadcast. On October 20, 1972, CFRC will be celebrating its fiftieth anniversary with a special documentary and historical broadcast which will trace all CFRC developments and activities in the past half century, since its inception.

This year, regular programming on both 1490 AM and 91.9 FM will continue from Thursdays until Sundays at times listed in the CFRC Program Guide, which can be obtained at the CFRC station in the basement of Carruthers Hall.

Some new FM programming is planned, including Barry Cole's Concert Capsule, and the 1972 Salzburg Festival, among others. Fine Arts at 91.9, as it is called "provides a service to Kingston radio listeners as well as training and involving students in something they can't get elsewhere," stated Station Manager Andrew Marshall. "The Queens radio stated on 1490 AM", he continued, "gives students youth oriented and intelligent programming which reflects the vitality of Queen's University."

Enrollment down across Ontario but not at Queen's

by Allan Frizzell

Preliminary indicators suggest that a further decline in university enrollment could adversely affect budgeting plans in many institutions for the coming year.

Several universities now face the prospect of failing to reach even their pessimistic estimates on student numbers and a result could be forced to curtail expenditure on academic projects.

Clearly concerned about the ramifications of this bleak financial prospect is the Canadian Association of University Teachers (CAUT) whose assistant executive secretary, Donald Savage, has predicted that some members will face non-renewal of contracts this year.

Another area which could be hard hit is aid to graduate students through teaching and research assistantships.

One Ontario government source suggests that frustration and alienation of young people from the education are primarily responsible for the decrease in enrollment. A degree is no longer regarded as a passport to job nor can the increased tuition fee be expected to boost student numbers.

Shootfalls in enrollment have resulted in Carleton President Michael Oliver to forecast a budgeting deficit of $1.3 million. He cited increased costs especially in tuition as being the major deterrent to student enrollment.

Fortunately, Queen's will probably not be affected by this general decline in entrants since Vice-Principal (for Academic Affairs) Harrower indicates that early reports confirm that enrollment here is on target. The only faculty with openings is in fact Applied Science which would appear to be a universal phenomenon across Canada. Nor does he feel that this is likely to be a problem for the university in future years since there are always many more applications than actual places.

Some academics have suggested that in the long term an enrollment decline may have positive benefits. It could relieve already overstretched facilities and ensure that only motivated students will occupy valuable university places. However, if you happen to be a faculty member facing redundancy or a graduate student whose financial assistance is to be cut these long term probabilistic advantages may not provide much consolation.

Another contest for Queen's urban car

The Student Competitions on Relevant Engineering, Inc. (SCORE) and the Association of Professional Engineers of Ontario have announced that they will be sponsoring creative projects for undergraduate engineers this year.

The SCORE sponsored project, named SAF (Student Against Fires) is being initiated to encourage students in Applied Science to design and construct innovative proto-types of equipment to 'advance the state of the art of fighting fires'.

The emphasis in the SAF project is on the quality and practicality of student initiated solutions to problems being encountered in the 1970's.

SCORE is also planning to hold an international symposium at the end of the fall term, with representatives from universities, industry and government.

Last year's urban vehicle competition, climaxed by the testing of 65 student entries at the General Motors Proving Grounds was also a SCORE sponsored project.

Engineering student Tim Secord stated that the great success of the vehicle competition has led students of the University of Nevada to seek out means of continuing it. They are presently seeking out sponsors.

The Eastern Region of the Association of Professional Engineers of Ontario as special fiftieth anniversary project is sponsoring a contest to design an urban centre.

The centre designed for a location in Northern Ontario, is to be a fully planned community. New industries consisting of three major firms and supporting secondary activities are interested in participating in the planned centre. The primary, secondary and tertiary sectors will altogether support a population of 50,000 people.

The participants must solve the housing, educational, transportation and communication as well as recreational problems of the community, in addition to designing a complete pollution control system.

The purpose of the competition is to encourage innovative design on an interdisciplinary level among undergraduate engineering students.

It is to be a co-operative effort on the part of a number of students having different specific interests. The project was designed to be of 'significant social value' on a topic of 'current and significant interest to the Engineering Profession in Canada'.

The judges will select three winning entries and award certificates to each undergraduate member of the winning teams.

The contest conditions and site detail have already been mailed. Registration closes on October 6 and entries must be submitted by January 31, 1973.

Students withhold fees

Most students at Carleton University appeared to be withholding their second installment of tuition fees this week, while University of Ottawa student representatives urged their students to follow suit, despite the school's withdrawal from the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS).

OFS is organizing the appeal to withhold the second installment to provide the possibility of a fees strike in January. The strike would be designed to force the Ontario government to retreat from tuitiin fee increases announced last spring.

Carleton Student's Association president Bruce Cameron estimated that 75 per cent of returning students registered by paying in installments. The "overwhelmingly good response" confirms original plans to seek cancellation of classes for a province-wide day of study of the issues October 10, Cameron said.

Meanwhile, University of Ottawa student council president Peter Beach said his organization supported the OFS campaign because it had no choice. In summer meetings Beach had demanded an immediate fee strike in September but most other student councils opted for the more cautious installment-paying approach.

"Definitive exhibition of year"

by Paula David

The results of long and careful planning provided a rare treat for local art connoisseurs at the Agnes on Tuesday night. Approximately two-hundred people attended the opening of "Realism: emulsion and omission", a look at the changing vitality of Canadian contemporary art trends. Such notables as Curnoe, Breeze and Chambers were represented. The emphasis of the collection is on the influence of photography and to divide it into these three categories: 1) Art companies and Communication Art 2) Human behaviour as represented in various tableaux 3) Camera influence on contemporary realistic painting

In view of this concept, the show is one of the most versatile and comprehensive viewed by this writer. Margreet Kluyver-Cluysenaer, who spent almost a year organizing it for the Art Centre, has gathered several of the most exciting and individualistic contributions of contemporary Canadian artists. The collection will encourage even the most skeptical nationalists to believe Canadian art is coming into its own. An excellent catalogue, compiled by Mrs. Kluyver-Cluysenaer, is available at the desk.

The N. E. Thing Company Ltd., the first Canadian legal art company, "the number one ICOM consultant in visual communications .... imagineering" is represented by their official stamp and seal. The introduction of art companies in 1968, has provided an information source for artists across Canada, using mostly photographic material as a means of communication.

One of Canada's more popular artists, John Chambers, of the London school, is showing recent work that is growing and developing in both refinement and sensitivity. His oil on wood of "Diego Sleeping" 1972, captures a moment in time and fills it with such poignancy and reverence, that it leaves the realm of photography or memory, becoming an entity unto itself. Chambers uses the photographic process as a stepping stone to explore colour separation, human involvement and uninvolvement, all in various media.

Another fascinating artist in the show is Joe Fafard, from Saskatchewan. Mr. Fafard works with clay, glazes and acrylic paint to produce delightfully 'real', tactile miniature figures that capture the imagination of the viewer. Fafard is a relatively new and refreshing figure on the Canadian art scene, and the strength and perception radiating from his sculpture must be seen to be appreciated.

"Waltzing Couple" 1969, polyester resin and acrylic; life size, by Claire Hogenkamp.

Also a sculptor, Claire Hogenkamp shows her "Waltzing Couple", 1969, a life size polyester resin and acrylic study. Here the reminder of omission in realism is felt, for while the figures are highly stylized, the overall effect prompts one to excuse himself when bumping into the pair.

Mrs. Kluyver-Cluysenaer has planned this show carefully and deliberately, showing a sense of humour, and a keen understanding of the meaning of realism in Canadian art. Bill Muysson, assistant curator of the Gallery, installed the show so that the theme and coherence of the works are shown to their best advantage.

Barry Lord, well known Canadian art critic and historian, delivered a preparatory lecture prior to the official opening of the show. His witty, lively and often very single-minded slide lecture provided stimulating food for thought when viewing the collection. The lecture covered the development towards realism in art, and the discovery of the Canadian artists position in this trend. The audience responded most favourably to Mr. Lord's wide range of knowledge and involvement in his topic. Terminology defining aspects of realism was discussed, along with a critical survey of contemporary art and predictions for future directions of art in Canada. Mr. Lord commended the Art Centre for providing Kingston with "the potential definitive exhibition of the year."

With this in mind, "Realism: emulsion and omission" will be at the Agnes Etherington Art Centre until October 22, and is highly recommended for anyone interested in painting, sculpture, photography, Canadian life, contemporary thinking, or just a purely enjoyable experience.

Another wad of intercollegiate practices started this week: Archery and Field Hockey for the women, and Badminton, Fencing, Gymnastics, Judo, Swimming, Waterpolo, and Wrestling for men. Archery practices go outdoors at the stadium from 7:00 to 9:00 pm daily, and indoors in the projectile range for the same hours. Field hockey is at the West Campus from 6:00 to 7:30 pm daily.

Swimming and Waterpolo practices are in the pool (natch) from 6:00 to 7:30 pm and 10:00 to 11:30 pm respectively. Wrestling and Judo have the Combatives Room for 5:30 to 7:00 and 7:30 to 9:30, while Barry Brooker's gymnasts work out between 5:00 and 6:30 in the gymnastics mezzanine. Badminton occupies the Bartlett gym from 8:45 to 11:30 pm, and Fencing gets the dance studio from 5:30 to 7:30 pm. All these practices are now underway, but new faces would certainly be welcome.

On the subject of new faces, and the search therefor, Queen's Journal Sports will be happy to run brief promotional articles for recreational athletic clubs, provided said articles are reasonably well written, and we know about them far enough in advance to budget space for them. If your club wants such an article run, have your information or publicity officer talk to me before he or she writes the story. Drop into the Journal office Sunday or Wednesday evening (preferably Wednesday) and we can discuss what is needed.

Turning to the weekend's action, the football Gaels face a stiff test in their home opener against Ottawa U. this Saturday. Kickoff is at 2:00 at Richardson, so follow the band in what has become a traditional parade to the stadiuum.

The Gee-Gees dumped Toronto 24-7 last Saturday, and showed a very different face from the one presented here last season. Bomb-thrower Norm Lukey found the going in first year law a little too tough, but his replacement, Dan Smith (he played for McGill way back when), throws long just as well and is considerably more mobile. The big difference is on the ground. Last year, Ottawa U. ran the ball just about as much as they threw it, with most of the ground game being directed to the outside. This year, with the aquisition of Neil Lumsden, a crunching 6', 230-lb fullback from Toronto, the Gee-Gees run inside, and stay on the ground about 65 per cent of the time. Lumsden also punts, placekicks, and kicks off, so the Gaels' old-time kicker-remover play could be useful. On defence, Ottawa is big (they have one defensive end who is an imposing 6'3" and 270 lb.) and reasonably quick. Their pass rush is excellent, although Toronto had some success running to the outside against them. The Gaels' offensive line needs a big game Saturday, since the more we control the ball, the fewer chances Smith has to throw bombs to our old friend Barry St. George. His short passing game is not as sharp as it might be, so deep stuff is the main concern.

Mike O'Shaughnessy - back from injured list

The Gaels can move the ball against anyone if the offensive line is putting out, so look for a tough ball game. Speed merchant Gord McLellan should be back, as will defensive lineman Mike O'Shaughnessy. Look for O'Shaughnessy to start at DT with Paul Hand moving over to offence in place of injured centre Tom Dickinson; Greg McNamera, a quality but oft-injured rookie will probably see some action on the offensive line as well. The only other change may come on defense, where Dane Tutton will probably start at safety in place of Doug Cozac, who has an injured neck. This shouldn't stop him from kicking, though, and rookie Will Kennedy is capable if Cozac can't make it.

Just to be nervy, I'll call the Gaels by 6 points in a hell of a tough defensive ball game. . . if our offense pulls its weight.

The Bews Program gets underway this week with Golf being the first event on the schedule. Next week, soccer entries will be accepted - the deadline being noon on Thursday, Sept. 28. The season will begin on Monday, Oct. 2. Students should watch the notice boards in the main locker room for schedules and information.

It is up to the athletic sticks to organize the events and to select the managers and coaches for their teams. All athletic sticks should register with Bob Carnegie and pick up their handbooks as soon as possible. Athletic sticks are still needed for Arts and Science Grads, Business Grads, Chemistry Grads, and Engineering Grads. Anyone interested should contact Dave McLean at 5579 or 542-5828 anytime after 6:00 pm.

This year, three new sports are being added to the Bews program. They are track and field relays, inner-tube waterpolo and monsterball. Two of these - waterpolo and monsterball - were introduced as part of the athletic afternoon for the Arts and Science Orientation program. From what I saw, both these sports should be very popular at Queen's.

Entries for several events will close next week; monsterball and tug-o-war close Sept. 25, with the tug-o-war tournament being scheduled for Sept. 26th on the Outer field, and the monsterball tourney for the 27th, at the same location. Rugby and softball entries close next Thursday, Sept. 28, with both these leagues beginning play on Monday, October 2. Flag football, horseshoes, and singles tennis entries will also close on the 28th, with play commencing on the Monday.

The A.M.S. requires one male undergraduate from any faculty to sit on the Recreation Services Committee as a representative of the A.M.S. Anyone interested in the position is invited to see the recreation coordinator, Mr. Howard Pearce, as soon as possible.

Next week, we'll have the results from the golf tournament, and more news about Bews.

World: Israelis push out Lebanese guerrillas

ISRAEL — Israeli forces have ended a search and destroy mission against Arab guerrillas in Lebanon, after destroying 150 commando houses and bunkers and killing 60 terrorists.

Last weekend the Israelis launched a raid on land and in the air in reprisal for the killing of eleven Olympic team members at Munich and recent guerrilla raids across the Lebanese border. Sixteen Arab villages and eight guerrilla encampments, as well as two commando headquarters were raided and bombed in the action.

The main purpose of the raid, Israeli officials claimed was to push the guerrillas back from the border areas and to force the Lebanese government to take definite action in policing its own side of the frontier. The Israeli command claimed that only three Israelis were killed and six wounded in the raid.

QUANA, Lebanon — The Lebanese government has decided to take action to forestall any further Israeli attacks in its southern region. The Lebanese army moved into the area shortly after Israeli forces withdrew and set up roadblocks while generally building up its presence. The major objective of the Lebanese government was to restrict Arab commando movements along their border with Israel and also claimed it was a matter of "public pride".

A commando statement issued in Damascus, Syria complained that the Lebanese army roadblocks were designed "to prevent the Palestinian forces from returning to their regular positions." Many of the estimated 3,000 guerillas in Lebanon had fled northward during the Israeli raids.

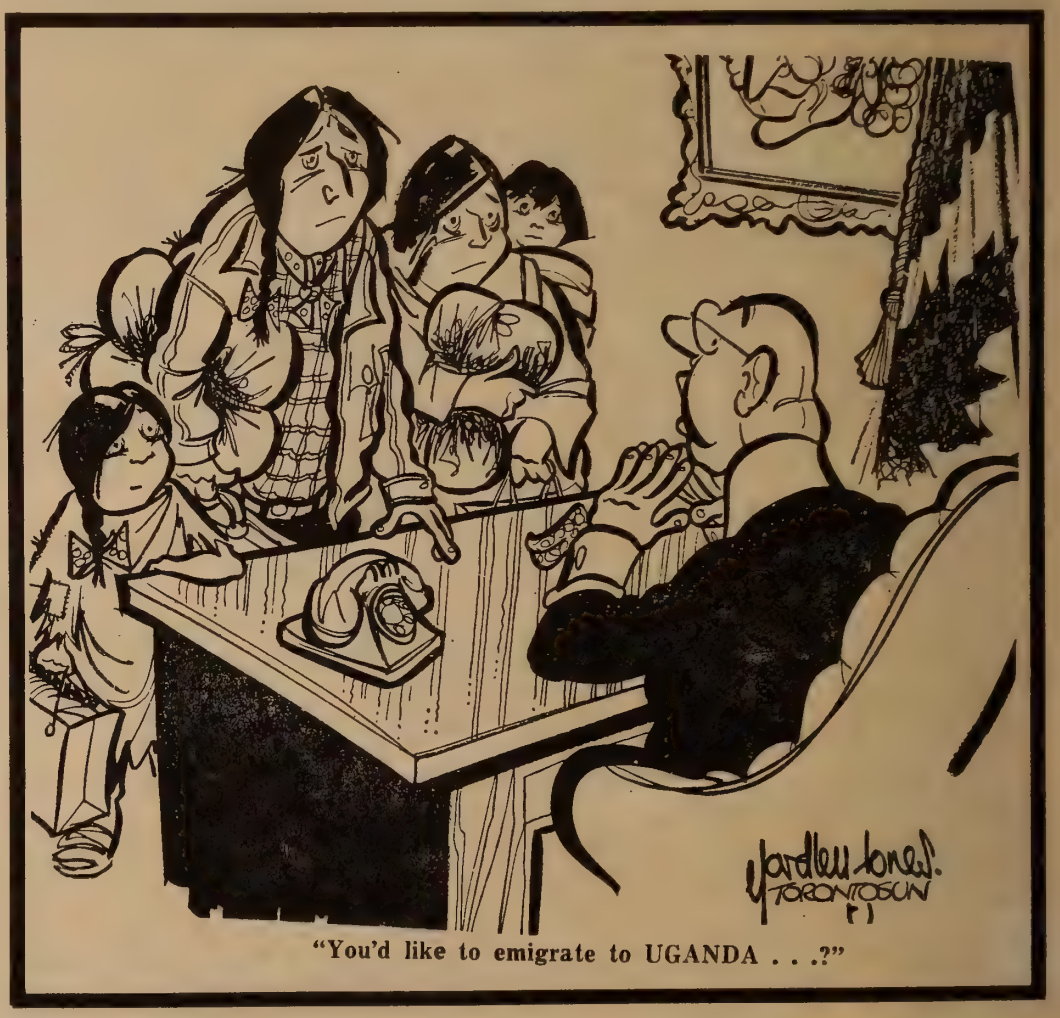
KAMPALA, Uganda — Ugandan forces have repulsed an invasion along its southern border which threatened to overthrow the government of President Idi Amin, in an attempt to stop his plans for expelling thousands of Asian residents.

Enemy forces, which numbered 1,500, captured six southern Ugandan towns and reached to within 160 miles of the capital, before government troops could stop the attack.

Uganda officials claimed that the attack was launched by Tanzania and bombed a town in its northern area in a reprisal raid. However Tanzanian officials later denied the charge.

When the last of the six occupied towns had been recaptured and the enemy pushed back, the rebel forces had lost 300 men in the fighting. The leaders of the rebels had been planning to assassinate President Idi Amin, all members of his cabinet and officials in key positions in the government service.

DAR ES SALAAM, TANZANIA — President Julius Nyerere warned that Uganda's bombing raids into northern Tanzania constituted a "real urgent danger" to peace and that "murderous attacks of this nature cannot be without consequences".



UNITED NATIONS — Deputy Foreign Minister Stanislaw Trepczynski, newly inaugurated president of the world body opened the 27th General Assembly with bitter criticism of the Vietnam war. Claiming that it violates every rule of ethics, Trepczynski told the 132 nation body that "the war cannot be justified any longer on logical grounds by any stretch of the imagination."

The new President, second to come from a communist country, was elected to succeed Foreign Minister Adam Malik of Indonesia. Security of the world, he stated, continues to be inadequate and the overriding duty of the United Nations is to free the world from the spectre of war and "the organized forms of mass murder".

LONDON, ENGLAND — The first Asians to be airlifted from Uganda have arrived in England and have been given preliminary interviews for job placement and housing. The 189 arivees were mainly members of Uganda's tradesman and skilled-worked class and were generally well provided for.

NASSAU, Bahamas — Prime Minister Pindling's Progressive Liberal Party received an overwhelming mandate to take the Bahamas into complete independence from Britain in a landslide general election victory. The P.L.P. took 27 of the 38 seats in the Parliament's House of Assembly and are expected to take two more. The opposition Free National Movement, which opposed the independence move as a drastic and unnecessary step, received only 7 seats. They claimed that independence for the Bahamas would ruin the country's economy by scaring away foreign investors.

Prime Minister Pindling promised that the Bahama's would gain complete sovereignty by July 10, 1973, but that they would remain a member of the Commonwealth. Britain currently holds control over the islands' foreign affairs and defence.

Canada: Sesame returns

KINGSTON — Sesame Street, the children's educational show, is to return to CKWS television next Monday. It was cancelled on September 11 after the Canadian Radio and Television ruling on foreign content. Only fourteen CBC stations continued to carry the programme while twenty stations including CKWS cancelled. Letters and phone calls numbered in the thousands, station program director Lorne Freed stated. A group of Kingston mothers were planning a demonstration in front of the CKWS TV station for next Monday.

SARNIA — Fifty to sixty Ugandan Asians are to settle in Sarnia within the next few weeks. According to Woody Hammond, Sarnia Canada Manpower manager, the immigrants are generally well educated and all can speak very good English. Most are capable of setting up their own business, Hammond said.

EDMONTON - The Committee for an Independent Canada, formed in 1970 to give disatisfied nationalists a united voice, held its first policy conference with 150 delegates attending.

The two and a half day meeting considered more than twelve policy proposals, but reached little accord on many areas. An official statement is expected in about a week from CIC headquarters in Toronto.

Committee Chairman Edwin A. Goodman, former National Chairman for the Progressive Conservative Party, stated that the group did manage to establish basic goals. Among those agreed upon was Canadian control of foreign subsidiaries in Canada, devaluation of the Canadian dollar to eighty-five cents to permit a flexible rate of exchange, cessation of tax privileges for resource-based industries, an ending to American domination of Canadian unions and the establishment of all Canadian officers in university administrations.

OTTAWA — The New Democratic Party has come under fierce attack from all three other major political parties, as a result of Leader David Lewis' campaign against "corporate rip-off".

Lewis claimed that tax concessions and deferments to apparently well-to-do companies such as Imperial Oil have totalled to $3.6 billion, an amount on which, $180 million dollars yearly could be gained in interest.

Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau on a hot line show in Halifax replied that Lewis was using statistics which deal with the time before tax loopholes were plugged by federal legislation. Lewis later replied that the legislation mentioned by Mr. Trudeau would not be taking full effect until 1977.

Real Cauette, speaking in Calgary, stressed that "Lewis wants to get these corporations down but that won't improve the conditions of the working man".

Stanfield, on a tour of southern Saskatchewan, told voters not to waste ballots on the New Democratic Party as this election is crucial and only the Conservaties can overthrow the Liberal government.

KINGSTON — The Kingston Township Board has announced that it has approved a $200,000 land deal to acquire 117 acres of new lands for industrial development. The land purchased is to run in a narrow strip from just south of Highway 401, and east of Highway 38, and will join 130 acres of adjacent land purchased by the Council in 1964. The deal, still subject to the Ontario Municipal, Board's approval, is to be completed by June 1, 1973.

TORONTO — The province will release its analysis of the development prospects of Frontenac County and other eastern Ontario communities at a public meeting in Ottawa on October 3. It is looked upon as a possible first step toward regional government for eastern Ontario. The subject has been held off until now because of the large number of studies being undertaken by the Department of Municipal Affairs and a shortage of manpower. Speaker at the meeting will be Claude Bennett parliamentary secretary to the Ontario Treasurer.

KINGSTON — Final draft proposals are being swapped between the Royal Canadian Horse Brigade Association and Ottawa developer William Teron in an effort to resolve a land deadlock which has halted construction of a $30 million complex.

Teron maintains that part of the property owned by the R.C.H.A. lies at a strategic point in the proposed development of his complex on the Kingston waterfront and that he would have to withdraw the project if the land is not purchased.

Grad students fight increases in tuition

Graduate students across Ontario have made little progress in their fight against the $400 a year increase in tuition fees. The Council of Ontario Universities and University and Graduate Society presidents managed to persuade the government last May to allow universities to pick up $300 of the increase. However, this arrangement only applies to the current academic year. The amount which grad students are allowed to earn for teaching was raised from $1800 to $2400 a year but this increase benefits a very few.

Protest at Queen's began last April with a "day of mourning", designed as part of a province wide study project, in which 300 of the university's 800 graduate students participated. Two hundred signatures were placed on a telegram and sent to Minister George Kerr. This was followed by a demonstration at McArthur Hall during the opening ceremonies conducted by William Davis. The Graduate Student Society executive were given an audience with the Premier and shortly afterwards came the announcement of the $600 rise in the pay ceiling.

According to Doug Pritchard, President of the Graduate Student Society, "The present stategy of Graduate Societies in Ontario is to try to form a common front with undergraduates who also face a $100 fee increase this year." Pritchard also emphasized the necessity that all students understand the reasons behind the proposed OFS fee strike. "It is not to be construed simply as a protest against increased fees. The OFS stand is that any increase in fees, as indeed any important change in a university policy, should be related to an overall plan. Futhermore, it is essential that government consider the accessibilty of universities,, Pritchard said. The Report of Report of Admissions at Queen's showed that a disproportionate percentage of Ontario's university enrollment comes from families with an income over $15,000. The Ontario Committee on Student Awards pointed out that the lower ceilings on grants and the higher tuition fees contradict government statements on accessibility.

Prtichard remarked that he was disappointed that the AMS had not taken a strong stand in favour of the fee strike.

Loans made tougher

The provinces have established tough new regulations for the Canada Student Loan plan which could further restrict access to post-secondary education.

The regulations include a requirement for photostated copies of T-1 income tax forms of students and their parents to be included in loan applications. The forms are supposed to be private information for the Department of National Revenue but the law protects a citizen from misuse of that information only by that department and no other. If copies of the T-1 form are not provided, the loan will not be granted.

Some of the changes benefit students. The maximum annual loan was increased to $1400 from $1000, while the total borrowing limit was raised from $5000 to $7500.

But the most controversial new regulation requires students to save a certain amount of money from summer work. The exact amount is determined by a chart based on a student summer employment survey conducted in 1971 by the Department of Manpower and Immigration.

However, British Columbia government officials appear to be backing away after student protests over the rule began. Seymour Archibald, provincial student affairs department superintendent in Victoria, claimed that his department eased the regulations despite opposition from Ottawa. He said that expected earnings had been cut by $100 across the board.

The expected savings vary according to sex and the number of years of study completed. All student loan applications will be processed on the assumption that everyone worked during the summer. Students wishing to appeal the decision must do so through the appropriate provincial authority.

The Canada Student Loan Act was passed by the federal government in 1964 to allow more young people to attend post-secondary institutions. The act outlined certain minimum regulations the federal government felt were necessary.

Student awards processed in record time

According to D. Ellis, Assistant Registrar (Student Awards), the processing of Ontario Student Awards has been greatly sped up this year.

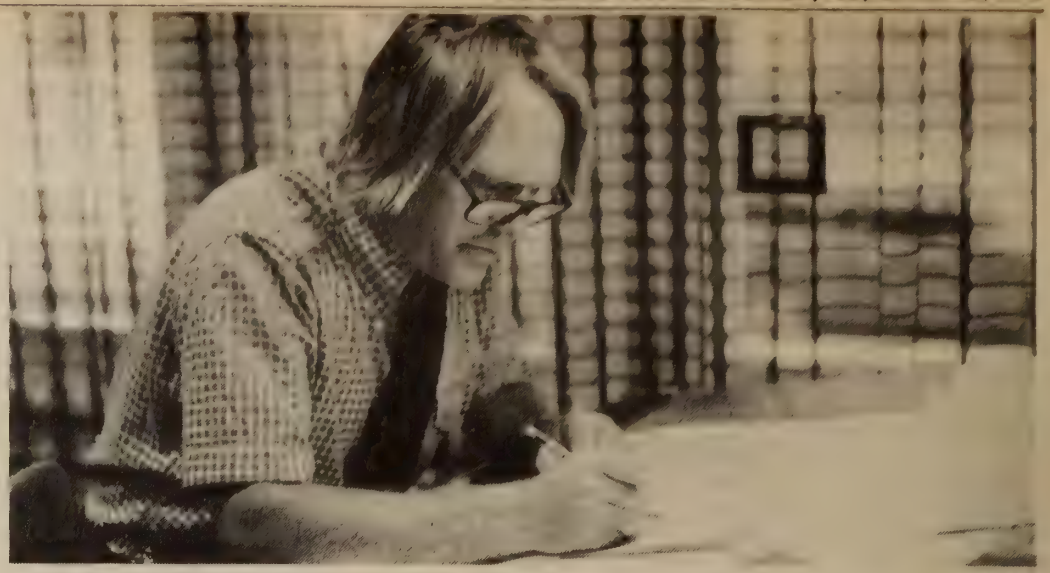
The reduction of the waiting period for Student Awards to four weeks has been attributed to overcoming difficulties in getting the computer operations moving. Ellis stated that since the computers were introduced to the operations two years ago, they have had to be reprogrammed twice.

By the beginning of September, Ellis estimated that about eight percent of the applications for awards had been received, compared with forty to fifty percent last year.

"A larger number of applications were found to be incomplete or poorly filled out this year", Ellis said. At least 680 of the 2,880 applications received by his office have had to be returned for these reasons he stated.

Because of the faster processing of the applications, the awards office has also been able to get ahead on appeals. These totalled about one hundred by the end of August.

The provincial government last March announced a cutback in the funds to be allocated to the Ontario Student Awards Programme, from $51 million to $34.8 million, a one-third decrease.



Part of this decrease has been reflected in the portion of the loan which is to be directed towards room and board. An applicant will now be assessed a maximum thirty dollars a week for lodging as compared to last year's policy of paying the actual rate.

This figure may reflect out of residence accommodation but it figures well below what those in residence are paying. Ellis stated that in instituting the new policy, the Awards Officers climed that residence living reflects a "heightened life style", being more a luxury than a necessity.

However, Ellis stated that he feels that residences have a vital role in the community, providing accommodation where none other exists. He expressed surprise in the fact that students have not reacted more strongly to the move. He said that forty percent of all applications for student loans came from students presently in residence. A student in residence may submit an application for review, Ellis claimed, but so far only one has been received.

The minister has lowered the age of independence from twenty-five to twenty-four benefitting about forty-five applicants, Ellis stated. Another important change in the structure of student loans this year is the increase in the miscellaneous expense allowance from eight dollars to nine dollars.

Dorn responsible for design improvements

For a year, Peter Dorn, Co-ordinating Director of Graphic Design at Queen's has worked quietly in his offices at 72 Queen's Cresent. Though little known by much of the Queen's community, Dorn has been responsible for many design improvements since he arrived at Queen's on September 1, 1971. The most noticeable one is the design of the academic calendars. These were previously handled by the individual faculties. This year Dorn co-ordinated the design and production of all faculty calendars. As a result, he was able to produce calendars which are cheaper and which look like they are all issued by Queen's. The type in each book is set by computer and by handling 12 calendars the designer is in a better bargaining position with the printer.

Dorn's appointment to the staff of Queen's was the result of a Senate committee report issued in May, 1970. The report commented that "the graphic image at Queen's University is fragmented, indistinct and deplorably undistinguished." "In order to place Queen's clearly and forcibly before the public and for reasons of simple economy, it is imperative that steps be taken immediately to make the most effective use of all graphic materials and designs," the report said.

Principal John J. Deutsch announced in July 1971 the appointment of Peter Dorn as co-ordinating Director of Graphics. Before coming to Queen's, Dorn was supervisor of typographical make-up at the University of Toronto Press. He has won 40 national and international awards for typographic excellence and design including Leipzig's "Most Beautiful Books" award and one from the Royal Canadian Academy.

"Design costs money but you get a good return on it," Dorn told the Journal. As Queen's must compete with other universities for graduate students a sign which will appeal to students most must reflect seriousness and quality. "If the sign attracts more qualified people then it is money wisely spent, he said.

At the Senate meeting this week, the office of graphic design will ask for approval of a special logo and typeface. "The word Queen's should appear in the same way" Dorn commented. A standard logo will embrace everything that is printed on signs and even trucks.

Dorn also suggested that the official crest of Queen's should be reserved for official documents of the university. "There are many places where it is used inappropriately, he said.

No more buildings planned says Gessel

by Richard Osler

Deputy Campus Planner Kurt Gessel stated on Friday that beyond the Health Science Complex and projected University Centre, his department had no further major building projects in the planning stages for the main campus.

His comments come at a time when Queen's Main Campus seems a maze of incohate buildings and plywood walls and when there is noticable student discontent over the rapid disappearance of open space on campus.

Gessel did mention however, that depending on needs beyond the next five or ten year period one could not definitely state how long such a static condition would exist. Also due to the fact that the joint Senate-Board of Trustees Committee on Campus Planning basically dictated their desires to his office (the office of the University Campus lanner) Gessel stated that he could not give an absolute comment on the matter as his group simply provides a resource service to the committee while they make the decisions and give the approval to long range plans.

Gessel sees his office as fulfilling two basic and necessary functions on campus. It provides a liason between planning committees on campus as well as liason with Kingston planning committees and other universities in Canada. This can be seen in all areas of physical development on Campus. His office was involved with the parking authority in its initial stages, and played a major role as liason in the decision to use the fill from the Underground Parking garage to extend the lake front between Collingwood and the Kingston General Hospital.

"The second function that of a problem solver", Gessel said. We attempt to find answers to obvious problems such as vehicular and pedestrian traffic, and the housing shortage.

Blood is Life - Pass it on!

Blood can't be manufactured.
Only people can give blood.

Twenty five years ago, the Canadian Red Cross established the Blood Transfusion Service to ensure that blood would be available when needed to save a life. In 1972, almost 1,000,000 units of blood must be collected to meet the blood needs of our hospital patients. The Queen's Engineering Society will do its part in this drive by holding the first of two blood clinics on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, October 3, 4, and 5 in the games room of Victoria Hall. The hours for the clinic will be 11:00 am to 2:00 pm, and 5:00 pm to 8:00 pm.

"Canadians need no longer worry about ...whether they will be be able to survive next to the Americans.

P.E. Trudeau
Toronto,
September 13, 1972

"Complacent attitudes, like those exhibited by the Prime Minister, may well lead to the disappearance of Canada's independence.

I will work for effective policies to deal with American ownership in Canada. This means changes in our tax, tariff and monetary policy to ensure that Canadian companies can compete with American-owned subsidiaries. Canada must have a Federal-Provincial screening agency to assist Canadians to regain control of key sectors of the economy."

Enumerators stepped 'out of line'

CUP — Canada's Chief Electoral Officer said in a statement made on September 19 that enumerators had stepped out of line when they prevented students from registering to vote in their university constituencies.

J. M. Hamel said enumerators "were going beyond their terms of reference" last week, when they subjected University of Western Ontario residence students to lengthy interrogations about their independence from their parents. Hamel also stated that "if a student tells the enumerator his ordinary residence is room 105 in a certain university residence well that's it . . If a student says he's on his own, then we'll have to accept that." Hamel's statement contradicted memoranda circulated to all district returning officers last January apparently advising them to discourage single students who wanted tovote in university ridings.

In his statement made on September 19 Hamel added that "There was a rumour that students were going to be subjected to a means test. But we simply cannot demand that. It is none of our business where a student gets financed. W don't care."

Hamel explained the problems have occurred because all 95,000 enumerators across Canada couldn't be expected to interpret guidlines from his office in the same way. This official report sent to local returning officiers drew a sharp distinction between students "away from home" and those "on their own".

"The only additional question we can ask a student is whether he would be willing to declare his university residence to be his ordinary residence under oath on election," Hamel said.

SVB has many areas of interest

Already this year the Student Volunteer Bureau has placed over 100 students in volunteer positions with social service agencies in Kingston. The SVB however, is constantly in need of more help.

To acquaint Queen's students with the kinds of programmes in which they may participate, an information night is being held this Wednesday night, October 4, at 7:30 p.m. in Stirling Hall.

Representatives from most of the agencies with whom the SVB deals will be present to explain their needs and answer students' questions.

There are four major areas for volunteer work: in the prisons, in the area of Youth Activities, Health Services, and Education and Recreation. Discussions on these four areas will be held simultaneously at 7:30 and 8:30 so that a student may attend the discussion on two of these areas.

The SVB needs you.

OFS re-affirms its intentions

CUP — The Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) executive on September 18 re-affirmed its intentions to hold a referendum in October for students to decide whether to withhold their second term tuition fee installment in January.

The fee boycott would be a protest against the Ontario government decision to raise tuition fees and cut back in student award grants.

The referendum will be held October 10-12 on all campuses belonging to OFS. The organization represents students councils at 13 universities and community colleges.

The referendum will ask students three questions:

1) Whether they endorse the OFS demands that tuition fee increases be deferred until full discussion with interested groups and publication of the final report of the Ontario Commission on Post-secondary Education, and that the Ontario Student Awards Program be ammended to allow part-time student eligibility and restore the $600 loan ceiling (recently raised to $800.)

2) Whether they agree to withhold their second installment of fees when it becomes due in January.

3) Whether they would be willing to withhold the entire tuition fee amount next year if tuition fees are again increased.

OFS will meet after the referendum results are known to decide on further action.

Alumni and students to meet

The Toronto branch of the Queen's Alumni Association has arranged a luncheon to take place prior to the Queen's-Toronto football game on Saturday, September 30. The purpose of he event is to bring together students as well as alumni of both Toronto and Queen's Universities.

Queen's alumni officer Murray Gill stated that over 5,000 invitations had been sent to University of Toronto alumni for the event.

The pre-game get-together will be held in the Drill Hall, 117-119 St. George Street, beginning at 12 noon. At game time, the cheerleaders and band will lead everyone to the stadium from the luncheon.

Tickets are $1.75 per person and are available at the door or in the Queen's University Alumni office located in the Students' Union.

Assistants look for labor union

CUP — Graduate students who teach at the University of Toronto may be organized into a labour union if a campaign being mounted by the Graduate Students Union is successful.

The GSU says the teaching assistants are unable to deal effectively with the U of T administration and feel that need to bargain collectively. The university refused voluntary recognition of the union last spring, claiming the Teaching Assistants wanted to organize only to be able to strike. The GSU denies the charge.

The Teaching Assistant's grievances include the lack of a university medical plan and other normal employee benefits such as workmen's compensation, lack of a teacher-training program, a disproportionate number of women teaching assistants, and little power over course content and tutorial size.

Unionized, the U of T Graduate Assistants Association (as the new union is called) could fight to change these situations as well as seek higher wages.

The decision to form a union was based on a recommendation in a report on graduate assistants passed by the GSU in May. The report says that 30 to 40 per cent of the teaching done at the U of T is done by teaching assistants.

If 65 per cent of the persons in the unit join the Association for the nominal $1 fee there should be immediate certification by the Ontario Labor Relations Board.

DSC Elections
Faculty of Arts and Science

All students registered in each course in each member Department of the Faculty of Arts and Science, or in each section of a course when a course is sectioned, are entitled to elect in a regular class session within the first two weeks of the beginning of classes, one student as Class Representative. The Class Representatives in each department will together constitute the Departmental Student Council (DSC) for that department. Membership in a DSC is not limited to students registered in the Faculty of Arts and Science. If an unsectioned course has more than 100 students, additional Class Representatives may be elected, one for every 100 students or fraction thereof.

Each Departmental Student Council will elect before October 6 one representative to the Arts and Science Faculty Board and forward the name of the elected member to the Secretary of the Faculty. The Nominating Committee of the Faculty at its meeting on October 6 will nominate student members of the Board to fill positions on the Admissions, Curriculum, Orientation, Nominating and Procedures Committees of the Faculty.

Retreat evaluates Meds program

by Sue de Stein

"The faculty is aware of the student's problems and of the discontent existing among the students. The do care," Murray Girotti third year medical student told the Journal after the Meds retreat held this past weekend in Dunning Hall.
Hall.

The retreat was organized in the hope of bringing together medical students and faculty to discuss various problems central to modern medical education.

Thirty faculty members representing a wide range of opinion, were invited to attend the retreat. Thirty students were also seclected to represent the opinions and ideas of the student body. The seminar-like retreat began on Friday at 2 p.m. and was ajourned at six o'clock Saturday afternoon.

The retreat consisted of three major presentations, each of which was followed by discussions in smaller groups, consisting of five students and five faculty members. After these smaller sessions, a representative from each group reported on the discussion and summarized the opinions of the smaller group in which they participated, to the larger body.

The first major subject area, presented by Dr. A.M. Bryans, dealing with systems of evaluation, proved to be the most controversial. The problem of evaluating students, staff and curriculum was examined. The value and the objectiveness of the present marking scheme was questioned.

At present, a student receives an A, B, C, D grade in each subject, a final average percentage and a ranking in the class. The abolishment of the final ranking would provide a step in the direction of a pass, fail, honours grading system, which is, in the eyes of the majority of both faculty and students, a step in the right direction.

The second major presentation by Sara Pritchard, a 3rd year student entitled Student, His Own Teacher, was concerned with systems of teaching. An entire philosophy of education was discussed and the value of lectures discussed.

All too often it seemed, the student in lectures has become a stenographer, the professors, merely spewer of facts. The success of the student was measured by his ability to regurgitate. It was felt that the implementation of audio visual aids and the use of pre lecture hand outs, would improve the quality of the presentations and increase interest. It was also the hope that the professor would no longer solely be a source of facts and that the student would be encouraged to do much work on his own, maintaining the guidelines set by the professors.

The theme of the third presentation, given by Dr. J.D.Hatcher, was "Clinical Science - Basic Science - a dichotomy?" Here it was felt that the gap between these two areas, in the first years of medical school, needed to be bridged in an attempt to introduce the student to the more clinical aspects of medicine earlier in his career.

Although it may be too early to evaluate the usefulness of such a "retreat", the general feeling among its participants, was one of optimism. Murray Girotti's final comment - "It was very fruitful," Girotti said.

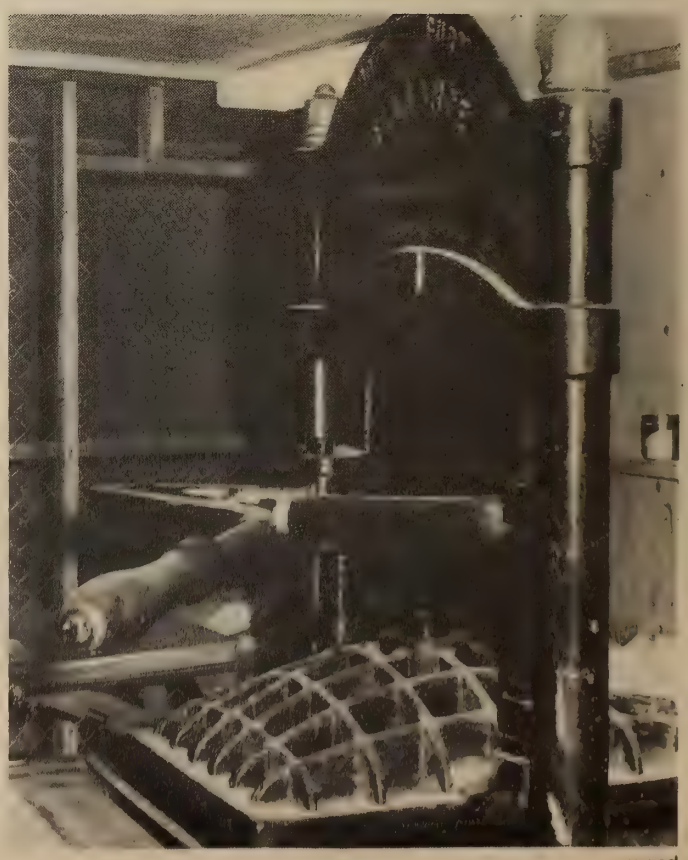
Queen's staff form association

One hundred and ten members of the non-academic staff at Queen's met on Thursday to consider a draft constitution and receive membership cards for a new association.

According to Evelyn Flint, a member of the six person steering committee, the new union has been designed to work in areas of concern to the staff members. It will provide for a grievance procedure not previously offered to staff members. In addition the new union will make an attempt to provide for a system of job transfers for its membership. A staff organization will also institute a system of career planning and advancement, Flint said.

She comments that the staff were avoiding unions such as CUPE because of the threat of strike. "While being archaic", she said, "strikes are no longer an effective threat to management and provide little that is useful for the members or the economy. The staff, she claimed wants a union that will work with management, and provide positive action.

The turnout for the first meeting was not large enough to provide a sufficient majority to pass a constitution, Flint said, so the goal has been set for three hundred signed memberships by October 2. Another meeting will then be held to pass the constitution.



Watson houses the 'cage press'

by Bonita Bowman

The basement of Watson Hall houses the little known "Cage Press" which is operating by Dr. W. C. Ferguson. It is used as a valuable teaching aid for both the English and the Art History Department. Signs have been printed with the press for use in the library, as well as two books which students printed for the Quarry Press.

The early twentieth century press originally came to Kingston's Whig Standard from Ottawa. When it became obsolete, it was given to Queen's and forgotten in the basement of Agnes Etherington Art Centre. Approximately four years ago Dr. Ferguson realized its potenial and had it moved to Watson Hall. Due to its solid cast-iron construction it was necessary to dismantle the press and carry it over piece by piece.

One wall of the "Cage" (walls of wire mesh protect the printing press) holds small drawers containing type that ranges from simple to ornate. Some of the type was purchased while some was donated by Maxwell Printers of Kingston. Also, a quantity of wooden type was found in a newspaper shop in Bowmanville, Ontario.

You Want to Make Beer...

Beer? Well, you better get your terms straight first. Do you, dear sir, already to dash off and buy hops and barley, know what beer is?

Answer: I't's a generic name covering a lot of alcoholic beverages. They differ in taste, colour and smell according to the ingredients that are boiled in water before fermentation starts. In this they differ from wine where these qualities develop during and after fermentation.

So there is lager which is light, yellow, translucent, has a high carbon dioxide content, contains three to four per cent alcohol by volume, and should be served cold.

This, says "Buzz" Arthurs, whose local Wine Art stores sell all the ingredients to the home beermaker, is what the average Canadian means when he says "beer".

The word "lager" holds a key to good amateur beermaking. It is a German word for storehouse where this kind of beer, made in fall, was kept all winter before use in the spring. "Those who fail to make good beer are the ones who want to drink it 48 hours after they've made it", says Mr. Arthurs.

Then there are Vienna, Munich, Bock, Weiss -- all different kinds of beer. Vienna is amber and has less hops than other beers. Munich is stronger than lager (5 per cent alcoholic content), dark brown and has more hops. Bock is darker than lager, and has a strong flavour. Weiss isn't made from barley at all, but wheat malt. It has less carbon dioxide than lager.

So what's beer? Ale, for one thing, which is dark, has 6 per cent alcoholic content, takes longer to make, and will last for several years in the bottle. Finally, there are porters and stout, malty and as black as licorice (stout actually contains some).

All of these beers are produced commercially by a sensitive and scientific series of processes. Barley is cleaned, graded, soaked, roasted to produce malt, and this is mashed to extract a liquid called wort.

The wort is filtered, hops are added and then removed, special yeasts are injected according to the type of beer being made, the mixture ferments for weeks, is chilled, clarified and "Finished" to give it a sparkling look.

All this before carbon dioxide is added, pasteurization, and bottling.

"If the home beermaker had to do all that, he would never enter our stores", says Mr. Arthurs.

Fortunately, he doesn't. He can by-pass th first half dozen, tricky steps by buying malt extract, or alternatively, he can spend under $4.00 for a starter kit where all the ingredients and instructions are included in one small box and the beer can be made up in an ordinary kitchen pail.

For the person who wants to start off in a more sophisticated way, here are the basic steps:

1. Preparation of yeast starter.
2. Making wort by boiling water, hops and malt extract.
3. Placing wort in a primary fermenting vessel, where sugar is dissolved in it, and it is allowed to cool.
4. Addition of yeast after specific gravity has been checked.
5. Regular checking of specific gravity during, fermentation period.
6. Transfer to a secondary fermenting vessel (with an air lock) after fermentation has slowed down.
7. Bottling.

This requires some simple equipment, all available at Wine-Art stores. To make five gallons of beer (that's 60 bottles), you will need:

A boiler in which to prepare the wort,
A primary fermenting vessel, which can be a stone crock, a small plastic tub, a plastic garbage can, large heavy-duty plastic bags;
Cheesecloth for straining;
A wooden spoon for stirring;
Five or six feet of rubber hose for siphoning;
A narrow-necked carboy for use as a secondary fermentor;
A fermentation lock (this is most important);
A thermometer;
A hydrometer to measure specific gravity;
A funnel;
A capping machine;
Sterilants for cleaning bottles and Campden tablets for fermentation locks.

Even if you buy all this equipment new, it won't cost more than $20,00

But that doesn't make you a home-brewer. You still need the ingredients.

most delicate and most important. But now beer yeast is sold as liquid in a vial or dry in a package. Both kinds keep in good condition for months -- years, if kept at 40 degrees in a refrigerator.

This should be used to make a yeast starter, which is added to the wort during first fermentation. By doing so you considerably reduce the risk of something going wrong at an early stage.

The yeast starter can be made by putting together beer yeast, four tablespoonfuls of Wine Art Yeast starter and four cups of boiling water into a sterile bottle fitted with a fermentation lock. Between one and two days, according to Mr. Arthurs, after this is placed in a dark place at 70 degrees, a white foam forms on the top of the liquid. It is now ready to be added to the wort.

Many people are scared of yeast but the homemaker shouldn't skimp on its use.

There are a few more ingredients to aid the making of good beers. A third of a stick of licorice in a six-gallon batch will help give the produce a good "head". There are specially made "heading liquids" that do the same thing.

Of all this equipment and ingredients now available to the home beer-maker, it might be worth noting which are the most important.

Equipment: Good secondary fermentation vessel with airlock; hydrometer for reading specific gravity of the product at various stages; capping machine, which ensures the bottles of beer are well sealed and the carbon dioxide, are kept in.

Ingredients: Boiled water, good yeast and malt extract, fresh hops.

Nor should they use old or poor yeast.

The wrong kind of yeast and opening beer before it has time to "age" are the main reasons for a result - and poor produce, Mr. Arthurs says.

A lot of amateurs are careful about the malt extract and yeast they use but neglect the hops. These are important because they help the beer to keep longer, give it that typically beery aroma, and ensure a good "head".

But this can only be done with fresh hops. Commercial brewers store theirs in areas of controlled humidity and temperature. You should make sure that the hops you use are always fresh.

Some people like to add barley (available as Lighted Malted Barley, Crystal Malted Barley or Black Malted Barley) to give a distinctive flavour.

While the alcoholic content of beer is derived from malt, sometimes for very pale lagers this can be better achieved with sugar. But cane sugar can result in a very sour taste and so saccharides such as dextrose (also known as corn sugar) are usually used.

"But there is something I can't sell that is just as important", says Mr. Arthurs, "That's cleanliness." You can't possibly make good beer unless every piece of equipment including the bottles have been sterilized and the making and storage areas are clean.

If you follow the steps in the following recipes, you will get excellent beer. it may not taste the local brewery store. But don't worry about that. Beer doen't taste the same all over the world. How could it? There are 1,500 different lager yeasts to begin with.

If you have tasted some of the European great beers, undoubtedly you will engage in the hobby of making different kinds of exotic beers. These beers will cost you a small fraction of the cost of the imported cost and taste just as good. We have outlined a small selection of the recipes available with instructions -- have fun making your beer.

A Short history of beer making

by E.G. Arthurs Wine-Art Ltd.

More beer is drunk than any other alcoholic beverage in the world for three main reasons: 1. The climate; 2. The Protestant ethic; 3. It's quicker to make.

Grapes that produce wine need a warm climate to grow, and the fermentation itself needs heat. This heat induces lethargy, the enemy of industriousness.

Beer, however, is made from grains which can be cultivated in a short growing period, and is fermented at only slightly above freezing (40 is the optimum).

This means it is essentially the drink of temperate countries -- and that's where most of the world's population is because that's where it's easier to work. And work, as everybody knows, is an essential of the Protestant ethic.

But all work and no play would have made Temperate Zone Jack a very dull bore. He isn't, and hasn't been, partly because of his beer during moments of relaxation. It is a product that, through the centuries, has yielded hundreds of drinking songs and much literature, art and music at a high, but human, plane.

Not, almost certainly, that beer started out this way. It was possibly almost as much a staff of life as bread.

Nobody knows the who, when or where of the first brewed product. Historians have traced it back at leat 6,000 years. The Babylonians, the early Chinese, the Pharoahs, Caesar's armies all knew it.

But it may have been made long before them. Perhaps by an aboriginal people, -- even in that land mass which has been reshaped by geology and politics into what we now call Canada. For beer is dependent on barley, a grain that grows prolificly on Canadian soil.

Wherever it was first made, it is unlikely that it bore much resemblance to today's product -- but that could be said, too, of the small ale of Shakespeare's time.

For today's beers and ales, made in the millions of gallons, are as much the result of applied science as their constituents. Plus hygiene.

There, at once, is a great difference between them and those made by a people that may have had their pagan gods but had little cleanliness to put next to them.

Still, by accident or genius, beer was first discovered. Because its fermentation period is a lot shorter than for wine, it wouldn't be long before the next batch was ready. Then the next. Since that day, beer has never looked back.

In medieval England, ale houses popped up between towns as soon as there were rudimentary roads. They were essential because beer was safer to drink, and therefore, far more necessary than water. In winter it was heated (or mulled) by putting a hot poker from the fire into it. In summer it was cooled in cellars. Generally, at this time throughout Europe where wine was not readily available, it was drunk usually with food.

Later of course, it lost this distinction. In Germany if was drunk during merriment in summer gardens -- hence, the origin of the German Beergarden (which now, especially in Munich, is often indoors.)

Asians Expelled In Uganda

"War of Liberation"

by Martin Jones

The bizarre circumstances surrounding Uganda's expulsion of its Asian residents bears all the trappings of an absurd tragicomedy. One morning in early August, President Idi Amin reports, he awoke from a dream in which he had received "divine guidance". Acting with all the resolve that such counsel deserves, Amin immediately drove off to army barracks in Eastern Uganda. The troops were informed by the president that almost all the Asians were to be out of the country within three months. This drastic measure, it was added, was designed to improve the faltering economy of the African country. Within a couple of weeks the first of same 60,000 of Uganda's most productive inhabitants were preparing to leave. The economic future of the Republic had never looked so bleak.

Yet, despite an obvious contradiction, Amin's actions do possess an erratic logic. As a response to both the problems characteristic of a modern African state and those of his own precarious leadership, the expulsion order has been marvelously popular in Uganda. At least for the time being.

The chief protagonist in the Ugandan drama is a restless, poorly, disciplined army. The coup which placed Amin in the presidency in January 1971 was the work of anxious military officers who felt threatened by Amin's predecessor, Milton Obote. Obote had managed to attract the sympathy of the army in 1966 during a period of tribal struggle. One in power, he was compelled to reduce his dependency on the military. He began to subordinate the army to the civilian government, removing many of its treasured functions. An intelligence unit was established within its ranks and his most vociferous military critic, Amin, was removed from his command of the combat units. Discontented military leaders finally struck back while Obote was on a visit to Peking.

One in power, Amin found himself threatened with the same fate as his predecessor. His attempt to appease the whims of the unruly army has quickly led to disastrous consequences. Tribal warfare has errupted in the army and the slaughter of over 1,000 soldiers has gone unpunished. Amin resorted to a tactic that he was to employ with increasing frequency and charged the Tanzanian army with the massacre.

During the twenty months of his presidency, the economy has come close to collapse. Reserves of foreign currency have virtually disappeared while one-third of the national budget has been lavished on the army. The purchase of arms increased from 120 million to 190 million creating a budgetary gap of 112 million. It has only been the sale of the cotton and coffee crop that has warded off final disaster.

Isolated from his civilian advisors, desperate over the failing economy, and unable to control tribal hostilities, Amin seized on the perfect scapegoat. The expulsion of the Asian community cannot help but unite the nation and generate new enthusiasm for the regime.

The Asians have long been target of African animosity. Originally recruited in the 19th century as labourers in the Ugandan railway, they eventually attained positions in the colonial administration and railway system or set up trading posts along the railroad. Later waves of immigrants settled briefly in Zanzibar or in Mombasa on the Kenya coast and then worked their way into the interior as traders. In Uganda they found a ready market for their scarce but valuable skills. With amazing thrift and industry, the Asians managed to accumulate an overwhelming preponderance of Ugandan wealth.

But it is more than the financial position of the Asians which has understandably aroused the enmity of the Africans. Blacks have long charged that they are treated with arrogance and contempt in their own homeland. The Asians have chosen to remain on the edge of African society while cultivating close ties with their fellow communities in Tanzania and Kenya. Their desire to participate as equals in building a modern Uganda has not been very evident. When Uganda citizenship was offered to them upon independence, only a minority replied.

Amin's announcement of the explusion came as the climax of a nine-month anti-Asian campaign. The campaign was dubbed "The War of Liberation" and Amin pledged to sacrifice his life if it was necessary to ridding Uganda of foreign domination. The residence permits of all Asians holding foreign passports were revoked with the exception of certain professionals and owners of industrial and agricultural enterprises. All financial and property holdings were to be sold before departure or expropriated.

Amin threatened at first to expel those Asians holding Ugandan citizenship but eventually yielded to international pressure. However the sincerity of this gesture is questionable. Asians Ugandans are required to present proof of citizenship yet the deadline expired before even a majority were able to see the authorities. Many of those that did had their documents destroyed by officials while others who took the precaution of photocopying the necessary papers were refused recognition of citizenship for precisely that reason.

The popularity of Amin's decree prompted him to announce later in August that all European firms were also to be expropriated. This is to be the second phase of "The War of Liberation and will enable Africans to acquire all the shops, factories and businesses in the country.

Encouraging as these developments may sound to Africans ignorant of economic realities, the consequences for Uganda are monstrous. Asians provide almost all the technical, financial, and managerial talent in the country. With their departure go the skills necessary to the development of Uganda as well as the likelihood of attracting foreign investment.

The responsibility of the British government in providing a home for those Asians carrying British passports, about 57,000 out of 80,000 is clear. Under the 1962 Commonwealth Immigrants Act, Britain bears ultimate responsibility for British citizens in former colonies. And although this clause was formulated to protect British expatriates, the committment to all was reaffirmed in 1968. The government did, however, take steps to control the immigration of African Asians. A voucher system was devised which allows the entrace of 2,500 Asians a year from each of the three East African counties. It is to the government's credit that it waived the regulations in early September and admitted that it had no choice but to accept the Ugandan Asians.

But this does not solve the Asian's dilemma. The logistics of the situation are beyond possibility; one airline company estimated that it would require nine Boeing 707 flights every day for three months to remove all the Asians. And Amin has threatened to place all those who fail to make the deadline in prison camps.

Despite the accusations of "naked racism" levelled at Amin by Julius Nyerere of Tanzania, both Kenya and Tanzania are guilty of similar approaches, if subtler in method, to their Asian problem. For years, Asians have been slowly squeezed out of jobs and replaced by Africans. The dramatic moves by Amin reflect his very tenuous position and are consistent with his flamboyant behavior. In a frantic effort to create imaginary threats to the Ugandan people, Amin has accused Britain, Israel and Tanzania of plotting to depose or assasinate him. By hysterically pointing from one scapegoat to another, Amin hopes to prolong his presidency.

It is disillusioning to see that prejudice wears a black skin as comfortably as a white one. And this racism is reflected not only in the person of Amin, but in the whole body of informed African opinion. When black nations were threatening to withdraw from the Olympics over Rhodesia's participation, not a whisper was raised about Uganda. If the African nations are to retain their credibility as the conscience of human dignity and freedom in the world, they must remember that racism cannot be dismissed as just revenge.

The Fee Strike -- the arguments are complex

by Ted Cape

On October 11 virtually every university student government in Ontario will conduct a referendum as to the advisability of a fee strike in protest of the Davis government's tuition hike of last winter. Obviously the relevant arguments are complex.

On the pro side, a fee strike seems justified in view of the government's failure to consult student groups before reaching their decision. Many who support the idea of a fee strike object not so much to the $100.00 rise as to the heavy handed manner in which it was imposed. Why did the government not make at least some attempt to communicate with students so that, for example, a more satisfactory scale of fee hikes might have been established whereby those receiving parental support bore a greater share of the increase than independent students? By failing to seek out student opinion the Davis government came up with a tuition schedule which takes no account of the varying financial situations of students.

Furthermore, the fee hike is yet another step towards a completely elitist system of higher education. A hundred dollar rise in tuition combined with a reduction of grants will probably mean that even fewer of the poor will reach university. If our system of liberal democratic government deserves the "everyone has an equal opportunity" praise heaped upon it by its defenders, the government should be lowering rather than raising tuition fees.

Yet one can easily summon arguments against a fee strike. Starting with the obvious, one might simply acknowledge that higher education is terribly expensive. Why should the guy with a family to support have to pay more taxes so that we can enjoy a cheap ride through university? Students sound pretty spoiled in protesting the fee increases. If their concern for social justice is genuine, they should carry their share of the costs of higher learning. Furthermore would it not be a little hypocrital for Queen's students, a high proportion of whose parents earn over $25,000 a year, to strike for lower fees?

Clearly both arguments have merit. Over the next week or so much public debate will continue in the Journal and at a meeting of AMS Outer Council in the McLaughlin Room of the Union at 7:00 p.m., Wednesday, October 4. Until October 11, please keep open the option of fee strike, even if you do not support it. Pay only the first instalment of your fees.

The ASUS Tale

DSC's – explained

Departmental Student Councils were formed at Queen's in 1970 to coordinate the students and professors in each Arts and Science department. They provide an opportunity for students to have a voice in such matters as curriculum changes, course pre-requisites, and the implementation of new courses. DSC's may form their own committees as well as participate on the previous ones. The committees DSC's form do such diverse things as plan social events like smokers with the professors, organize a library, exchange ideas about teaching and learning, hold films, and have guest speakers. Money to back events like speakers, symposiums, and smokers can be gained from ASUS as a grant or loan.

Each class has its own DSC reg. and each department has an executive elected from the DSC's. The DSC executive keeps all the DSC's aware of current events and it plans events while also keeping in touch with ASUS through a divisional representative.

The DSC can be an effective student voice to the faculty concerning student problems or discontents. It depends completely, of course, on the initiative of the individual DSC representative to be in touch with the feelings of his classmates.

Alternative to football

For those men who are not participating in sports at the intercollegiate level there is an alternative; an extensive intramural programme called "Bews".

All men at Queen's are divided into units by their faculty and year ie. Arts 75, Science 74, Commerce 73, etc. These teams compete in a diversity of team and individual sports. Points are given for winning, but more important for the participation of a unit in all sports. The team with the highest point total at the end of the year receives the James Bews Trophy, emblematic of intramural supremacy. At the individual level the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society will award faculty letters to those who participate and achieve for your year. Team sports are organized through the year athletic stick, however, competitors in individual sports must enter their own names on lists posted on the Bews bulletin board in the men's locker room of the phsy. ed. complex.

The sports will be starting immediately so sign up or call your athletic stick!

Team sports: flag football, soccer, and rugger

Individual sports: squash, tennis

Athletic Sticks

Arts 76 - to be elected Sept. 27

Arts 75 - Mark Edwards 544-7488

Arts 74 - Mike Fitzpatrick 544-3046

Arts 73 - Ross Feldman 544-9625

Artsci '76 votes tomorrow

by Terry Macli

Artsci '76 will be holding its first elections on Wednesday, September 27 in Stirling "D" auditorium. A variety of positions are open to all members of '76 - president, vice-president, treasurer, secretary, social convenor, publicity chairman, and men's and women's athletic sticks.

Foregoing a "let's see a good crowd for your own pride" plea important reasons can still be listed for strong attendance.

For one thing it's a good beginning. The more people who vote the more enthusiastic an executive member is likely to be and the more responsible he is likely to feel. A better rapport will be established, no one can bluff his way past a large number of people and through questions and comments, ideas will flow and ideas will be your life blood.

Large attendance also helps the executive to gauge interest of the year they lead. A pitiful attendance will certainly not be taken as a sign of valid enthusiasm and your executive will note this.

In brief good attendance means a good executive and a fine year for Arts '76.

The executive's first responsibility will be learning the proverbial hamstrings of government - ways and means. Specifics will follow later as the executive selects a new ASUS representative.

It's important to many people, therefore, that elections are meaningful so please attend - an hour and a half at most.

If there are any questions concerning general structure or specific functions and duties of specific positions phone Terry Macli at 544-7192.

To lead or be led

Dear Editor,

It has been six months since the Ontario government announced that it was increasing the formula fees (read tuition fees) for university students by anywhere from $100 to $400 per year. Since that time Queen's AMS has managed to commission a study into the student loan scheme and has reluctantly organized a referendum on an Ontario Federation of Students initiated fee strike (it is reported that Queen's representatives are invariably the "anchor men" on any issue of action by OFS). This certain senior officers of the AMS term "responsible" government. Even six months after the fact the president and vice-president have failed to take a strong stand on the fee issue. They feel it necessary to await the outcome of the fee strike referendum before they will say anything. These gentlemen received their mandate to lead last February! Is this responsible government?

We have lost a golden opportunity to make our position known to the public by failing to take advantage of the widespread public interest in university finance after the fee increase announcement last spring. While other student bodies were organizing petitions, teach-ins, write-in campaigns and direct representations to the Ontario government the AMS was fretting over Heffalump and a summer Pub. Belated though our response may be, it is time for the AMS to give strong support to the proposed fee strike. It will require great solidarity to give our case a favourable airing in the press. If the fee strike referendum fails the government will certainly seize the opportunity to raise the fees even closer to the $625-$2250 recommended in the Wright Report. The ineffective tactics to date of our "responsible" student government will fail to prevent this.

The time is now to demand that the Queen's AMS lead in the fee issue and not be led by the rest of the Ontario university students.

"FROSH '76" YOU'RE GREAT!

The Queen's Charity Day Committee would like to thank all those students (frosh and upper classmen) who participated in Queen's Charity Day on Friday, September 15.

Slaves, you did a tremendous job of washing floors (and the bottoms of boats, still in the lake), painting houses, building fences, . . . etc. Your efforts brought in almost $1,300.

Shoeshiners came back from 4 hours of work with a grand total of nearly $1,400. One can contained over $60.

Car washers brought back over $40 and bottle drivers collected over $200 cases of pop bottles and almost 200 cases of beer bottles. "You" almost doubled the amount raised by the frosh of 1971. Thank you from Camp Outlook and from the Cystic Fibrosis Society for approximately $2,700 worth of help!

Sincerely,
Charity Day Committee.

P.S. If there are any students who have not yet returned money given to them for work done on Charity Day, could you please send it as soon as possible to

Sue Coish

Cheques and cash are both acceptable.

Rah! Rah! Rah!

To the Editors:

In view of the pointless destruction at Lansdowne Park, which will cost the student body of Queen's $1,000, it seems to me that the advertisements for the game in Toronto are childish and absurd. They urge us to help tear down the goal posts at Varsity. If this is supposed to be school spirit and loyalty to Queen's, I'd rather be accused of apathy.

The $1000 is bad enough but what is just as bad is the stigma of irresponsibility that will be placed on all Queen's students because of the actions of a few drunks!

Rah! Rah! Rah!

Sweven defended

I feel I cannot let Mr. Smith's "cabbage" (Journal 22nd September) go unanswered, for he throws down the gauntlet in a fashion which begs response. Since he raises two very distinct questions, one concerning the generic nature of poetry, and one more specifically designed to deracinate poetic malfeasance in Sweven, I propose to consider each of these in turn.

To explain poetic theory has been the endeavour of many learned tomes, and a resume of current poetic techniques, or the history of their genesis and evolution is not possible here. (I can only recommend Winifred Nowottny's "The Language the poets Use", as a fascinating and well-informed investigation into many of the mechanics of poetry). As for my personal poetic theory, its exposition would neither edify nor illuminate across the depersonallizing chasm of newsprint. It must suffice for now to take brief issue with one or two points raised by Mr. Smith himself.

He is at some pains to equate poetry with the class from which it derives, and sees the "middle class" poets of Queen's as the source of a narcissistic and "onanistic" poetic miasma. Whatever may be true of Queen's, there is certainly no evidence for his theory in the broad spectrum of English poetry. Class background can influence and has influenced subject matter and poetic approach, but greater works have emanated from both the highest and the lowest echelons of the class structure.

Mr. Smith intimates that the poets of Queen's have lacked the struggle against physical economic needs which he maintains gives the confidence that breeds genuine poetic sensitivity, and that this is largely responsible for the low quality of their work. Such a proposition is not easily substantiable, and indeed there is a tradition of peasant poets, headed by John Clare, who produced works of skill and sensitivity despite, and not because of, their hardships. Clare, too, stands as irrefutable proof that intuitive poetic genius is not a myth. The formal qualities of, spelling, punctuation, and poetic delineation are absent from his manuscripts, yet despite his hardships and lack of formal training he wrote poetry of great beauty and sensitivity. His hardships, in fact, did no more than precipitate his later madness.

As for Sweven itself, I cannot but agree (despite the deliberately polemical nature of Mr. Smith's letter) with some of his assertions. There has been poor poetry, a good deal of it, in the magazine. Prose has been randomly chopped into lines, but it is not so much a lack of knowledge of poetry, as much a feel for it, that has produced such abominations. It is a knowledge of poetry unsubstantiated by intuitive feeling, or any desire to give complementary feeling to expression, that compels a poet to break his 'work' into random line units, though such purely formal procedure is patently inadequate.

Poetry is not merely rigid rhymes, uniform line lengths, or exotic language, though it may include any of these. The form of poetry derives from the nature of the expression of its content. Lines are subdivided to a pattern or system, either of thought, rhythm, or linguistic expression, with the intention of complementing or even undercutting the poetic idea. The overall effect of the poem is governed by the way in which the poet informs his material, and a disregard for his inter-relatedness will belie the intended poetic gestalt. Such techniques can be found throughout the whole spectrum of poetry, from the mechanical virtuosity of Herrick and Swinburne to the sinewy sprung rhythms of Hopkins and Lawrende. In every case form and content offer themselves in a fixed, if not necessarily counterpoised relationship;

This is but a sketchy defence, though it will have to serve in turn. I would agree that much of the putative poetry in sweven has not exhibited the qualities outlined above; though I would not suggest that a failure to do so necessarily renders a work totally valueless. If natural effulgence of emotion is no more than a "Sensitivity" equatable with "narcissism", then Mr. Smith's letter cannot be taken seriously, for it eschews the "craft technique expression" side of letter writing, and is presumably narcissistic on the grounds of the very "sensitivity" to sweven which propted him to write. Such is obviously not the case, for the energy of the letter, the desire to say something, is in itself laudable. If such energy, and the energy of past "poets" in sweven, were better channelled with more thought given not only to what to say, but how to say it, then the standard of contribution, and of the magazine, would rise. The editors alone cannot improve sweven, but if Mr. Smith (and others) will submit their poetry, criticism, and poetic theories with a genuine desire for quality, and greater care in their formulation of material, the magazine will thrive. To say that the magazine has no useful function is grossly unfair. It has contained "images", "feelings well expressed, "light and energy" which were memorable, but these have often been submerged by the lackadaisical supporting cast of flaccid and ill-considered expressions. The good poetry should not go ignored because of its relative scarcity, but it would be done greater justice if more people were prepared to help the magazine to dispense with the proliferation of sub-standard material, which never-the-less shows the potential for quality if given greater care in its expression.

Finally, we would gladly expouse masturbation if Mr. Smith can a) show that it is a more relevant form of expression for a literary magazine and b) suggest a convenient way of setting it up and printing it in all its diversity and infinite variety. Until then, let us hope that the obvious energy in Mr. Smith's letter will be directed towards an attempt to improve the magazine which he disparages; we look forward to his first contribution.

Paul Gompertz.

A lot of crap

Last Tuesday's centrefold fiction "One Hundred is a Lot of Bucks" has to be one of the more frivolous analyses of the most important challenge thrown at university students in several years. Unhappily, many of the "facts" presented were also fiction.

The BIU. for 73-74 will indeed be increased by 3.4 per cent or $60. That is a 3.4 per cent increase in total dollars for the university whether your worth to them is 1 BIU ($1825) or 6 ($10,950). It is sheer drivel to say that the formula funds the university receives for Ph.D. students will be increased by 20.4 per cent (6 x 3.4 per cent). And let's be clear that this is money the ununiversity receives to run its operation -- no Ph.D. student is "getting $360 more this year". The $400 graduate fee increase is straight out of a pocket with nothing in it. The universities have been allowed to pay $300 of the increased fee for this year, which is essentially a reduction in the BIU weighting for Ph.D students from 6.0 to 5.8.

The authors are correct in pointing out that the government is making money on this deal -- while increasing the formula income generated per student next year anywhere from $60 to $360, that are extracting between $100 and $400 more in fees this year. The university will realize most of the announced 3.4 per cent to BIU increase only because WE'RE PAYING IT and then some! And speaking of inflation, costs are going up -- this is the fourth increase in graduate tuition fees in four years, bringing the total increase to 128 per cent. Some inflation. Could it be merely coincidental that the $23,000,000 in extra tuition fees to be raised for this cash-strapped government is exactly equal to the $21,000,000 for their shiny new Youth in Action programme plus $2,000,000 for their yet?

The gross errors in this article seem to point up pretty clearly the AMS' actions on the fee increases during the past half year -- they have still to figure out what the original announcement said last March!

Ads offend

Dear Editor,

It was encouraging to see John Thomas' letter in the Journal of Sept. 22, criticizing your publishing of an advertisement by an American cheat-sheet factory. It is good to know that honesty lives on.

Unfortunately, this same edition also carries a repeat of the ad in question.

The Journal last spring carried a series of similar ads by a Toronto-based firm, which brought down the wrath of faculty, administration and yes, even a fair number of students. After a week or two of uproar, the Journal promised never again to print such ads. Yet here they are again, and this time not even Canadian (as if that were some sort of redeeming virtue).

Why this lapse? Is it because the Journal this year is under new management which hasn't yet had opportunity to give the matter much thought, or do you just not care about the far-reaching implications should plagiarism become a widespread practice? I hope you don't print just anything to bring in a buck.

However, there ads may have come to publication, may I respectfully suggest you adopt your predecessor's policies before screaming hordes of committees and boards from Above besiege you with tons of recommendations, reports, and other assorted exhortations, and make your life a big headache?

Sincerely,
Brian A. Judge,
199 Collingwood Street.

Ed Note: We have decided to refrain from printing these ads as the purchase of term papers is out of place in an institution which trys to further education.

We were wrong

We would like to clarify the erroneous statement concerning Heffalump which appeared in last Friday's Journal. It was reported that Heffalump was $12,000 in debt; it is grossly unfair to charge Heffalump with a debt. Is it not a loan as is the $30,000 given to Elrond, the $11,000 given to the Student Typing Service, and the unknown figure given to the Pub? If our loan is a debt on the grounds we have not started payment, consider Elrond's debt which is 3 years outstanding.

The second point we would like to refute concerns the overdraft. While an overdraft did exist it was remedied quickly upon notification. Surely this 24 hour situation does not merit coverage in the Journal 3 weeks later.

In the future please check the validity of your statements; their intent before making them public.

David Morel,
Holly Clark staff of Heffalump

Beer making

An eventually beer had its rivals at the meal table. There was not only wine coming into the northern countries, but tea and coffee. And eventually water was safe enough to drink -- particularly in North America.

So beer was drunk for itself alone in thousands of English pubs, Scandinavian taverns, Dutch bars, German beergardens.

It was these beer drinkers of Europe who colonized the world. So beer went with them, and has stayed as a popular drink.

Today, Australia, Jamaica, even Mexico and Japan, have great locally produced beers and ales to range beside the famous ones of Britain, Denmark, Germany and Holland. So does Canada.

But although beer generally travels well in large kegs, there must have been times in the remotest parts of this new land when the first immigrants to Canada couldn't get it.

Neccessity being the mother of invention, they would have tried their hand at making it. After all, the basic ingredients -- barley, clean water, and hops -- are here.

Still, it must have been a messy business, not totally successful.

It is a lot easier now, with scientifically tested extracts, calibrated equipment and measured ingredients from specialized stores such as Wine Art, which are as usually close as the suburban shopping plaza.

Some people only have found this out through another dose of necessity. Shortages of beer through strikes and other reasons have started Canadians wondering whether they couldn't make their own.

And they have -- and kept on doing it.

The amateur beer-makers don't claim to be brewmasters for Carlsberg of Lawenbrau. But, on the other hand, they can produce excellent beers in all respects, as good if not better than the normal commercial product.

Ask their friends.

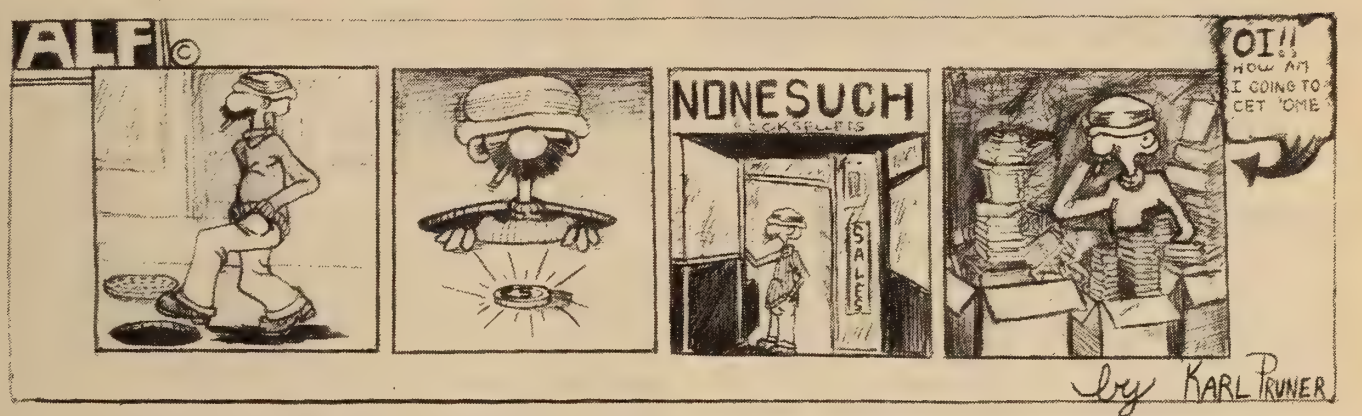
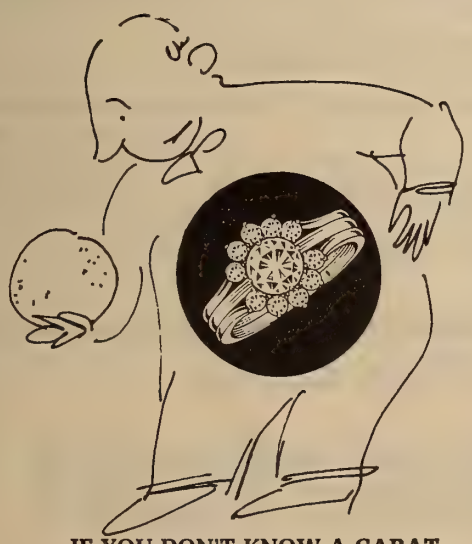
Pay demi-fee

Students will be posted outside Richardson Hall this week to remind other students that the AMS would like them to pay only half their tuition fees.



This project was first suggested by Ken Shewan at last weeks outer council meeting. Other interested individuals have since decided to join him in reminding students to pay in two installments.



"When it comes to a question concerning the fee strike we will refer them to the pamphlet put out by the Ontario Federation of Students", Shewan said.

Acclaimed Veena player at Dunning

Internationally acclaimed veena player, Mrs. Muthulakshmi Ranganathan, will be performing in concert on Friday, September 29th at 8:30 pm in Dunning Hall. She is one of the foremost exponents of the South Indian classical style of music, has won numerous awards and has given a number of concerts in India, Nepal, Ceylon, Malaysia, Singapore, U.S.A. and Canada. The concert she gave at the United Nations in 1971 is being released on a long playing record.

She explained at an interview Thursday in the Division of Concerts office that South Indian music is "basically improvisational. No music is set down but the style, like the skill, is handed down from generation to generation." Mrs. Ranganathan learned to play the veena from her father and has performed in concert with him.

"Indian music", she stated, "is not as popular in Canada as it is in the States." She indicated, however that she hopes this will change with more exposure.

South Indian music differs from North Indian music, which features the sitar and is emblematic of Ravi Shankar's style. The veena is used instead, is a large instrument, fashioned out of a block of wood, sometimes ivory, with the stem made from the same material and placed on the flat top of the body. The neck is attached to the stem and is usually carved into some weird figure like the head of a dragon.

Mrs. Ranganathan playing Veena

Two other South Indian instruments will accompany Mrs. Ranganathan, the tambura, a classical stringed drone instrument and the mrdangam, a percussion instrument, made of a hollowed block of wood with a skin stretched over each end.

Mr. Amarnath, who plays the mrdangam with Mrs. Ranganathan, explained that South Indian music is derived from devotional music and was first performed in temples and during religious festivals.

Vaghy Quartet on film and in concert

On Wednesday 27 September the VAGHY STRING QUARTET will perform a free concert in Dunning Hall at 8:30 p.m. This is one of the many informal concerts that the quarted plays during the year for all Queen's students.

The programme will feature the premiere public screening of the recent film made about the Quartet. It was shot in 1970 by Professor Peter Harcourt of the Film Studies Department with the assistance of Robert Fresco. The film shows the Quartet in rehearsal, in performance and in discussion. The interviews in the film provide the viewer with a candid insight into the life of the Quartet members and their views about music. The film-making was partially funded by the Ontario Arts Council and the work is now a part of the "Films on Art" collection of the National Film Board.

Prokofiev's Quarted No. 1 in B minor, Opus 50, will be performed on the programme also. The Russian composer considered the last movement of this piece one of his finest achievements.

Admission is free to this informal concert on Wednesday 27 September at 8:30p.m. in Dunning Hall. Tickets are not required.

Rules Concerning the Use of AMS Concert Cards

1...Tickets for AMS Concerts will be offered at two prices, one for general admission and the other for students holding concert cards. The student body has subsidized the concert committee by a three dollar levy included in the non-academic fee, allowing concert tickets to be offered at reduced rates to those with a concert card.

2...Your card, which must be presented each time tickets are purchased, entitles you to two tickets per concert. Tickets are sold on a first come, first-served basis, and though as many tickets as possible are offered for sale with each concert, the number is limited and your card does not guarantee you a ticket.

3...If misplaced, your card can be replaced for the original cost ($3.00).

4...Tickets for all AMS Concerts will be available at the Agnes Etherington Art Centre ticket booth at the hours posted there.

5...Your concert fee may be refunded by submitting the concert card, with your student card for ID, to the AMS Office on October 11, 12, or 13, only. Once your card has been used, your money cannot be refunded.

"Guys and Dolls" astounding success!

by Sandy Naiman

The second and last public performance of Guys and Dolls, by the Collins Bay Drama Club, on Saturday night at the Grand Theatre, was astounding.

The innate weaknesses of both chorus and cast were capitalized on to the extent that a capacity crowd was kept hysterically enthralled by the maneuvers of New York's sleasy and seductive underworld in the late 1940's.

From the first Broadway street scene to a roaring finale of the show's title song, which brought a thunderous standing ovation, the show was beautifully designed, cleverly choreographed and surprisingly well sung. Considering that few cast members had ever sung or danced before, the Havana dance routine with Brian Copeland and Jennifer Hodges was executed with simple and sensuous perfection. Jill Hodkinson's choreography throughout was designed to bring out the best the Collins Bay Drama Club had to offer and to minimize weakenesses.

But those were barely evident. Aside from a few inaudible words in the odd song, the energy and excitement which was pulsing through each of the 24 cast members managed to make the occasional missed step, (particularly in the case of the long and lanky Hot Box girl, Dorothy Dawson, who was chronically out of step and who delighted the audience with her performance all the same) a curious and highly entertaining facet of the production

Afterall, in the worl of musical theatre, a world which often encompasses the realm of fantasy, anything can happen. Tough and toxic gamblers dance and sing, bet their souls away and attend Salvation Army soul saving meetings; girls remain affianced for 14 years and crap games float about mysteriously from the back of police stations to the gymnasium of Public School 84. Anything can and does happen.

This is the world into which the members of the Collins Bay Drama Club decided to step last year, after their very successful production of One Flew Over The Cuckoo's Nest, and they recreated it for us last night with utmost precision and care.

Robert B. Montieth's sets were smashing, from the Broadway Bill boards to the El Cafe Cubana in Havanna to his art nouveau sewer system, complete with cobwebs and huge pipes, they were sophisticated, intriguing to look at and meticulously detailed and built. They captured the stereotypical obviousness of the surroundings they were meant to depict and they allowed the actors both the freedom and the stimulation to create and project their characters.

Damon Runyon, who spent a great deal of time with the shadier inhabitants of New York, wrote a series of short stories in 1931 entitled, "Guys and Dolls, or the Idyll of Miss Sarah Brown". Frank Loesser, Abe Burrows and Jo Swerling adapted the material for a Broadway musical in 1950 and a few years later, the theatrical hit became a successful film, with Marlon Brando and Frank Sinatra playing Sky Masterson and Nathan Detroit.

Although Guys and Dolls, dates back about 20 years, it has never become a dated show. The songs are immortal and in the Collins Bay production, the highlights of the 50's are still highlights today. Barbara Marrison, as Miss Adelaide, is every inch the aging but well preserved chorus girl, with a beautifully strong and yet gravelly voice. She whines divinely in Adelaide's lament and Sue Me and yet purrs through A Bushel and a Peck and Take Back Your Mink. Her versatility of character in confrontations with long standing boy friend Nathan Detroit, played by Rocky Thibeault, oscillates between dumb-blonde and tough-broad, and she is completely believable in each.

Rocky as the maligned spouse-to-be is able to pace himself very accurately through numerous crowd numbers and manages to mix both the toughness of his life style, as head of the floating crap game, and tenderness of his feelings towards Adelaide, to bring us the wholly realized character Runyon meant him to be. He's a loveable gangster, in itself a seemingly insoluble paradox, but Rocky's Nathan is every inch the epitomy of this bitter sweetness.

The other romance, between Ski Masterson, the highest betting gambler of them all and Sarah Brown, the innocent idyllic Salvation Army crusader, was more subtely portrayed by Kip Kully and Jacki Berry. Aside from some very believable kisses, their relationship, based initially on a bet is best when Miss Berry does not have to reach out too far beyond her singing range, as she did in I'll Know and I've Never Been In Love Before. The moment Sky gets her drunk she relaxes and belts out If I Were A Bell with all the aplomb of a broadway pro, a curious phenomenon for a saver of souls.

Kip, on the other hand resorts to a modified Rex Harrison method of delivery and although the tunes aren't as delicately defined, his characterization comes through with strength and determination. In Luck Be A Lady, a song that brought down the house, coupled with some fancy acrobatics from the male chorus and Monteith's fabulous sewer setting, Kip delivered his song with the cool confidence that his character demanded. Yet in his ballad duets with Miss Berry, he presented a more humane and tender Sky, a side of his character neither he nor anyone else had ever seen.

Sam Matto, as Nicely-Nicely Johnson provided another highlight in his rendition of the mock spiritual, Sit Down You're Rocking The Boat. His improvisationsand facial and bodily expressions were both effective and genuinely enacted. One knew that Nicely-Nicely had really had that terrible dream.

He and Francois Molyneaux in their duet of Guys and Dolls, combined Matto's excellent acting ability and Molyneaux clear strong singing voice to make the title song again another highlight.

Many of the secondary roles were also very well performed. David J. Freeman, as Sarah's aging grandfather sang touchingly, More I Cannot Wish You, with conviction and sympathy. John Lamoureux, as Chicago toughy, Big Jule was, in a strangely automatic manner, a total opposite to the flexible humane New Yorkers.

Peter Lichtenfels direction made the show the success it was. He was able to stimulate his cast, in an understated and patient way, to complete committment to their objective, a most ambitious one. With Jill Hodkinson and Nancy Helwig, who choreographed and produced, Guys and Dolls will remain in the minds of those who were lucky enough to see it. Pictures of the Hot Box girls caressing their behinds with mink stoles, of the gamblers sitting in the Save the Soul Mission House confessing their sins, the dance ballet in the Cuban Cafe, the crap game in the sewer, will stay with us.

The all out effort, from John J. Vollman Jr's musical direction and accommpaniment to the costumes and lighting was apparent and carefully executed.

Intercollegiate Athletics - a fan's view

by Dave Cottee

On Wednesday, Sept. 20, an Athletic Night was held to introduce prospective athletes to the many varied sports at Queen's. A representative of each sport, usually the coach, was on hand to discuss his sport with all interested persons, and the coaches this reporter talked to were both friendly and informative as they explained their activities.

The track and field coach, Rolf Lund, described the turnout this year as excellent, with only the weight events lacking in numbers. The first meet will be held at McMaster this Saturday, and some of the returnees to watch for are Dave Jarvis, third in the Canadian Senior Championships, in the intermediate hurdles, Hugh Fraser in the 100 and 200 metres. Axel Becke, the OUAA indoor champ in the long jump., and Brian Aikin in the 800 and 1500 metres.

Two other sports that caught this reporter's eye were fencing and judo.

Want to know the difference between an epee, a foil, and a sabre? Then contact the fencing coach, Jon Tondeur, and try either intercollegiate or recreational fencing. From only 2 participants in 1968, fencing grew to over 400 at Queen's last year. This upswing will be continued with the arrival at the start of next month of Frederic Wach, who was the Hungarian Olympic Fencing coach prior to the revolution, and who is now the Canadian National coach. The first opportunity to view a competition will be a women's event held at Queen's on Oct. 27 and 28.

The judo coach is Randy Genois, an enthusiastic black belt, who is anxious to see Judo recognized as an official intercollegiate sport. New members, both male and famale, are encouraged to turn out; the physical education centre will furnish a judogi (judo outfit) for beginners. Participation is on both a club and intercollegiate level. The judo club meets 9:30 - 11:30 p.m. Tuesday and Thursday in the combatives room, while the intercollegiate goes Monday and Wednesday at 7:30 - 9:30 p.m.

For spectators, the first competition will be Oct. 21st at R.M.C. with Queen's, R.M.C., and local clubs taking part.

Strong turnout for cross-country

A record number of potential runners competed in a five-mile time trial over a route from West Campus to Lake Ontario Park last Saturday. The results were gratifying. McArthur student Steve Dillabough came first in 29:37 with coach Walter Eadie second in 29:56. Veterans Bruce Elliot and Bill Bryden placed third and fourth, with newcomers Wayne Boyle, Mark Field, and Dieter Stein in the next three spots.

Tennis Gaels second in Cardinal Classic

The Queen's tennis team came up with two impressive exhibition showings this past week, defeating a touring R.A.F. squad led by former Wimbeldom player Mike Kamm and reinforced by Canadians Neil Longhurst and Paul Henry, and taking a close second in the Cardinal Classic tournament at Plattsburg, N.Y.

Against the English players, the Gaels won 3 of 4 singles matches and split in doubles competition, with playing-coach John McFarlane defeating Kamm.

In Plattsburgh, Queen's was the only Canadian school competing. They were edged out by the University of Rochester, 38-35, despite a strong effort in singles play and a better-than-average showing in doubles. McFarlane feels that this is the best Queen's team in recent years, and could make a serious challenge in the OUAA competition this year.

Queen's will host Carleton in an exhibition dual meet here this Saturday, so any tennis buffs can get a first-hand look at this year's squad in action.

Soccer Gaels have rough week

Queen's soccer Gaels, the defending OUAA-Eastern Division champions, got off to a rough start in the new OUAA race, dropping an exhibition game with R.M.C. on Wednesday by a 2-0 count, then matching that performance in a league contest with York on Saturday, Sunday, the Gaels just missed a win when the Ryerson Rams tied the score 3-3 with less then two minutes to go.

The first two contests saw the Gaels enjoy territorial advantages for much of the game, but be unable to put the ball in the goal. Rookie Chris Clarke, from Upper Canada College, played well in all three matches, and finally notched a goal against Ryerson. Nick Drysdale and Don Baragar scored the other Gael counters. Queen's enjoyed a 2-0 lead at one point, before two penalty kicks by the Rams knotted the score. Baragar's goal put the Gaels ahead again but the Rams' last-

Despite their record to date, the Gaels are not a bad team. Once they find a scoring touch, the skill and conditioning imparted by coach John Walker should start paying dividends.

A Queen's first!

Co-ed crews take OUAA sailing title

Queen's first co-educational intercollegiate team brought home a winner Saturday, capturing the OUAA Sailing Championships at Port Credit, and earning the right to advance to the Canadian Championships, to be held at R.M.C. October 7th, 8th and 9th. McMaster, U. of T., and Waterloo will also represent Ontario in the C.I.A.U. competition.

The Queen's crews that competed Saturday were skipped by John Readshaw and Geordie Moggridge, with Dianne Smith and Leslie Fleming as their respective crews. The OUAA finals had been scheduled to last through Sunday, but fog and deteriorating weather forced cancellation of the second day's races. The eight races Saturday were run under changing (for the worst) conditions that tested both light and heavy-weather skills.

The team was chosen from 26 hopeful crews that turned out last Wednesday; half of these were lopped off on the basis of the first day's results, and the remaining thirteen went on to a four-race points competition on Friday. The top three crews were selected to form the Queen's intercollegiate team. All three top crews were co-ed. Euan Swan and his sister Celia were first, with Readshaw and Moggridge second and third.

Although Moggridge was part of the two-crew team in the OUAA finals, Swan will take his place in the Canadian Championships. This decision was made well in advance, after much soul-searching, so no problems should arise.

Tindall gets win No. 100 as Gaels nip Ottawa U. 16-13

by Chris Boon

Frank Tindall was a very happy man Saturday afternoon. His Golden Gael squad had just presented him with the game ball from his hundredth career coaching victory, and, coincidentally, served notice that once again, the "grand old man" of Canadian College coaches had a team to be reckoned with. He wasn't the only celebrant, though. There were 34 very tired, sore ballplayers in the same state.

Like the Carleton victory last Sunday, the win boiled down to two things: ball - control offence, and ballhawking team defence. With the exception of one long run by Conrad Kozak, the Gael's defensive squad stifled the Gee-Gee's, allowing them just 159 yards on the ground and a paltry 37 through the air; Kozak'a 73-yard gallop around his right end accounted for almost half of Ottawa U's ground game.

Dan Smith the Ottawa QB, found himself under constant pressure, as Dave Devonshire, Paul Hand, Brett, Don Smith and Bill Thompson gave the Gaels their best pass rush in years; Smith hit on just 3 of 15 attempts, and halfback Alex Morris collected on errant throw for his second interception of the year.

The defense set up the Gael's only touchdown as well, when Devonshire fell on a fumble at the Ottawa 20. Devonshire also came very close to blocking several punts, forcing the O.U. punter to hurry his kicks.

Offensively, the Gaels rolled up 367 yards, most of it on the ground in the second half. Brian Warrender picked up 163 yards on 27 carries, Dave Hadden added 79 tough yards in spite of a painful hip pointer, and Geoff Hamlin contributed another 35, as well as some powerful blocking.

Warrender had a touchdown run called back when an official figured he was stopped just as Brial broke away for the score. Same kind of thing happened last year at York. Taylor faked a running play, stepped back to pass. . .and the whistle blew.

The ref took the fake. This time, the results could have been a little more serious, though. The Gaels were forced to settle for 3 points instead of 7., at a time when the touchdown would have put the game on ice. Officials like that, we don't need.

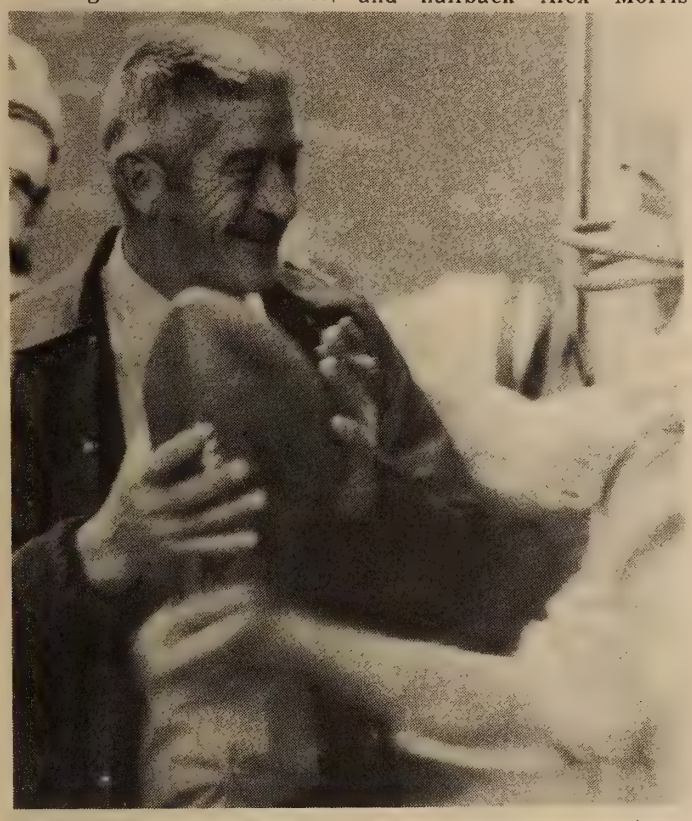
The offensive line finally showed some inclination to hit people, despite an early injury to guard Keith Taggart. With rookie Greg McNamara in his place, the line helped the Gaels to dominate the second half, especially the third quarter, when Ottawa ran only six plays from scrimmage.

The Gaels had 286 yards on the ground, against what had been billed as the best front seven in the league (you should have seen the Ottawa U. press release). The Gee-Gee's had better success with their pass rush - Taylor completed just 4 of 12 - but even that started to get a little ragged late in the game.

Tackles Dave Whiteside and Bruce Potter, guard Don Gordon and Centre Rick Koski all had their best games to date. . .but there is still room for improvement, especially in pass protection. The films could be most interesting viewing.

The Gaels opened the scoring with a long punt single by Dave Campbell, who played a fine game in the defensive backfield as well as compiling a 42.3 yard average on 9 punts. Ottawa U. came back to take the lead 7-1 on a touchdown pass from Smith to fullback Mike Owens, after the long run by Kozak. Neil Lunsden converted.

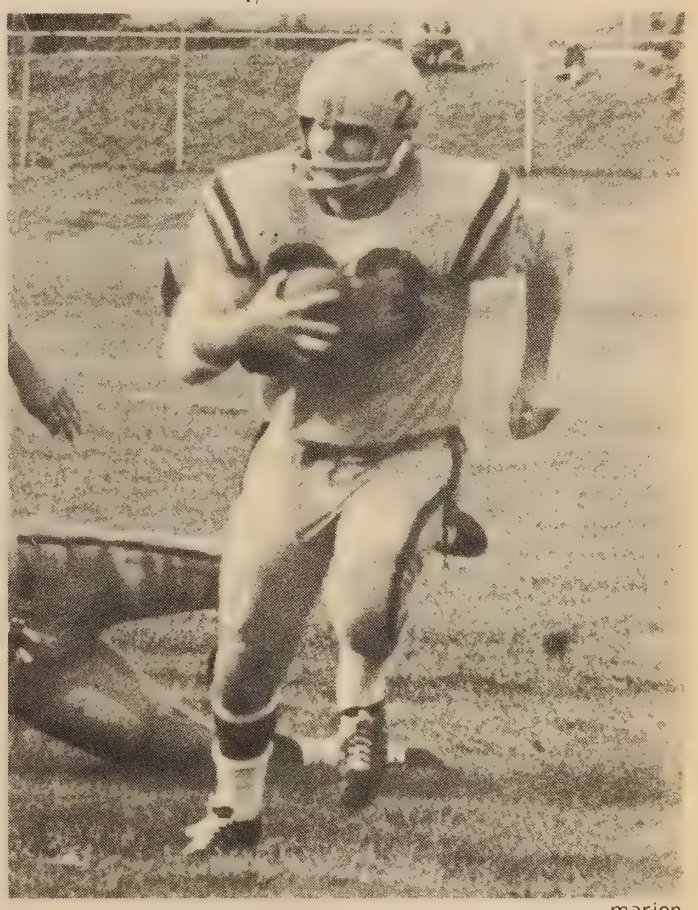
The Gaels got back in the game after the fumble recovery, with Taylor hitting Stu Lang for the major. Cozac converted, and Queen's led 8-7. The Gee-Gee's took the lead again on Lunsden's 26-yard field goal, with the Gaels narrowing the score to 10-9 at the half on a single off a Cozac field goal attempt.



The Gaels score first in the second half, on a field goal by Cozac, then stretched their lead to 16-10 with another single by Campbell and another field goal. Lumsden narrowed this lead to 3 with his second field goal of the day, but Ottawa couldn't get close enough to score further as the Gaels' defence got tougher in the dying minutes.

With a productive 8-point afternoon, Gael kicker Doug Cozac moved ahead of Ron Stewart as Queen's all-time regular-season scoring leader. Cozac, a native of Sault Ste. Marie, needs only 31 points to pass Eric Walter as the OUAA all-time scoring leader.

Next week, the Gaels move into Varsity Stadium to take on their long-time rivals from Hogtown. The Blues haven't been terribly impressive so far, dropping a 24-7 decision to Ottawa U. and eking out a 14-6 win over the Ravens Saturday.



However, Toronto usually gives Queen's problems, and bombthrower Wayne Dunkley is still around, even if his favorite target, John Chapman, isn't.

The key will be the T.O. defense. They will have to stop the Gaels' ground game, and McLellan will definitely be back. What a problem . . . I'm glad they've got it.

Field Hockey Splits

Both Intermediate and Senior teams played their first matches of the year at an invitational tournament in Montreal on Saturday. The Seniors lost their first match against St. Lambert 3-1 with Karen Carson scoring the only goal. The second match, against McGill, ended in a 1-1 draw with Karen Carson agains scoring. Queen's won THE THIRD MATCH, BEATING THE Vagabonds 4-3. Gail Mcleod scored two goals and Laney Marshall and Sue Moffatt one each.

In the Intermediate section, the Queen's gals drew on all three games. In the first match, against Bishops, the score was 1-1, with Leslie Ferrari scoring for Queen's. In the McGill and Vanier Matches the final scores were 0-0.

Next weekend finds both teams at McMaster on Friday, and Guelph on Saturday.

World: Uganda and Tanzania may reach accord

NAIROBI, KENYA — According to Radio Nairobi, Uganda President Idi Amin and President Julius Nyerere have agreed to a peaceful settlement of their frontier conflict. If made official it would put an end to a week of increasing conflict between the two neighbouring African countries.

Before the conference, General Amin warned Tanzania that if their "aggression" against Uganda continues, Uganda would strike back much harder. He was referring to an invasion by rebel forces apparently originating from Tanzania, which he repulsed last week.

Amin also sent out his third bombing raid against Tanzania last week. The latest target was the northern town of Mwanza, third largest in the country.

Radio Tanzania has reported that a Lybian force of 400 officers, men and arms had arrived in Uganda.

The peace move was initiated by President Jaafar Mohammed Nimairy of the Sudan who appealed to the two countries to settle their fight peacefully.

BONN, WEST GERMANY — President Gustav Heinemann has ordered the dissolution of the Bundestag clearing the way for a West German election on November 19. Chancellor Willy Brandt was defeated in an unprecedented confidence motion one year before he was required to call an election.

After the 1969 election Brandt held only a twelve seat majority in the lower house, but this has dwindled to the point where the two opposition parties can command a sufficient majority to defeat the government.

Brandt called the first vote of confidence to be put before the Bundestag to force an election, as he and all but one of the members of his cabinet withheld their votes. However polls show that the election would not appreciably influence the present make-up of the legislature.

MANILLA, PHILIPPINES — President Ferdinand Marcos has formally declared martial law throughout the Philippines in response to recent subversive activities and mounting violence.

Government troops closed newspaper offices and television stations, but Marcos stated that the actual government would continue in civilian hands.

An attempt was made last Friday on the life of the Philippine defence minister. Marcos has ordered the immediate arrest of those "directly involved in the conspiracy to overthrow the government by violence and subversion" and about twenty persons have been rounded up. Among those arrested were one of the President's most outspoken critics, Senator Benigo Aquino, Secretary-General of the opposition Liberal Party.

Gunshots were heard on the campus of the state University, where classes were suspended. The university has been the centre for leftist activities on the islands.

LONDON — Prime Minister Edward Heath, has moved against rightists in his governing Conservative party who have announced opposition to the decision to admit Ugandan Asians into England.

Heath claimed that the critics were trying to find "quibbles" to run away from Britain's obligations. In a letter to the rightist Monday club which urged a ban on non-white immigration and a repatriation of all non-British residents who settled in Britain since 1948, Heath stated that it is the interest of the British people that the British reputation for faith and humanity should be observed.

It did not seem "just", Heath stated that loyal subjects of the crown should be left as stateless citizens when British sovereignty ceases over the territory.

TEL AVIV, ISRAEL — Israeli authorities have reported that regular patrols may be instituted deep inside Lebanese territory if Beirut allows Arab guerillas to continue their activities in southern Lebanon.

Israeli forces invaded Lebanon last week to raid guerilla camps and drive the terrorists away from the border area. Shortly after the Israeli troops were withdrawn, Lebanese forces moved into the area to prevent the return of the guerillas and to patrol the border regions.

Canada: Ontario mini-election a possibility

TORONTO — Premier William Davis has been confronted with the necessity of at least one and possibly six by-elections in Ontario as the events of the past few weeks have made several key seats in the legislature vacant.

Allan Lawrence, former Provincial Secretary of Justice has resigned his seat to seek federal nomination for the Conservative Party. Charles MacNaughton, chairman of the Management Board, brought in by Mr. Davis to act as interim treasurer, is expected to step down after the premier completes hispromiseto reshuffle the cabinet in October.

There may be a possibility of Allan Grossman, Ontario Revenue Minister, and John Yaremko, Solicitor General, the only surviving members of Leslie Frost's Cabinet, to both step down after Davis reshuffles his cabinet.

Deputy Liberal leader Vernon Singer may be in line for a judgeship appointment from the federal government and so would have to resign his seat.

Robert Nixon, leader of the Liberal Party has announced that he will not contest the leadership in a party convention and that he may resign his seat after the event.

This would be the first test of Mr. Davis' Conservative government which took power last year and would require the government to stand on their accomplishments since they took office. The mini-election is likely to occur late this year or early in 1973.

TORONTO — Nine Ontario Cabinet Ministers disclosed their land holdings in the province in response to Premier William Davis' ruling last week. Solicitor General John Yaremko reported seven parcels of land in Halton County, Natrual Resources Minister Leo Bernier claimed six parcels of land in his hometown of Hudson, A.B.R. Lawrence, Provincial Secretary forResource Development reported five parcels in and around Ottawa while Labour Minister Fern Guindon claimed ownership to three parcels of land. All of these holdings were in excess to their homes and recreational property.

Syl Apps, Minister of Correctional Services and provincial MP for Kingston and the Islands reported four parcels of land outside Kingston totalling 190 acres.

The report listing the Ministers' holdings was filed with the clerk of the legislature, Roderick Lewis, and will be available for public scrutiny.

WINNIPEG — Prime Minister Pierre Tudeau clashed with New Democratic Party Leader David Lewis on a hotline radio show in Winnipeg over over Lewis' charges of corporate "ripoff" and unemployment.

Lewis claimed that incentive grants by the federal government and tax deferments to attract firms and to create jobs really haven't served their purpose.

However, Trudeau claimed that the N.D.P. charges were a "phony issue". He stated that there are jobs open in many Canadian communities, but because of higher unemployment insurance and welfare rates, Canadians are more selective.

Lewis admitted that jobs have been created, but that he was looking at the number of jobs not created. He stated that some 30,000 or 40,000 jobs might be available, some part-time and some temporary but that there are 500,000 Canadians unemployed.

In reply Trudeau told Lewis that according to the Economic Council of Canada a certain amount of unemployment cannot be avoided and that a level of three to four percent unemployment would be ideal. Trudeau stated that if those jobs which are presently available were filled, the present unemployment statistics would be very near that mark.

TORONTO — At least 100 of the 800 teachers and support staff at George Brown Community College may be fired this fall, in an attempt to balance the college budget.

College President Clifford Lloyd stated that a joint meeting of the employees' union and the board of governors may be issuing a statement on the financial and staff situation.

The union will be scrutinizing the college's books and if they find that the administration has been doing an efficient job, they will then place the blame on the provincial government for allowing the deficit to develop.

George Brown College receives seventy to eighty percent of their students from the government retraining programme and only receive a $9.00 a day per student supplement from the government, whereas other universities and colleges are receiving fourteen to twenty-three dollars a day.

MONTREAL— The Conservative Party has announced that they would ban all strikes in the essential services and require that they submit to compulsory arbitration. In a policy statement Opposition leader Robert Stanfield pointed out that "the right to strike is a democratic right", that he intended to protect it and that the right would only be taken away in services where a strike "would be a menace to public health and safety".

Stanfield advised the setting up of a public disputes commission to determine those areas where a strike would be a danger. The commission would also anticipate areas of difficulty and try to find solutions for labour conflicts before they develop.

KINGSTON — Lars Thompson, a Queen's University professor, gained the uncontested nomination of the New Democratic Party in the Kingston and the Islands riding in the upcoming federal election.

Thompson stated that he was running because he is an idealist. He claimed agreement with the New Democratic Party attack on corporate welfare bums and pointed out a connection between foreign ownership and unemployment. Thompson also supports the reserving of Canadian resources for the Canadian people.

'And when I say disclosure . . .'

Kingston labour to support students

The Alma Mater Society and the Ontario Federation of Students will be supported by the labour movement in their negotiations with the provincial government over the fee increase according to Ken Won, External Affairs Commissioner.

Endorsement was received this week in a letter from Vince Maloney, President of Kingston and District Labour Council which represents the Regional office of the Canadian Labour Council, the regional office of the United Steel workers of America and the regional Office of the Ontario Federation of Labour.

His letter stated that "the labour movement has consistently maintained that higher education should be available to all Canadians, regardless of financial status. The only criteria should be the academic capabilities of the students concerned."

Maloney also commented that "the unilateral manner in which these changes in fees of loans introduced, without prior negotiations is contrary to the concept of the democratic process."

On October 11, the same day as the fee strike referendum, Ken Wong will address the Canadian Labour Council on how government changes in education affect both students and the public sector. "If fewer students can afford to go to university, then there will be a flood on the job market," Wong said.

On the same day the Kingston and District Chamber of Commerce will discuss a position paper submitted by Wong on why they should support the AMS.

Various Kingston ladies guilds have also been approached for support.

Plans are also underway to "send a telegram to George Kerr in protest of the arbitrary government moves", Wong commented.

Status of women at Queen's studied

by Sandra Bernstein

The Principal's committee on the Status of Women at Queen's met for the first time on Monday.

The committee was established by Dr. Deutsch late last spring, to review the entire situation of women on campus and to ensure that no woman was suffering from discrimination. The principal feels that over a long period of time things tend to go on as they were, and that it is necessary to periodically examine practices and policies to ensure that they are adequate. He has expressed the hope that discrimination does not exist at Queen's, but sees the need to be informed of any injustices that may exist so that these can be quickly corrected.

Mrs. L. Good, chairman of the committee, describes it as neither a tribunal nor a grievance committee, but rather one designed to make general recommendations based on specific cases which illustrate present university policy. Its report, including a review of the position of women on campus and suggestions for improvements the committee may deem necessary, will be presented in spring to Dr. Deutsch.

At the first meeting, the eight members decided that most meetings would be closed to protect the privacy of persons who might be making confidential statements to the committee. However, open meetings will be held as often as possible, where briefs and comments from the public will be welcomed. Advance notice of such meetings will be given, and written submissions will be accepted in the near future.

Right now, the members are compiling data from personnel, payroll, and other university departments, for use in examining the basic fields of interest of the committee. These include academic areas: recruitment, promotion, appointments, salaries, incentive for advance, and fringe benefits of academic staff; (non-academic support staff and part time employees will also be studied under these categories); student areas: admissions policy and procedures, registration, women in professional faculties, past and present enrollment patterns, scholarships and student aid at all levels, the status of married and graduate students, student employment on campus, the employment bureau, student experience in traditionally male-dominated areas, housing.

Other questions with which this committee will concern itself include day care, and the possibility of a women's studies course.

Mrs. Good emphasizes that these areas indicate fields of enquiry rather than areas in which there is known to be discrimination. The list is very flexible.

Marney Cousins, a student representative on the committee said "I'm impressed with the scope of interest on the part of the members of the committee; there's good interaction and people are interested in problems that lie outside their own fields. Right now my biggest fear is that the initial reaction of people will be disinterest or derision. This is a study of people's rights. It looks into all the aspects and functions of life at Queen's."

Miss Cousins added that her primary interest was in students, from whom she hopes to get feedback on women's status.

Further study of University Centre

by Allan Frizzell

The University centre users met with architects on Tuesday to consider further plans for the proposed centre.

Topics discussed included zoning changes with reference to commercial development and a suggestion that consultants should be called in to advise on Food Service arrangements.

There was no dramatic changes in allocation allowances though complaints were heard from some quarters about no inclusion in the project. The Queen's radio station C.F.R.C. was one of those groups who felt they should be included.

Another proposal was for the establishment of a Post Office in the centre, this was modified by a suggestion for a drug store type unit which could also sell such commodities as postage stamps, etc.

Kurt Gessel, Deputy Campus Planner told the Journal that final space allocation will take place at a later date and that more feedback from interested parties is required before this matter can be finalized. He also stated that deadlines were set at the meeting to ensure that the Final Building Programme can be completed by the end of the year.

After this is published it must be approved by the Vice Principal, Senate and the Board of Trustees before actual construction can begin.

"Human sexuality" is a non-credit course

by Steve Winnett

"This is not a sex course, but rather a course in human sexuality", John Seveigny commented at the Birth Control and Information Referral Centre, which is sponsoring a 9-week series of lectures and films. The first presentation began with a lecture by Dr. William Zion of Theology, and a film entitled "Sexuality and Communication", on Tuesday night, in Stirling Hall D, before an audience of about two hundred.

Seveigny emphasized that the course will explore the subject of human sexuality from as many disciplines as possible. As an added feature, SKAT (Sex Knowledge and Attitude Tests) will be given at the beginning and end of the course, presumably to measure expected changes in students' knowledge of and attitudes toward sex. The course will be non-credit.

Among the topics to be covered in succeeding weeks are "Evolution of Sexual Behavior", "Sex Roles", and "Human Sexual Response". Speakers will be from such diverse departments as Biology, Sociology, Obstetrics and Gynecology, Psychiatry, Education and Psychiatric Nursing.

Dr. Zion examined two subjects in his short but informative opening address: the problem of an inter-disciplinary approach to human sexuality, and the nature and effect of the "sexual revolution".

The problem of an inter-disciplinary approach is one common to the sciences today: single vision. The Sciences take things apart- we see things in parts, but not as a whole. "Masters and Johnson are most absorbing reading- but how do I get it back together again, i.e. how do I get along with my wife from day to day," Zion commented.

This isolating approach can distort the reality of the totality. Life is about whole persons, not parts. Our age is very interested in parts- how many faces are there in pornography?

"Has the sexual revolution been an unmixed good? It may have given us a certain freedom, an abstention from sitting in judgement, a willingness to let others be-but, has it given us more joy, eros, ecstasy? In Sweden, people are bored," Zion said.

Prof. Zion made frequent reference to Rollo May's book, Love and Will. According to May, we are in the age of a new puritanism, based on a lack of tenderness. We are alienated from our bodies, which we have come to treat as how-to-do-it machines taking their instructions from medical manuals- we don't feel much of anything. We have separated our emotions from reason- we no longer have subtle feelings, or burning passions. A spare-parts mentality seems to prevail- when we lose one partner, we merely look for another one.

Thompson, in The Edge of History, describes the "sexual revolution" as "the last gasp of sexuality", before the function is entirely taken over by machines, such as sperm banks. "We are wild about sex because it's on the way out."

Prof. Zion concluded that he hoped the course "will make your love more successful. Love makes life rich. Loving is next to godliness."

This lecture was followed by a rather over-long film on "Sexuality and Communication", starring Drs. Beryl and Arinoam Chernick acting out the roles of the counselling doctor, the unresponsive wife, and the prematurely ejaculating husband. The film was made before an audience at the Ontario Science Centre.

It begins with a dramatised discussion of a specific problem of sexual function. The otherwise boring discussion was weakened by a series of sex jokes which were funny at the time but grew pale with the telling, and by the stimulating device of an overhead projector showing Masters and Johnson's graphs to measure human sexual response.

First, "Mrs. Jones" primly recited her catechism of "what happens during sex", going through the four phases shown in the diagram. Her problem was an inability to reach a climax, illustrated in the graph. "Mr. Jones" then presented the personne of the tense hyperactive, fast-climbing-young-executive-North American male, and then gave an account of his won sex life on the farm and in the navy ("when three hundred guys come off a boat, and there are only two or three places to go to, and there are thirty or forty guys outside ....well, you can't waste time") ..and so on. (For those interested, as Mr. Jones' curve approaches the vertical axis, he approached impotence.)

The problem is, on purely sexual terms, how to make the curves meet - and the answer put forth in the second part of the film (the title did not lie) was communication, which is a problem of attitudes and feelings. The mythical Joneses (roles were altered with transvestite swiftness) were made to dissect their home life, which seemed to exhibit all the paperback characteristics of alienated man and woman in the 20th Century. Suburbian husband watches t.v. all weekend, ignores wife, who nags him about an impossible child, etc. In bed, they are very lonely. Mutual compromise and understanding are required for a more rewarding relationship.

This exciting scene was followed by an equally irrelevant panoramic view of the tulips outside the Ontario Science Centre, and the loving couples, young and old, happily strolling therein- who knows, perhaps answering their SKAT questionnaires?

Changes since the Cultural Revolution

by Mastin Jones

The cultural revolution has left a far greater impact on Chinese society than Westerners have realized. This was the impression that Mr. L. E. Willmott received during a recent visit to the Communist country. Currently President of the Chinese Canada Friendship Association, Mr. Willmott appeared as the guest speaker at an S.C.M. seminar on the Student Christian Movement on "China after the Cultural Revolution" on Monday night.

A veteran of 30 years of missionary work in China, he spoke enthusiastically of the changes he had seen in the new China.

Willmott interpreted the cultural revolution that erupted in the middle sixties as a struggle between two factions and ideologies. Lui Shen Chi had managed to come to power after the failure of Mao's great leap forward. Supported by the Communist old guard, Lui tackled the problem of modernization by advocating technical expertise, bureaucratic organization and competition, decisive wage scales and incentive programmes were instituted and production became the dominant criterion of industrial success. The social and human values of the revolution were being lost to revisionism.

The Maoist opposition to Lui arose in the People's Liberation Army and the Red Guards. Their victory resulted in the initial removal of the unpopular Communist Party Committees and the establishment of the army as the effective authority in the country. Today the CP committees have once again replaced the army but it is now recognized that their position and power derives from the masses, not from Peking.

The cultural revolution revealed Mao's great faith in the masses and his belief that man is capable of being infinitly re-educated. The ideals of today's China, cooperation and selflessness, are the basic themes in Maoist thought. Everywhere that Mr. Willmott travelled he saw evidence that power had indeed reverted to the masses. The enthusiasm of the Chinese people for the new regime persuaded Mr. Willmott that the cultural revolution had, as Mao described it, "touched the people to their souls."

Commerceman will soon appear

"The Commerceman, an annual publication of the Commerce Society, will appear in late November", the editor, Gord McDiarmid told the Journal.

This magazine which was first published in 1945, combines aspects of a business periodical with topics of specific student orientation.

This year the Commerceman will include articles by Dean Uffen, Dean of Engineering at Queen's, Mr. Beaudoin, President of Bombardier Skidoo and N. J. Reddon, Queen's graduate and professor at the University of New Brunswick.

Articles of particular interest to students will include the development of the Commerce Society by Bill Deluccia, past President of the Commerce Society and Commerce orientation by Ian Nordheimer chief constable. The results of a survey on the relevancy of a Bachelor of Commerce Degree to the real world will also be published.

Other Commerce projects include a faculty-student luncheon on Wednesday, October 3, and a dance called Country Hoe Down in the arena.

Rugby club announces prizes

Debbie Mills will not have to pay her tuition this year. Last Saturday she won the Rugby Club's Tuition Raffle and received an arts and science undergraduate tuition.

Principal J. J. Deutsch made the draw during the half-time of the Queen's-Ottawa U. football game last Saturday. However, his duties were not confined only to this one draw. In view of the overwhelming support by the student body, the Rugby Club announced during the football game that two $50 prizes and two $100 prizes would also be awarded.

The winners of these prizes were as follows: $100 Bill Bell 399 Albert St. ticket No. 688; $100 Mary Mcaskill 311 King St. ticket No. 5983; $50 Valerie Webb 217 Nelson St. ticket No. 140; $50 Nancy Walsh Victoria Hall ticket No. 5911.

The Rugby Club asks that those winners who have not yet collected their bounty bring their tickets to the Phys. Ed. office where they will be directed to the loot.

Bus transit experiment soon

October is bound to be a month of movement for Queen's students. Our Alma Mater Society and the Kingston Public Utilities Commission are undertaking an experiment in local bus transit.

As of this Monday (October 2) Queen's students will have no-cost access to four of six routes of the Kingston Public Transit System. On presentation of the green I.D. Card, Queen's students may ride the Kingston 'BLUE BOMBS' to distant points within the Kingston City Limits - including: The Kingston Shopping Center, Lake Ontario Park, the Market, the Manor, or the LCBO.

The experiment - BUSIT - is to last until Saturday, October 28. Data collected in the third week of BUSIT will provide both the AMS and the P.U.C. with details of bus usage by students. Conclusions will be made public in early November. A simultaneous referendum will determine whether Queen's students will wish to pay a flat rate included in future non-academic fees for similar access to the Kingston transit system. The exact rate will be calculated following the BUSIT experiment as a function of projected usage.

Positive aspects of such a transit arrangement for Queen's students are in the possibilities of improving the interaction between Queen's West and Main campuses, and of increasing the accessibility to outlying commercial, recreational, and residential areas.

the BUSIT period shall be from October 2nd, to October 28th, 1972 inclusive.

Free travel will be permitted on four routes of the Kingston Bus Transit system - all regular routes save those serving Barriefield and Henderson Place, and the Dial-A-Bus System - on the presentation of a Queen's Student I.D. Card to the Bus Operators.

No transfers will be issued to students. If a trip requires the use of more than one bus the student is to show his I.D. Card on boarding each bus.

BUSIT offers the people of Queen's and Kingston an opportunity which should not be passed by. It is hoped that Queen's students will experiment with the Kingston Transit system, and will be active in evaluating future arrangements.

Bus Routes, Maps and Schedules will be posted at many points on campus before Monday.

Hop on a bus and move! BUSIT starts Monday!

Deutsch appoints student adviser

Principal John J. Deutsch has announced that Professor James A. Whitley, Executive Assistant to the Principal has been officially assigned particular responsibilities in the area of student affairs and services which he has been handling for the past year. F. O. Bogstad, formerly with the Computing Centre has been named Whitley's assistant and will also act as student services liaison officer.

Whitley will advise the Principal in affairs pertaining to student affairs in general, and will represent the University on provincial and national organizations concerned with student affairs. On campus, he will participate in such groups as the Senate Committee on Student Affairs, the Residences Board, the Men's Residences Board, the University Health Council, The Student Affairs Committee of the School of Graduate Studies and Research, the International Centre Management Board, the Elrond College Board, and the University-City Liaison Committee. Bogstad will assist in facilitating the operation of student housing, counselling, and career planning and placement services.

The position of Dean of Student Affairs, which was formerly held by Professor Stewart Webster, will not be filled for the time being pending a review of the role of that office which will be undertaken this year by the Senate Committee on Student Affairs.

Vandals break into Watson Hall

Vandals broke in to Watson Hall on Tuesday night causing considerable damage, particularly in the fifth floor offices of the Department of Classics.

Mr. Luker of Queen's Physical Plant told the Journal that the vandals had either hidden in the building or had a key and had let themselves in. No evidence of a forced entry was found.

A fire extinguisher had been used to break the plate glass window in the office of the department of Classics. Files and papers were strewn on the floor, and office equipment was damaged. A small amount of money was taken but a complete inventory has not been taken to determine the extent of the robbery.

The vandals continued down through Watson, floor by floor causing smaller damages. The vending machines were also targets of the vandalism. Six machines were wrecked and the money taken.

Police are presently investigating the break-in.

Campuses face enrolment drops

Carleton University faces the possibility of a $1.3 million deficit this year because approximately 600 fewer full-time students registered than were expected.

Fewer students means less provincial money for the university because government grants are based on enrolment. Carleton's new president Michael Oliver said he was concerned that the tuition fee increase had prevented many qualified students from enrolling.

The deficit could mean that staff cut backs are inevitable although measures will be taken to minimize this effect.

The decreases in enrolment at Canadian universities were expected to boost the enrolment at community colleges as students opt for the more employment-oriented colleges. In Ontario, however, 400 fewer students enrolled in the community colleges than administrators expected. This year, the growth rate of community colleges is 13 per cent, the same as last year's. The 20 Ontario colleges had optimistically predicted a 25 per cent growth rate.

Meanwhile Montreal's Sir George Williams University has been even more drastically affected by decreases in enrolment. The decline from last year's 17,221 students to 15,560 this fall can be partially attributed to the phasing out of the CEGEP programs.

'76 exec. chosen

On Tuesday, Artsci '76 elected its Year Executive, which will serve until next February. Richard Meech and Nancy Riley were elected President and Vice-President, respectively. The other members of the executive will include Sue Blinn, Secretary; Chris Wallace, Treasurer; Dave Searle, Social Convenor; Kelly Donovan, Publicity Manager; Jane Toller, Women's Athletic Stick; and Jim Gillis, Men's Athletic

Beaver Foods

Dear Editor,

Excuse my precocity in attacking one of Queen's local institutions - Beaver Foods. At two-thirty on Thursday afternoon after waiting in an enormous queue, I discovered that there was no pop - gingerale, coke, sprite, nor any of the two orange and yellow coloured liquids which crown the pop machine. A small quantity of orange juice remained which I took, only to find my wallet drained of 20c at the cashiers. If we can't have low prices, at least we could have some service.

Help.

Signed;
Everyman

Pity Mr. Smith

The Editor,
(In reply to the letter of J. W. Smith, found in the Journal of Sept. 22, 1972.)

Dear Mr. Smith;

I pity you Sir! If you have come to Queen's with the attitude that the creative endeavours of your peers should be made public only if they reflect the "professional touch", you will do doubt experience many moments of frustration, over the next four years.

I hesitate to tell this: not only will amateur poets continue to haunt you, but also amateur photographers, painters, sculptors, film-makers and musicians.

Why, we even dedicate an annual exhibition to them - the "Queen's Festival of the Arts." It is a celebration of creativity by students, for students.

Sensitively yours,
Sheila M. Harwood

Guild Theatre

The Editor,
Dear Editor;

In connection with your recent article on Drama Guild activities (p. 8, Journal, Sept. 22, 1972), we would like to draw attention to two inaccuracies.

First, the Guildhall Theatre was in fact designed last spring by a team of four students chosen from Drama 240 (design). Kingston Community Theatre helped to realise these plans during the summer and while their assistance was greatly appreciated, they should not have been given credit for the original design work.

Second, as regards the revitalisation of "campus interest in such classic playwrights as Shakespeare and Moliere", to the best of our knowledge this statement is completely misleading. The Guildhall Theatre has been established to provide its members with the opportunity to produce plays of their choice; the Executive intends no such restrictions as your statement implies.

In closing, we feel that the history of the Guild has little bearing on the possibilities inherent in the Guildhall Theatre, and question your editing of the article we submitted for publication. We are concerned with the present and future of the Guild, rather than with its past.

Yours truly
The Guild Executive

A Needham fan

To: The Editor of the Queen's Journal
Re: Needham Demands Freedom, September 19

After reading Mr. Osler's article on Richard Needham, I was not only surprised but also appalled that such a poor piece of writing could appear in a university newspaper.

Having worked closely last summer with Mr. Needham at the Globe and Mail Office in Toronto, I know how exacting he was in writing and proof-reading his columns. How ironic it is then that, in his praise of Mr. Needham, Mr. Osler insults not only his readers but also his subject by the countless structural, grammatical, and spelling errors he commits.

Perhaps Mr. Needham could use this as an example of how lacking in basics a university education sometimes can be.

A lot of bucks Defended

In response to the letter entitled "A lot of crap" in the last issue of the Journal, we must first state that we were disappointed in the conclusion reached by the President of the Graduate Student Society. Both the title of his letter and sweeping generalizations scattered through it, such as "many of the facts", "gross errors", and "frivolous analyses" certainly accuse the article "One Hundred is a Lot of Bucks" of being entirely incorrect. These judgements on the validity of the article seem to be based entirely on a single piece of evidence.

Although our per centage figure of 20.4 was, indeed, incorrect, the basis of comparison employed in the article in dollars and cents, was correct. The figure 3.4 per cent of $10,950, the amount of money the institution receives for a graduate student with a weight of 6 points on the BIU scale is approximately $360. In the present issue, per centages are not at stake -- dollars are. We admit this miscalculation and thank the President of the Graduate Student Society for pointing it out. Another point which the author of "A lot of crap" seized upon was that somehow the article gave him the impression that this $360 was going into his empty pocket. It was made quite clear in the article that any figure arrived at by employing the BIU point system and formula was money the institution received from the Provincial Government. Certainly the validity of the entire article should not be discounted based on such meagre evidence. To do so can only be seen as a radical act of sensationalism.

We are pleased to see that the disagreement between the President of the Graduate Student Society and the authors of "One Hundred is a lot of Bucks" is over such trifles and not general aims. Both parties agree that some action must be taken to stop the government from exploiting the student population, and that the most effective means of accomplishing this end is unqualified support of the principles of collective bargaining. In terms of this overall framework, we are certain that the President of the Graduate Student Society will also agree that the algebraic question of whether $360 is 3.4 percent or 20.4 per cent of $10,950 is inconsequential.

Awareness of the Law

"educating people as to the existence of the law"

by Tom Barber

Have you ever encountered a marvelously persuasive salesman at the front door of your house who sold you a fifteen year subscription to The Australian Outdoorsman, for only $95? If you have, you probably spent several minutes recovering from his departure only to suddely realize that you don't really care about fishing in the Outback, and to wish you hadn't bought the subscription.

There is a law which says you have the right to cancel any agreement made with a door-to-door salesman within a two day period. Most people don't know this law exists. Consequently, they get stuck with magazine subscriptions, vacuum cleaners, cosmetics, and encyclopedias that they don't want.

Similarily, there are countless other laws people don't generally know about. For instance, Landlords cannot insist on a damage deposit when renting an unfurnished apartment, cannot lock a tenant out of an apartment, and cannot seize a tenant's goods without a court order.

One of the groups aware of these legal provisions is the Queen's Students' Legal Aid Society. Operating from an office at 200 Montreal Street, Queen's Legal Aid offers legal advice and help, as well as legal education for the citizens. It is staffed by students in the Faculty of Law at Queen's, and currently involves about 100 law students.

There are many reasons for the existence of this legal aid service, which are best illuminated by a brief look at the history of legal aid services in this province.

Prior to 1951, free legal service was provided by certain benevolent lawyers, who recognized that many people could not afford the services of a lawyer. A lawyer would be approached by a person with a legal problem, and would agree to handle the case without accepting a fee, or accepting a fee the client could afford but which was probably less than the regular amount charged. Most lawyers did some work of this nature.

In 1951, the Law Society of Upper Canada, the somewhat officiously named lawyers union in Ontario, formally recognized that there was a substantial part of the population which could not afford legal service. They organized a system to provide free legal service, which was essentially a formalization of the earlier procedure. They compiled lists of lawyers who would be willing to provide free service, and sent applicants to the volunteering lawyers.

This system progressed for over a decade, and in 1965, a committee looking into the matter recommended going a step further. The report of the committee said that in view of the increasing complexities of life in the 1960's, and the increasing amount of legislation being enacted, there was an increasing need for access to legal services by everyone in the population. Free legal service, they said, was to be regarded as a right, not a charity.

This report lead, in 1966, to the establishment of the Ontario Legal Aid Plan, which was a creature of the provincial government and was administered by the Law Society of Upper Canada. Offices were designated across Ontario, and lawyers were appointed to be directors in various areas. People who decided they had a legal problem made application to the office in their area.

The area director would first screen the application to see if it involved a legal problem. If it did, he would then direct the applicant to the local office of the Ontario Department of Family and Social Services, where a means test was administered to ascertain that the applicant could not afford a lawyer. If the means test showed need, the area director would award a certificate, entitling the holder to engage the lawyer of his choice, providing the lawyer would accept the case. Seventy-five percent of the bill would be paid by the provincial government, and the lawyer would pick up the tab for the remaining 25 per cent.

About 40 per cent of the lawyers in Ontario participate in the program, many of them the young lawyers in the first years of practice.

While the government legal aid plan has and does operate effectively for many people in Ontario, there are several gaps in its service. In the first place, it is geared to the "adversary" method of law, and aids primarily those involved in litigation, or courtroom action. It seldom provides for the person who may have a legal problem that need not enter the courtroom, but may be solved with some advice and out-of-court negotiation.

Secondly, it has evolved that the government program tends to award certificates only to those who are involved in major legal situations. In legal terms, these would be indictable criminal offences, such as murder, robbery, or theft, or civil actions, such as result from an automobile accident. The most memorable case of indictable criminal offences handled by Legal Aid in Kingston, occurred last year after the Kingston Penitentiary disorder, when twelve of thirteen defendants were represented by lawyers financed by the Ontario Legal Aid Plan.

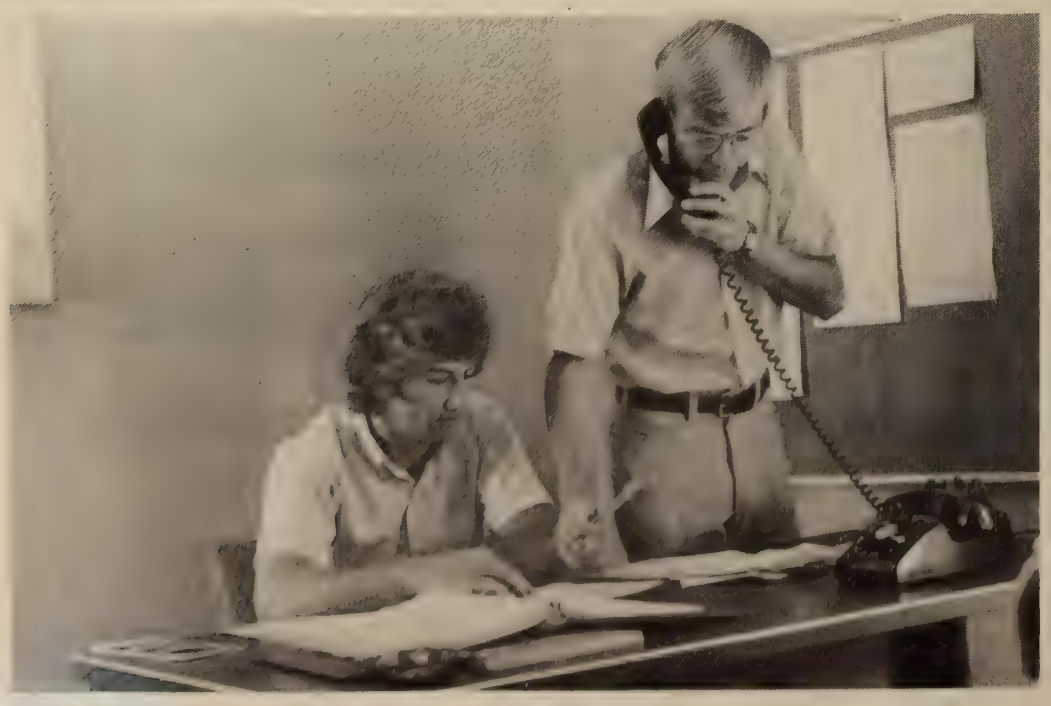
The Legal Aid Plans almost never awards certificates to people with relatively small legal problems, such as someone contesting a ruling regarding welfare payments, or citizen's groups protesting zoning regulations. Thus, in a sense, it is still removed from helping many people who need legal help and cannot afford it.

Thirdly, the government legal aid plan does not engage in "preventive law". Preventive law is essentially a program of educating people as to the existence of the law, and the extent to which it can be utilized to solve problems. Many people encounter situations to which they object, but they tolerate them because they don't know of any way out. Many of these situations are dealt with under the law, and legal advice or action can help sort them out. Preventive law is a program of informing people about the law so that these problematic situations won't seem so awesome.

The government plan is so occupied with "major" legal cases, that it never gets time to focus on preventive law. Thus, a further gap occurs in its system.

One of the sources of the problems encountered by the government plan is that of financing. Each area director has a certain budget under which he must work. From experience, he knows that there will be a given number of major cases for which the plan will have to pay. Thus, he must set priorities, and the average potential client is placed at a low priority.

Such problems were recognized by both the participants in the government legal aid plan, and those outside of the organization. In 1969, four members of the Queen's Faculty of Law took steps to fill some of the gaps. Prof. Stuart Ryan, second year student Dennis Latham, first year student Mike Picher, and Prof. Ron Price set up the Queen's Law Students' Legal Aid Society. A provision of the government plan allowed for the formation of student legal aid groups, with the approval of the Law Society of Upper Canada. This approval was granted to the Queen's group. Essentially it involved permission to take referrals from the area director of the government plan.



The Queen's Law Students' Legal Aid Society opened business at 200 Montreal Street, its present office. Sixty students volunteered their services. For the first two weeks, the major event was the delivery of the Shopper's News; business was slow. However, business soon began to pick up, and presently the office handles about 400 cases each term.

Most of the work handled by the Students' Legal Aid centres round Small Claims Court, Provincial Court (Criminal Division), and Provincial Court (Family Division). Their office is located in the North Kingston area, and the majority of the clients come from that area, but calls are received from all parts of the city. The organization aims at people who can't afford lawyers, from the working poor to people on welfare.

One of the areas into which Students' Legal Aid would like to become more active is that of preventive law. Already, several moves have been made in this direction. A booklet, "You and the Law" has been published in conjunction with the AMS, and distributed through the Montreal St. office to Queen's student registration, as well as to other groups and agencies. The booklet outlines what the law has to say in many matters relevent to the average person without much money.

One of the major problems in the pursuit of the preventive law program is to find groups to talk to. Many people are still not aware of the need for basic legal awareness. Students' Legal Aid desires extended contacts with the community, both to advise individuals on the nature of the law and what it can do, and to advise citizens groups on how the law defines their objectives.

Queen's Law Students' Legal Aid Society is located at 200 Montreal Street. Office hours are 7:00 p.m. to 9:00 p.m., Monday to Thursday, 1:30 p.m. to 3:30 p.m. Friday. The telephone number is 548-3688.

Want to be a Volunteer?

The Student Volunteer Bureau is a student-run organization which helps interested students make contact with many social service agencies in Kingston. According to Gord McDiarmid (Head of SVB) acting as the middle man between the student body and local services is the main objective of the SVB organization. These agencies are in desperate need of volunteers who are willing to make a regular and responsible committment. SVB tries to help them get these volunteers.

Secondary objectives of the program attempts to bring the Queen's student into closer contact with the Kingston community. Often, students at a university like Queen's centre their lives around the University and its social functions. They tend to forget they are also a part of a larger community. By volunteering, a student has the chance to become aware of the problems which exist in that community, as well as to do something rewarding.

Once again this year the SVB received a large grant from the AMS for $2,300. 80 per cent of this amount is budgeted to employ a full time secretary who runs the SVB office which is located in the Student Union Building.

During the first summer of operations for the Opportunities For Youth program in 1971, SVB received the largest government grant of $75,000 and employed 73 students. These people were placed in various social service agencies throughout Kingston. This past summer with a $9,000 grant from OFY the Student Volunteer Bureau sponsored Adventure Playground in Kingston.

There are four main areas from which a volunteer can choose. This year due to additional cooperation from the Prison officials one hundred to a possible two hundred positions are open in the Women's and Kingston Penitentiaries (compared to forty people last year). The Prisons need volunteers for tutorial programs, social evenings, to lead discussion groups or to be escorts for social outings and shopping.

The largest area is Health Services. One hundred volunteers alone work at Kingston Psychiatric Hospital in group work, musical and sport therapy and in socializing and remotivation programs.

The Hospitals need personel for therapy groups, visiting patients, in the gift shop or reading and writing letters and feeding chronically ill adults. There is, also, opportunities to help with play therapy and in the feeding program for retarded children.

There are tuitorial and swimming programs, outings and craft workshops at Children's Homes which are in need of volunteers. Various other organizations are the Birth Control and Abortion Services, nursery schools and skating programs with the Association for the Mentally Retarded.

Other major categories are the Education and Recreation and Youth Activities. Volunteers will work in community school athletic programs, with the Boy Scouts and Girl Guides, councelling drug users, supply Sunday School teaching and in the YMCA, YWCA and Senior citizens programs.

As well, a new project called Help-Bank is being initiated by SVB this year. They are setting up a bank of people who would be willing to help on "one shot" or short term projects. During the year SVB is often asked to supply volunteers for projects such as canvassing, helping old people or children at a specific event. In the project a person is not required to make a definite committment.

If you want to become a volunteer the best way is to come to SVB night on Wednesday, October 4 in Stirling Hall at 7:30 pm. Come and find out exactly which agencies that interest you.

During the day more information is available in the SVB offices from 9:30 am to 4:00 pm or phone 547-5766.

Twenty five years ago, the Canadian Red Cross established the Blood Transfusion Service to ensure that blood would be available when needed to save a life. In 1972, almost 1,000,000 units of blood must be collected to meet the blood needs of our hospital patients. The Queen's Engineering Society will do its part in this drive by holding the first of two blood clinics on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, October 3, 4, and 5 in the games room of Victoria Hall. The hours for the clinic will be 11:00 am to 2:00 pm, and 5:00 pm to 8:00 pm.

Experimental films... "The Flawless Pattern of Rotation"

by L. Melnyk

We always find ourselves seduced by words, until the winds of enunciation blow us too far in our languid stupor and we wake up on a desolate brink, wondering if its too late. So that if Wall Street creates (what irony isn't possible these days?) a name Experimental Film, most can be forgiven when they expect to be short-changed, by flighty "experiments". Everyone wants a new face with the same old orgasm.

There was nothing experimental about the films shown Tuesday night at Dunning Hall, nor was there any smell of indecision. No question marks, not in this art. The composers knew what they were getting into. No fear, no experiment, with 90 per cent failure. Scenes never before shown....even with a programme of such force and varied brilliance. I long for universal frenzy, for the protagonist's return in comedy and the violent motion of exploding vacuum-into-presence coloured with moments of space between your brain cells. This programme has brought the heroes welcome. How else could the bludgeon of freedom be presented but in free form, with performances gathered from the dark interiors of soft-focus prisons?

Art is now returning to cellular micro-motion; the aurora borealis of tribillionth micro-seconds; no longer is art chained to the vertigo plunge of the eye-ball towards a mountainscape with filtered clouds and rosy sunset. For a long time now (time fills every drunken cup with more than destiny) art has reflected man's, perhaps latest, perhaps continuous, investigation of the sub-atomic, sub-pionic, sub-stratum universe, the very limits of our state of World Will, where all creation into being is born to awareness. While the general public most aptly represented by Queen's students finds its due seclusion in Ali McGraw's nipple, there are fortunately a few men and women who are sensitive to the draining of flow-motion as it struggles to maintain its snowflake shape nowhere near Arcturus. And these have done the film; and we have done the watching; and the leaves are changing on Queen's campus after six revolutionary nymphs were desecrated and shipped post paid to the Alaska pipeline. With them was sent the unity of physics, the collaboration of fluid mechanics with non-existent numbers.

Of the films shown, "Variations on a Cellophane Wrapper" (1970) was, in a formal sense, the best. And this for at least two reasons: it was the most unified and positively crisp; devoid of simultaneous attacks, this 8 minute voyage down the River Alph caressed Form into a new ecstacy. Opening with the terror of a factory colossus, this film subjected a worker swishing huge cellophane to the repeated exploration of the atomic camera. Contents: unknown. Destination:....The sea's rhythmic fall and swell, turned pneumatic convulsions for stark sparkling light, the reality of Tortures Imagination that dissolves in terror at the term psychic videon. A poet who knew Mozart's muse surrendered the scenario. Opera by David Rimmer.

Closely akin was Ed Emswhiller's Relativity; perhaps second only through its obscure imagery that repeated the same principles, even though eloquently. Five minutes cut from its 38 would be no loss. Yet, it's a divine score against the Queen Dairy Queen, and hot dogs morticians must shovel out of 20th century skulls into neo-plasticides through loudspeakers of lepric Bellelectric orchestras. A severe plea for humility and human love; compassion, disaster, sexual delirium, that devastate the doll-Man, it leaves us cripples in a monster fire. Stunning and terribly terribly frightening.

Film With Three Dancers (1970) again by Emswhiller, breathes a sexual romanticism; so beautiful...bare trees in a haunted picture, three naked shells with spirits of blow-torch vitality. Again, frightened and amazed to delirium. Terrified by this surpassing of Mick Jagger's Performance, afraid to wake up a stinking corpse in a death vault's gloom, but so serene, overcoming the agony of flesh, reaching and yearning, the combination that yields the one white aura streaks beyond the reach of mudslide bulldozers and gives hope to each loving couple that goes to bed tonight. When will North America burn its Playboys? Dancers has lit the match.

I could go on to tell of the other four films shown that night. But I could give none the merit and adoration they derserve. Each was so compact, so intense, so new, that conversation should still be going on, un-interrupted, the last remains of the gravitational curve. It was a good day that day. Infinite thanks to the Gallery Association of Agnes Etherington which sponsored the programme. Thank you. There's a naked angel at the door and time carried me away to a new.

Juilliard String Quartet

"As symbols of durability in a shaky world, Beethoven and the Juilliard Quartet will do," stated the New York Times' Donald Henahan on the occasion of the famous Quartet's 25th Anniversary Concert in New York's Tully Hall in October 1971. He continued: "The kind of performance for which the Juilliard is admired: precise, without eccentricities, flawless in musicianship, and attuned to every change of the composer's mood". Harold Schonberg, also of the New York Times, phrased it more concisely: "The Juilliard String Quartet represents the very model of modern quartet playing at its best."

Beethoven's Quartet Opus 59, No. 2, will be the featured work when the Juilliard Quartet makes its first Kingston appearance on Thursday 5 October. This will be the first concert in the popular Grant Hall Series, sponsored by the Division of Concerts at Queen's.

Other works on the programme include the Quartet Opus 30, No. 1, by J. N. Hummel and Bela Bartok's Quartet No. 2.

In addition to their activities as quartet-in-residence at the Juilliard School of Music in New York, they have also been the quartet-in-residence at the Library of Congress in Washington since 1962. The latter gives them the privilege lf using teh invaluable Stradivarius instruments that have been willed to that institution.

The Juilliard Quartet has toured extensively. Whey they played in Moscow their first concert ended with four encores and a standing ovation. Following their Toronto performance last March, the Globe and Mail wrote that the Quartet "is as near to perfection as one can reasonably hope for in the contemporary world of chamber music ensembles."

Single tickets for the Thursday 5 October performance in Grant Hall at 8:30 p.m. are currently on sale at the Division of Concerts Box Office in the Agnes Etherington Art Centre at $2.00 or $3.00 students; $3.00 or $4.00 non-students. Reservations can be made by telephone the Division of Concerts at 547-6194.

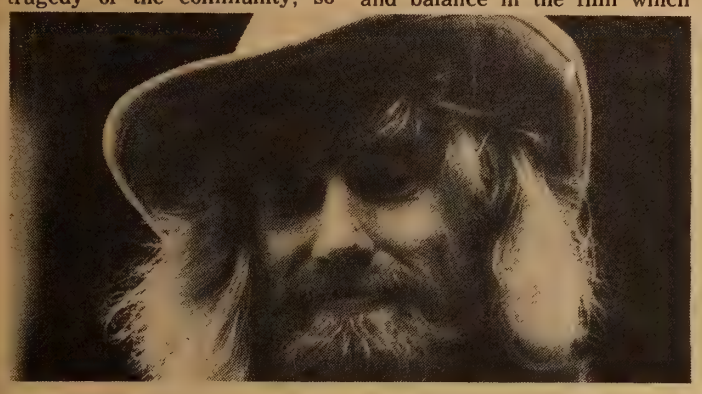
'Fiddler' surprisingly good

by Paul Gompertz

There have been several good movies based upon the upheavals caused by the Russian Revolution, 'Doctor Zhivago' and 'Nicholas and Alexandra' spring immediately to mind. Both of these were good movies of the epic kind, but both suffered to some extent from the limitations of their own genesis. They were both inextricably part of the Revolution itself, and it is by transcending this historical specificity that 'Fiddler on the Roof' becomes a more comprehensive and I think palpably better movie.

This is not just because the persecution of the Jews has never been confined to any particular era, but also because there is a perfect balance between the tragedy of the individual and the tragedy of the community, so that the ethnic injustice is mirrored as a human one. The film plays upon the dilemma of the whole, from the smallest unit in the village to the country itself.



The problems encountered by Tevye (Topol) while essentially concerned with his religious conviction, are nevertheless representative of a more general dichotomy between traditions, which represent what is accepted as right, and the emergence of primarily human values. The marriage of each of his daughters tears deeper into the ethics of his beliefs and in each case he is forced to accept the newly emerging life values.

The development of his new awareness is underlined by the use of the same cinematic technique on each occasion and it is this find of careful integration and balance in the film which goes to make it so comprehensive. From as early as the first song, where the import of 'Tradition' is accentuated by the exaggerated portrayal of the ingrained rhythms of village life, story and technique work in complete harmony.

Even in Topol himself, and indeed the rest of the cast, the indomitable life spirit remains in balance with both major and minor tragedies, and the humour and vitality of the village life is forever infectiously present.

The disintegration of the village is a sad point at which to end the film, and yet the hope for the future is embodied in Tevye's final acceptance of his third daughter's marriage, and also in the philosophy expressed by her husband.

The variety offered by this film, which is thankfully more than just a musical, and the care and intensity of its production, make it a must for lovers of the genre, and might I suspect also surprise those who have misgivings about this type of film. I would include myself in the latter category, and it certainly surprised me!

Bradstreet at Grounds

This weekend David Bradstreet is appearing at the Bitter Grounds Coffee House, Saturday and Sunday night, from 8.00 p.m. to 12.00 a.m., on the second floor of the Student's Union.

David, who is from Toronto, has played at the Bitter Grounds several times in the past few years, and was very well received. He appeared last summer at the Mariposa Folk Festival, and is also currently working on his first album.

abORTiON

by Paul Gompertz

The first grim forebodings came when I looked around and realised how empty the cinema was. Did those who had stayed away, I wondered, know something I did not yet know? My second premonition of disaster came about five minutes after the film had started, when I began gradually to acquire an insight into the nature of the prescience of an audience conspicuous by its absence. My initial astonishment turned to an admiration for the powers of prognostication, for, despite its obvious promise to the contrary, the film was a disaster.

Orton has become a sandy foundation upon which Galt and Simpson, as esteemed team of comic writers for both television and cinema, heaped up an untidy pastiche of out-dated visual humour and poor situational distortion. With the exception, perhaps, of the funeral cortege's wild dash through the cemetary, the opportunity for creative embellishment afforded by the adopted medium was thoughtlessly squandered.

In the course of its flaccid reconstruction, the mordant satire and highly concentrated wit of Orton's scripts were disseminated by the tepid interpolations and the multifarious other aberrations, perpetrated upon it. Consequently the spirit of Orton was more conclusively buried than the earthly remains of the quasi-central character of this necrophagous film.

To anyone who has been witness to British Police Brutality, Richard Attenborough's performance was more frightening than funny, while the antics of his minions, and of the other institutional characters, were so sterotyped as to have lost their comic impact years ago.

Hywell Bennet was barely adequate, having taken a downward plunge since 'The Virgin Soldiers' and 'Percy'. Milo Oshea and Lee Remick were disappointing, and it was left to that superb character actor, Dick Emery, in a cameo role, to infuse some of the myopic and perversely dialectic insantity that is the hallmark of Orton's work.

There were but two saving graces to be had from the film. Firstly, it only had a three day run) secondly it was supported by a pleasant little film called 'The Age of the Buffalo', which was by far the more interesting of the two.

Pace Orton.

The 1972-73 Bews athletic program got underway last week with the Golf competition at Glen Lawrence Golf and Country Club. Commerce '73 and Commerce '74 emerged as the team winners with a low score of 328. Mining was next with a 332, followed by Medicine with 339. Next came Law '75 and Commerce '76, tied with 346 each. They were followed by Mechanical with 348, Arts '75 with 354, Law '74 with 359, and Civil Engineering with 364 total. The top individual scores were turned in by Bill Shite of Arts '75 with a 75, Mike Clair of Commerce '76, 80, G. Thomson of Commerce '73 with a 78, D. Miller of Mining with a 77, S. Blake of Commerce '73 with a 77, B. Sedgewick of Commerce '74 with a 78, Ron White of Commerce '76 with a 80 and T. Bainridge of Mining with a 76. These eight players have qualified for the quarter finals to decide an individual champion. The first round must be completed by Tuesday, October 3. All play will be at the Cataraqui Golf and Country Club.

The first round tug-o-war events were held Tuesday night at the Outer Field. When the events were over, six teams had qualified for the finals last night, which were to be held along with the finals in the monsterball competition. Final results were unavailable at press time. The six finalists were Civil and Math, Commerce '73, Mining, Law '74, Commerce '75 and Mechanical.

Yesderday marked the final entry date for six sports: flag football, rugby, soccer, horseshoes, softball, and tennis. The schedule for all these sports begins Monday, October 2. Schedules will be posted on the Bews notice boards in the main locker room of the Physical Education Centre, and students are urged to consult these notices for time and place of events. There are several sheets which athletic sticks have posted in the locker room for players interested in playing team sports such as soccer and flag football. Interested students should sign up, or consult your faculty stick for more information.

Next Wednesday, the Bews Relays will be held at the West Campus track, beginning at 7:00 p.m. Entry sheets are posted in the locker room and the deadline for entries is 9:00 a.m. Wednesday morning.

Wednesday also marks the last day for entries in squash and track and field. The track and field competition will be held Monday, October 11, beginning at 7:00 p.m. at the West Campus. Squash will also begin on Monday, October 11.

Athletic sticks are still needed for Arts '76, Commerce '76, Science '76, Law '75, and a faculty stick for law. Those people selected should see Mr. Carnegie in the Physical Education Centre as soon as possible. For your convenience, a list of athletic sticks has been included in today's column. You are urged to make a note of your athletic stick.

With Bews getting well underway now, it is, perhaps, appropriate that we conduct some speculation on a possible winner of the team competitions. P.H.E. has won the competition the last three years; this year, however, they could be in for a shock. According to Mr. Carnegie, executive director of the Bews program, look for strong performances from Law '74, Commerce '76 and Science '76, and I'll add a warning of my own: keep your eye on Arts '75. It has been a long time since an Arts year captured Bews. This might be the year.

Rugby Gaels win again

by Kees Kort

The Rugby team maintained its unbeaten record of two years with an exhibition victory over Deep River last Sunday.

In somewhat dull conditions, Queen's forwards over whelmed their opponents with a superior display of basic skills. From the very beginning it was evident that the pack was domenant in the set scrum. Throughout the match the scrum consistently gained good possession, which was followed up by excellent rucking resulting in numerous forays deep into opposition territory.

The wet ball made it difficult for backs to work effectively yet despite these adverse conditions the line ran well and tackled solidly.

The game opened with some penetrating attacks, immediately placing Deep River on the defensive. This sustained pressure produced a drop goal by R. Estell from 25 yards out to give Queen's an early 3-0 lead.

It was again Estell who five minutes later passed inside to wing forward, Al Frizzell, who raced across the line for the first try giving Queen's the edge 7-0.

Although there were no further scores in the first half, several attempts came close. In particular a fine blind side rush by Dave Bowker was stalled five yards short of the goal line while centers Bill Steele and Steve Shelley displayed forceful running, adding to Deep River's problems.

Before the Gaels reasserted their dominance in the 2nd half, the Queen's Pack excelled in withstanding a concerted drive by the opposing side which was thwarted only five yards from the goalline. This promising feature of forward play was epitomized by the tackling ability of Bob Common and the rest of the pack

The ephemeral Deep River ascendency was ruefully shattered when a drive after a line out peel carried Queen's into striking distance. An infringement allowed Dave Walters to put over a penalty goal boosting the score to 10-0.

The rout was completed when Lee Doney took possession, after the ball had been worked near by Bob Common at the end of the line, and breeched defenses to drive over for a try making the final tally 14-0.

The Rugby Gaels play their first league game against York in Toronto on Saturday. On the basis of last Sunday's exhibition performance the future augurs well for the Rugby Club. The tenacity and spirit of their play forecasts another successful season.

From the sidelines

by Chris Boon

Here we are at week three of the intercollegiate season, and Queen's has a mixed bag of results. Football is on top of the OUAA-East with a 2-0 mark, and Sailing picked up the first league title over the weekend, but Soccer appears to be having some trougle putting the ball in the net (when they finally did, Ryerson managed to tie things up). The Rugby squad managed to survive an expedition to the wilds of Deep River and Rolf Lund looks like he could have a contender in Track and Field, although there could be a lack of depth in some events, especially field competitions. Tennis looks better than it has in years; there could be an OUAA title lurking there, too.

Women's competitions are getting under way, too. The turnout for Track has been kind of sparse, but those that are out are contenders; depth will be a problem. Field Hockey (both levels) open league play this weekend with expeditions to McMaster and Guelph, after some non-committal exhibition games in Montreal. Karen Carson and Laney Marshall appear to be ready to take up where they left off after basketball season.

The Rugby teams also invade Metro, to do battle with archrival York. The Yeomen may be the Gaels' biggest stumbling block to another OUAA title, so those who can't make it to Varsity should drop by the York pastures for a pleasant afternoon outing. And for those poor souls who can't make the trip, the Soccer Gaels will be displaying their talent at the west campus against Trent. Kick-off is 4:00 p.m., and some fans would be much appreciated.

Last, but not least, George Andrew's golf team will hit the links at Cataraqui Friday to take aim at the OUAA-East divisional title. Golf nuts, take note please.

Finally, a note to Cornelia Wagner (see 'Rah!, Rah! Rah!, P 10, Sept. 26 Journal: I agree fully that the destruction of the goal post at Lansdowne Park was both irresponsible and costly. However, the rivalry between Queen's and Varsity stretches back into the mists of the first days of the century, when "football" looked a lot more like Rugby than what we now cheer. There exists a tradition of goal-post- snatching between the two schools that at times has been just as hotly contested as the game on the field. In other words, Varsity stadium will be considerably less agahst at an attempt on their goal posts than was Lansdowne. Also, the T.O. posts are rather cheap wooden models... They cost about $50.00 To replace & a lot less than a coat of paint for the seats we scuff up with our oil Thighs.

Words from W.I.C.

On Tuesday, the Women's Intramural Committee held its athletic night to provide an opportunity for girls to become acquainted with W.I.C. The evening included broomball and murderball games, signing-up and refreshments.

Once again, the W.I.C. invites all women on campus to get involved. Participation is the primary objective of an intramural program – experience should not be considered a prerequisite for involvement.

If you wish to participate in any sport, contact your representative or sign up on the Intramural Board in the Women's Locker Room. If no list is posted for the sport in which you are interested, place your name, faculty, year and the sport you wish to enter in the green W.I.C. box in the Locker Room.

The faculty reps are: for Arts '73 - Maureen Fraser, Arts '74 - Anne Bennett, Arts '75 - Sue Bunting, Rehab. - Anne Besley and Ianna Swan, Law - Kathy Ford, Meds - Barb Thompson, Nursing - Gail Mooney, P.H.E. - Pat Jamieson and Barb McDermott, Commerce & Applied Science - Susan Fletcher. Athletic Sticks are needed for Arts '76, Education & Grads -- any volunteers?

The reps are responsible for getting in touch with those who have signed up and for publicizing their events.

W.I.C. calendars, outlining the activities for the year, are available in the Locker Room. These also explain the organization and award systems of the W.I.C. If you don't have one yet, why not pick one up? Also, watch the Journal for news of future events.

As a reminder, entries close for Basketball on Friday, Sept. 29, for Badminton on Monday, Oct. 2, and for Tennis on Tuesday, Oct. 3 at 5 p.m.

Watch for the W.I.C. symbol for further news and results, and remember - Intramurals are for fun . . . COME OUT AND SUPPORT YOUR FACULTY.

T.O. preview: what, where, when

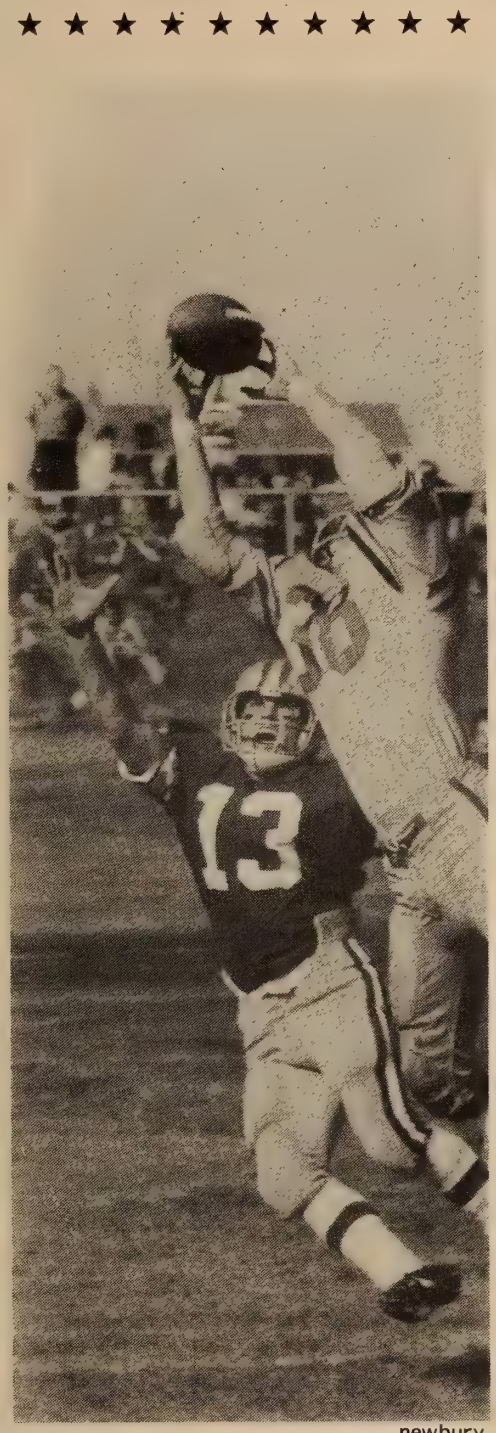
The football Gaels, together with the usual hordes of noisy fans, invade Varsity Stadium tomorrow to renew a long-standing rivalry. The Gaels will be sporting an undefeated record in league play, while the Blues are 1 -1, having edged Carleton 14-6 last weekend, after dropping their league opener to Ottawa 24-7. The Gaels can't afford to relax, though. Toronto still has All-Canadian Wayne Dunkley at quarterback, although the quality of his targets has declined with the graduation of John Chapman. Flanker Barry Wagdin can still make a big catch, but the end spots are weaker than last season. When Toronto runs the ball (not too often), Cor Doret and Libert Castillo do most of the heavy work. Doret can be an outside threat, so the Gaels' corner men had better be on their toes.

On defense, the Blues have All-Star John Dellandrea at defensive end, Hartley Stren and Bob Bloxham at linebacker, and Peter McNabb in the defensive secondary. After that, things get a little sparse. If the Gaels' offensive line feels up to it, Queen's could run the ball all day.

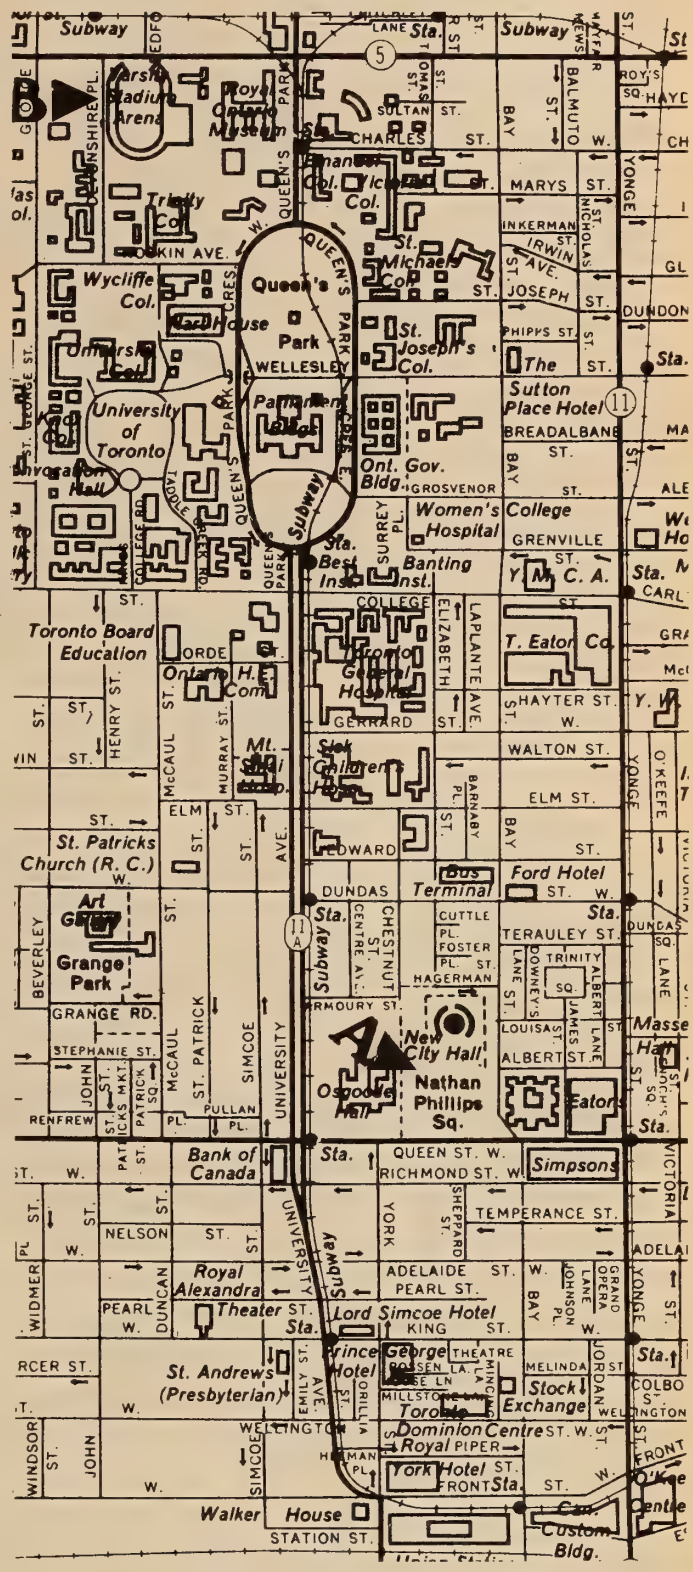


The Gaels' defense could look even better than last week, since Varsity's offensive line has been pretty porous to date. They have a rookie centre that could be in for a rude shock when Don Smith gets a chance at him, and at least one tackle is a newcomer. Look for a big pass rush from Devonshire, Biggs and company.

On offense, the Gaels have a problem. Notably, they have to decide which three of the league's five best running backs to start. Gord McLellan is ready to go after his enforced absence, and should add another demension to the Gaels with his gamebreaking speed. On the other hand, Warrender is a guaranteed hundred-yard man, Dave Hadden can get tough yards with the best of them, and Geoff Hamlin has to be the best blocking back this side of the 49th parallel. John Booth is just plain unlucky. He could probably start for the other teams in the league.

Gael QB Tom Taylor doesn't sport an impressive completion percentage, but he has thrown three TD passes, and most of his completions have been big plays. Tight end John Hotlingsworth could be due All-Star recognition, on the basis of his play to date, and flanker Stu Lang is a reliable clutch man as well as a real deep threat. If the offensive line plays up to its second-half abilities from last week, look for lots of points on the board.

If Dunkley can elude the rush long enough to throw, the Gaels' secondary, led by Alex Morris with two interceptions, could make things rough for the Blues. Joe Pal, Doug Cozac, Dave Campbell, and Darryl Penner don't hurt things much either.



So, if you can survive the trip down, the pep rally, and many interminable warm-up parties, come on out to Varsity Stadium, get a good bead on the goalposts, and watch the Gaels demolish the Blues for victory No. 3. It should be a good one.

Canada: Marxist professor is refused entry

TORONTO — An eminent Marxist scholar, hired by York University and on salary with them since July has been refused entry into Canada from England.

Dr. Istvan Meszaros, longtime professor at the University of Sussex in England was refused a visa by Canadian immigration authorities on the grounds that he was a 'security risk'. No more details were stated in the decision.

Meszaros was Minister of Culture in the 1956 provisional government in Hungary and fled to Italy when the Russian Stalinists took power. He has been a British subject since 1956.

York University Dean of Arts John Saywell stated that he will call the University of Sussex to "plead with them on Meszaro's behalf that they reappoint him". In the meantime York will attempt to see if he can enter as a visiting professor on the minister's permit.

The British National Council for Civil Liberties have telegrammed Prime Minister Trudeau demanding a reconsideration of the decision or substantiation of the security risk.

Meszaros is a Marxist thinker, literary critic, political scientist, and teacher of philosophy and ethics.

MONTREAL — The Confederation of National Trade Unions, Quebec's labour voice for over a decade has lost another key group of members, as the 28,000 member Quebec Provincial Civil Servants Union opted to leave.

The asbestos workers in the union have already voted to leave and are considering joining the break-away Centrale des Syndicate Democratiques.

The CNTU which flourished in the early years of Quebec's Quiet Revolution, has now lost 60,000 of its former membership role which has reached 225,000.

SASKATOON — Social Credit Leader Real Caouette has called for a national televised debate among the leaders of the four major political parties. Caouette stated that the debate would prove valuable as it would bring the major issues and the country's leaders to the attention of the voters.

The Liberal party has replied that they would want to know the format of the debate before making a decision.

TORONTO — Attorney General Dalton Bales offered Premier Davis his resignation after the conflict of interest disclosures ordered by the premier showed that he was part owner of a large tract of land at the sight of the proposed new international airport.

Davis turned down the resignation, but placed the holdings in trust and any profits coming from it are to go to charity.

KINGSTON — Welfare assistance spent in Kingston totalled $2,368,169 this year according to a City council financial report. The per capita cost of forty-one dollars is the highest of any other city of similar size in Ontario and second only to one other country.

TORONTO — New Democratic Party Leader David Lewis, appearing on CFRB television in Toronto, told viewers that he has "no qualms" about accepting campaign funds from international unions. All contributions, he claimed actually come from the Canadian membership. However, he did state that he favours more autonomy for the Cadadian locals, especially elimination of their direction by foreign parents.

OTTAWA — Energy Minister Donald Macdonald has announced that the sale of firecrackers to the general public is to be banned. Persons in future must be licensed to use display fireworks under the new condition. The section of the Canada Explosives act dealing with fireworks has been tightened up to prevent future injuries due to use of fire crackers.

The Department of Energy and Resources will be introducing training courses and examinations for those wishing to apply for a permit to have fireworks, Macdonald stated. The same statement also restricted the sale of sparklers and roman candles to persons eighteeen years of age or over.

OTTAWA — Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau on an election tour of Alberta, told a Medicine Hat audience that his government has no intention of legalizing marijuana and received rousing cheers and applause. Mr. Stanfield told a University of British Columbia audience that his government would also not legalize marijuana and received boos.

World: U.S. urges an end to world terrorism

UNITED NATIONS — A proposal supporting a crackdown on international terrorism has been submitted by the United States to the United Nations by Secretary of State William Rogers. The treaty calls for the extraditiom of alleged offenders to the country where their crime was committed or strong prosecution in the country holding them.

The proposal was submitted to the United Nations legal committee where it received fierce opposition from nine countries, mainly African, Arab and Communist. In arguing against giving the proposal priority, the Communist block claimed that the treaty was too difficult for immediate action. The Arab and African nations present claimed that certain acts carried out by liberation movements are justified.

President Nixon, in Washington, has set up a special cabinet committee to consider the question especially with regard to airplane highjackings.

OSLA — Norway, in a national referendum, elected not to join the European Common Market with 53.9 per cent of the nation's population voting against the proposal. Norwegian Prime Minister Trygve Bratelli had staked his political fortune on a favourable decision and read the referendum as a personal rebuff. He announced his resignation shortly after the results were tabulated.

LONDON — Prime Minister Heath has asked for a voluntary wage and price freeze for one year to beat Britain's chronic inflation. However, Heath has received strong opposition from several major sectors, notably the large unions.

In his proposal, Heath asked the leaders of the Trades Unions Congress, which represents ten million British workers, to keep wage increase demands down and to opt for only one wage increase during the year. However, there has been talk of a country-wide strike by major unions in the public sector if the Prime Minister implements his plan.

Heath also called on the Confederation of British Industries to limit price increases to five percent during the year. In return, Heath promised a five per cent growth in the British economy.

KAMPALA, UGANDA — Tanzania and Uganda appeared close to agreement on a five point peace plan drawn up by Somali President Mahamed Siad Barre which made a bid to end their two week old conflict.

The peace plan calls for a cessation of hostilities by the two powers, a supervised cease fire, a withdrawal of forces from the common border, expulsion of former Uganda president Milton Obote and his supporters from Tanzania, and finally both nations must agree to declare opposition to subversive activity by other sovereign states.

The major part of the 1,000 man rebel forces which invaded Uganda from Tanzania have now returned back across the Tanzanian border as the two countries cease hostilities.

The Tanzanian government has conceeded publicly that a force of Uganda exiles loyal to Dr. Obote who was ousted by Gen. Idi Amin last year, were responsible for the raid on their homeland from Tanzania.

The major issue in the peace plan has been the troop withdrawals which, in Tanzania's case, would mean leaving her entire north west border unguarded. The government is expected to make an announcement on that point at a later date.

Although Uganda president Idi Amin has given tentative approval to the plan, he has launched fresh accusations against Tanzania, who, he claims, is plotting with Zambia and India to launch a fresh assault on his country. The two African countries, he stated, were using Indian President Varahagiri Giri's current African tour to hatch the attempt which would include Tanzanian armed forces, Zambian aid and the Indian Army and Air Force. Indian destroyers are already headed for the major Tanzanian port of Dares Salaam, he claimed.

MANILA, PHILLIPPINES — The military rule instituted in the Philippines last Friday has proved very successful, according to President Ferdinand Marcos. The country's armed forces were ordered to take over the media and the law enforcement of the islands after Marcos claimed that subversive elements were plotting to overthrow the government.

In his edict, Marcos claimed that military rule was necessary to combat Communist violence backed by an unnamed power and threats to national stability caused by other means of lawlessness and disruption.

Fifty-three people, including three senators, two provincial governors, a number of journalists and many connected with the Communist front organizations have been detained.

AMS passes budget, endorses referendum

The AMS outer council passed its budget of $68,680 in record time last Thursday night.

Amid countless questions only one change was actually made. The budget of the External affairs Commission had not taken into account a $300 grant for Graduate conferences which was requested this past summer. More funds were reallocated from contingency to the commission.

Hildi Adelheim, Assistant Education Commissioner made a strong plea for more money for Festival '73 and in order to make that commission a more viable force.

However, Wally Palmer, vice-president of the AMS explained that the "money allocated is not reflective of how active the commission is. To balance the budget I had to cut in some places."

The AMS also gave official endorsement to the province-wide referendum on a fee strike. On October 11 students will be asked if they support the demands made by the OFS upon the Ontario Government. These demands include the recommendation that all tuition fee increases in post-secondary institutions for 1972-1973 be deferred until full consultation has been held with affected groups and, in particular that no increase be approved until full public discussions have been held on the Wright Commission Report. The OFS also intends to ask that all regulations governing the Ontario Student Awards Program be amended to facilitate greater access to the program; that the loan ceiling recently raised to $800 be lowered to a maximum absolute level of $600 and that the age of independence be reduced from 24 years.

Students will then be asked whether they would support withholding their fees in January if negotiations with the government are unsuccessful.

The referendum ballots also include a question on whether or not students would support a move to withhold all 1973-1974 tuition fees if the Ontario Government announces further tuition fee increases or further detrimental changes in the Ontario Student Awards Program.

Sue Drowley, Rehab representative, expressed concern over the failure of the referendum ballots to mention the abolition of the Rehab stipend which was announced in the provincial budget last March 28.

Palmer tried to assure her that "it's all part of the same thing. By voting for the referendum, you are saying you are against the way the government has been handling these things."

Leblanc hopes to close Heffalump

The AMS outer council will vote Wednesday night in the McLaughlin Room on whether or not Heffalump, the student run craft shop should be kept open.

Greg Leblanc, AMS president told the Journal that "the original idea was good. The store provided service for the community as an outlet for student handicrafts."

"We're in store for some theoretical arguments of this nature," Leblanc said. "But the commercial arguments are overwhelmingly against remaining open," he added.

The balance sheets will be presented to outer council on Wednesday.

"We would need to triple sales to break even now," Leblanc said.

Unlike many other modern musicians theirs is an intellectual attitude; a musician as opposed to an entertainer's approach. The group, Jon Mark in particular, maintains an aloof attitude toward their audience and toward musicians in other groups that creates an audience resistence immediately - any body who puts down Led Zepplin and the Allman Brothers (for volume) had damn well better be good. Fortunately they are good.

MALO

Growing up together in the San Fransico "Mission District" this group of ten dedicated musicians were first reunited in a group called "Malibus". Today they they are still together but have changed their name to Malo, their Latin Rock still very much alive. Their first single "Suavecito" was a hit all over North America this past summer. Their leader and lead guitarist is Jorge Sanatana, Carlo's brother and an accomplished musician in his own rite. Luis Gasca, 1st trumpet, flugehorn and vocalist is a graduate of the Berkley School of Music and the New England Conservatory. His past experience includes playing with Count Basse, Woody Herman and as leader of the late Janis Joplinn's Kosmic Blues Band. Victor Pantoja plays the congos and bongos and was a member of "Soul Sacrifice". A new album is on its way, so watch for the rise of this new and exciting group.

Coed residence is working well

by Sue de Stein

"This is a community, not a residence", remarked Morris Hall residents Steve Brereton and Santiago Collado.

The success of co-ed Morris can be shown by the development of a very strong community spirit among its residents in only three weeks. In most men's and women's residences at Queen's, such spirit can generally only be found after Christmas.

There have been many community efforts and floor projects begun in Morris, some involving the decoration of the much-used common rooms, the organization of a laundry service, and the provision for a Sunday brunch.

Dr. M. Griffin, Warden of Morris Hall, stated that the "enthusiasm among residents of Morris Hall has been terrific."

"The spirit and cheerleading abilities of Morris Hall residents was in evidence at an inter-residence football game last week when upper Leonard defeated Morris Hall. There was no lack of spectator support; the turn-out from Morris was astounding", according to J. Johnson, a don.

Many Morris Hall residents have observed that the ideas and opinions that non-Morris residents have about life in co-ed residence are generally misconceptions.

In the opinion of Rick Janes, life in co-ed is "calmer, easier, and more civilized than life in a men's residence." The atmosphere in Morris is relaxed and friendly. Doors are left open and unlocked. A willingness to share and cooperate, and a respect for other residents are found in Morris Hall. The style of living in Morris seems to be remarkably different from that in other Queen's residences.

A great deal of the success of co-ed Morris can be attributed to the original planning of alternating the rooms between the men and women. The West Campus co-ed residences are planned in blocks of men and women and have not experienced as yet, a true community spirit. The planning of Morris allows for more personal contact among men and women residents.

Two thirds of Morris Hall residents are first year students, the other third, upperclassmen. First year men and women have played a much larger role in creating community spirit in Morris and in its organization than was expected. On Monday all Morris Hall residents, regardless of year, were able to run for positions on the House Council which is the governing body of Morris. This council is separate from both the IRC and the WRC.

Steve Breteton remarks that in Morris there is "no stigma attached to dating". The social life in Morris is very relaxed . . . Here the "opposite sex is treated as a human being."

Brereton is not alone in his wish to see the co-ed residence project expanded. He views Morris Hall as "an excellent change from the traditional residences."

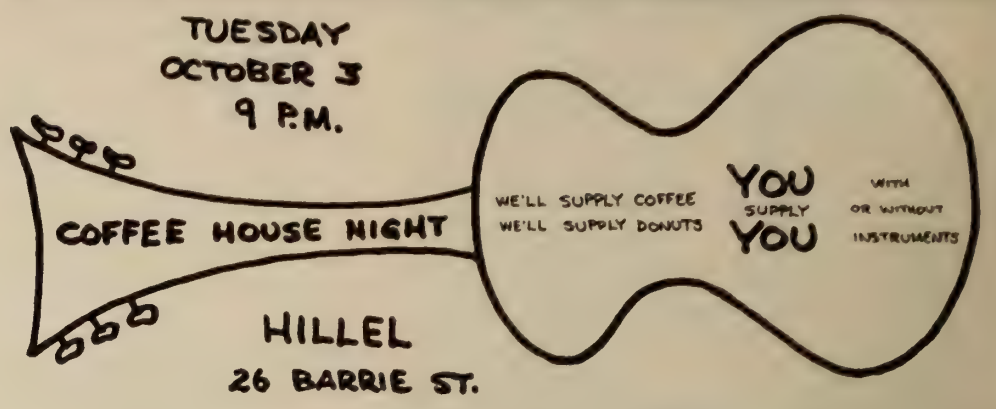
Association for staff

A committee representing the employees at Queen's University is proceeding with plans for a Staff Association. The Association was formed after an offer to join the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) was strongly opposed. At a meeting on September 21 with a 110 persons present, it was decided to form a non-certified association which would not come under the auspices of the Ontario Labour Relations Board. The decision against certification was due to the ineligible status of at least half of the staff comprised of confidential secretaries and department and administrative assistants.



A memo to non-academic staff at Queen's stated that the purpose of the association is two fold: first to bring about a closer relationship amongst employees and secondly to act in a bargaining capacity for employees in matters of general interest. Mrs. Agnes Henderson employed in the Department of Metallurgical Engineering said that although Queen's staff have excellent working conditions they have a number of problems which include the cost of parking and the posting of position policies. She felt issues of this nature could be brought before the administration more effectively by a committee set up by a Staff Association.

When asked if this Association would be recognized as a legal body by the administration, Miss Janice James of the Career Planning and Placement Office stressed that "we expect in a short period of time to have a large enough membership to enable the committee to approach the administration of the University with confidence of their recognizing a Queen's Staff Association as a viable association representing the employees of Queen's."

The Staff Association presently has drawn up a constitution and has membership cards available for all those interested, and eligible to join.

Picnic in pub

Dear Editor

Myself, among others, would like to know just what the fuck is going on here anyways. Jesus, Jesus! A picnic area in the House of Commons! Bloody scandalous! And bloody uncomfortable as well - one is forced to sit bolt upright, miserable, for hours on end!

There are, however, other ramifications of far greater consequence. Here we had the one and only drinking place of any class on campus, and-zap!- overnight a barrage of horizontal and vertical lines which shatter the psychic unity, leaving one feeling regulated, disoriented, and generally sick. The atmosphere of togetherness fostered by the round tables is smashed, to be replaced by one of fragmentation and uncommunicativeness.

In addition, there is another argument to be raised-one, I may add, of great relevance and urgency. The installation of these devices is yet another blatant example of creeping Capitalism, which is ever encroaching upon student rights and sensibilities. One day, the floodgates will burst, and we will be drowned in a rampaging torrent of economic scientism and mathematicism. I believe that we must, each and every one of us, fight this criminality now, before it is too late!.

Sincerely,
Joseph Avant-Garde

Twinkletoes

Dear Editor,

I attended the Queen's-Ottawa U football game on Sept. 23 and enjoyed seeing Queen's defeat Ottawa.

I also enjoyed the half-time shows put on by the Queen's Golden Gaels Marching Band and the Queen's Pipe Band. But one thing I didn't enjoy and which annoyed me was the half-time display staged by the flock of photographers on the field at the same time as the bands. At one point I counted ten (almost a football team) darting and dodging among the band members trying to get "that all important shot." Besides annoying the fans, who watched the half-time show, I'm sure photo nuts bothered the band members as well.

Sure the Queen's Bands make great subject matter. Sure it's nice to have a photographic record of their performances. But is it necessary to have ten twinkletoeing cameramen, twinkletoeing and cameramaning during the Bands performances.

Your truly,
Doug Van Dine

To: The Commerce Orientation Committee, all bosses, all senior students and anyone else involved in the orientation program.

I would like to take this opportunity to thank everybody concerned with the Commerce Orientation program for their invaluable help during orientation week. I'm sure you will all agree with me when I say that there were trying times and great times associated with the setting up of the week. But I'm sure, or at least hope, that the week itself was a rewarding experience for all of you.

Again, may I express my sincere appreciation to those people involved in the orientation committees of the other faculties (if not for them, our objectives would not have been met) Wishing you all the best at Queen's this year.

Sincerely Yours,
Rich Chown

Returnable soft drink bottles urged

by Nelson Coyle

Everett Biggs, Deputy Minister of the Ontario Department of the Environment urged a meeting of soft drink companies in Toronto on September 25 to discuss conversion to standarized returnable soft drink containers. He went on to emphasize that this conversion could be done smoothly if begun now, but that legislation was forthcoming to back up this preliminary warning.

Meanwhile, Pollution Probe Toronto has called upon Dominion Stores Ltd. to take the initiative of coordinating the five large supermarket chains in Ontario towards a rapid switch to the new standarized glass container. Tony Barrett, a coordinator of Probe Toronto stated that the marketing arguments used by Coca-Cola and Pepsi in terms of their distinctive bottle design could not be defended on the grounds of their present competition in the canned soft drink market. In addition, the breweries compete satisfactorily while using a standarized bottle design.

Mr. Barrett also stressed the role which Pollution Probe was able to play in stopping development of the non-returnable milk-jug, which was being market tested in the Kingston area. Kingston Probe coordinated with Probe in other test areas to vigorously protest the selling of the throwaway containers.

Students escape injury in crash

Thirty five members of the girls field hockey team from Queen's escaped serious injury but the driver of their charter bus was sent to hospital when it collided with a panel truck near Toronto on Friday.

The accident occurred on Highway 401 at the Victoria Park overpass in Toronto when a truck crashed into the west bound bus in its attempts to avoid a tractor trailer which had jacknifed ahead of it.

Driver Ralph Thompson of Trenton "did a fantastic job of keeping the bus upright," police said. He was taken to hospital with a fractured leg and internal injuries.

A spokesman for the company said that Thompson "saw the truck swerving in front of him and he tried to cut to the left side on the three lane highway, but the truck came right across and into him."

The bus, which was owned by Wagar Coach lines of Napanee was severely damaged.

The field hockey team was on route to McMaster University in Hamilton. They were removed through windows in the bus because the overturned truck was leaning against the crumpled doors. 26 girls were taken to hospital for x-rays. All but three were released.

Freshman guide supplements calendar

The Arts and Science orientation committee produced a freshman studies guide this year at a cost of $2,250. It was funded by the Faculty of Arts and Science.

The guide was designed as a supplement to the regular calendar. It provided additional information such as workload, marking schemes and booklists not normally available in the calendar.

A common criticism of the first year guide has been that it duplicates a great deal of material found in other sources such as the calendar and the Queen's handbook.

However, it is apparent that the guide was the publication most used by freshmen because of its clarity, its additional information and the fact that for most freshmen it included only these courses for which they were qualified in first year.

New university if merger accepted

CUP — Loyola college and Sir George Williams College are negotiating a possible merger that would form a new university for Quebec.

Loyola Vice-President Joe Burke presented a proposal last summer that would create a university containing faculties of Arts, Science, Commerce and Administration, from the two colleges.

Last summer's proposal was rejected by Sir George Williams but the negotiating committee which was set up has introduced a new document. This proposal would have Sir George Williams specializing in Arts and Science, two university wide faculties of commerce and business administration, and of Engineering, and Loyola would maintain a division of Arts and Science. This proposal has been ratified by the Sir George Williams Board of Governors.

However, the proposal, which would eliminate the honours science program from the Loyola division, has met with a great deal of opposition from the Loyola faculty of science. They consider their honour students their "best" students and see it as a loss in importance for the faculty.

Loyola administration spokesmen say the general trend in science is toward interdisciplinarian studies along liberal arts lines, while the need for specialization is declining. They claim that the Loyola science faculty appears obsessed with specialization.

"Both aspects of man's environment the natural and the man-made, are essential to his well-being and to the enjoyment of basic human rights - even to the right to life itself" (Declaration of the United Nations Conference)

International Conference on the Human Environment

The objectives of the International Conference on the Human Environment held in June, 1972 in Stockholm were to "stimulate international awareness and understanding of global, international and common national environmental problems and, based on this understanding, to evolve agreements in substance or in principle to deal with these problems." (Except where noted all quotes in this article are from Conference on the Human Environment published by Environment Canada, Ottawa, 1972) Canada played an important role as co-sponsor of the convention and as a mediator between conflicting power blocks during the proceedings. Maurice Strong, former head of Canada's foreign aid program was also the secretary-general of the Conference.

After the Conference was over the Hon. Jack Davies, minister of the environment stated that "The success of the United Nations environment conference was beyond my wildest dreams." Environment Scene, August, 1972)

Canada has good reason to be pleased over the outcome of this conference and can be proud of her strong participation. A Declaration on the Human Environment "containing principles that will guide international law makers in the years ahead" was proclaimed. Also approved were "109 recommendations constituting an Action Plan for tackling the planet's environmental ills, protecting man and his habitat and thus enhancing human well-being". As well the delegates passed "a resolution outlining new United Nations machinery, and recommending an environmental fund to encourage international initiatives."

One delegation pressed to have included a principle which would provide for the compulsory release of information regarding activities or developments of an environmental nature occurring within a country, thus avoiding "the risk of significant adverse affects on the environment in areas beyond their national jurisdiction." Considerations of national sovereignity on the part of several nations prevented its adoption.

Canada did not take a firm stand in the field of conservation, particularly in the preservation of endangered species. Their position that nations should "recognize the need to harvest renewable resources" is too strong for many conservationalists. The report goes on to state that "Rational management of all renewable resources should be firmly based on achieving optimum sustained yield." A categorical statement of what constitutes an optimum sustained yield is impossible to make. Yet this stand on the part of the Canadian government inflexibly demands this.

For example, Dr. Martin Edwards, well-known local conservationalist is worried about Canadian regulations on whale fishing. Although prohibiting the fishing of certain breeds of whales, they specify quotas for the catch in terms of units of weight, not numbers. This allows a larger number of small whales to be taken.

What will ensure that countries take the Declaration on the Human Environment seriously? There are obviously problems insofar as the USSR and several other countries were not represented due to the exclusion of East Germany. Other difficulties arose because of the ambiguous position taken by the United States represented by a comparatively low level delegation. The U.S. delegates had previously been instructed by the State Department on voting procedure but proceeded to rebel against these ground rules. In addition, the American delegation encountered a good deal of comment over the environmental damage caused by the war in Viet Nam.

There was an underlying current of dissatisfaction amongst "underdeveloped" nations who often considered that their overwhelming environmental problem was poverty and population. These countries thought that the social cost of implimenting comprehensive pollution controls and environmental policies might be prohibitive in terms of pricing themselves out of the world market.

Recommendations were approved by the conference which would prevent environmental concerns from hampering development and trade amongst nations by erecting in effect trade barriers or tariffs. This would be backed up by aid programs to countries experiencing economic difficulty with instating environmental standards.

The conference recommended that stations maintaining atmospheric levels be set up and subsequently the United States sent up a rocket for this purpose and several countries including Canada pledged to provide those maintaining stations. Work is still continuing on a recommendation to the U.N. concerning marine pollution. In addition, an Environmental Secretariat was set up and Canada and the Ford Foundation jointly provided the funds for the Conference Secretariat to continue the preparation of the conference recommendations for the U.N.

In the future, the success of the Stockholm Conference recommendations will largely depend upon individual nations and upon the General Assembly of the United Nations. Nevertheless, it does provide an important basis for establishing a better environment within any country and for the world.

"What many skeptics thought would only be a rhetorical statement has become a highly significant document reflecting a community of interests among nations regardless of politics, ideologies or economic status." (Environment Scene August, 1972.)

Pollution is a cost of production

by Jelte Kuipers

The pall of despair that hangs over the issue of pollution and environmental depreciation which today threatens mankind with immanent extinction is only too characteristic of our age.

We live in the age of exhaustion. Having exhausted the moral resources of the Western tradition, men are now faced with exhaustion of the physical resources upon which depends the biological survival of the human species.

This process, whereof we can envisage the terminus, has its roots deep in the Western tradition. The inspiration that gave man dominon over Nature enabled him, once that inspiration was secularized, to effect the conquest of Nature.

All post industrial civilization is predicated on at least these two ideas: first, that Nature is alien, hostile and must, therefore be annihilated and, secondly, that what is left over, once Nature has been annihilated, is loot waiting to be sucked up by the first comer.

Our cities either turn inward upon themselves, showing only their backsides to the natural environment, or they sprawl out and obliterate that environment. For modern man is, first of all, urban man, who concentrates vast amounts of energy within a small synthetic environment. The city is, after all, a huge concentration of energy, a critical mass which draws towards its vortex the human and physical resources of the total environment.

The reciprocal of this process of concentration is the extension of energy, transmogrified, into the total environment in order to effect its synthesization. We have reached a limit in that "progress", a "progress" which can continue only so long as there remains an adequate variety of apparently limitless resources, that is to say, unbounded frontiers. Today all resources are limited and their exhaustion is forseeable.

No matter how much oil might remain to be discovered, we know that at present accelerating rates of consumption all available supplies will be exhausted within a century.

All the major iron deposits of the last century have been exhausted this century. The discoveries of this century may last a hundred years.

The same goes for all other metals. And for coal. And for hydroelectric power resources. Each so-called development exhausts the potential for future development to some degree.

The same goes for land. The amount of available arable land is rapidly diminishing as rising populations encroach upon it in order to provide themselves with dwelling space. Meanwhile the "renewable" resources which provide the materials for constructing shelter are being used up faster than any "renewal" that is taking place.

The use of water resources is rapidly outstripping the replenishment of those resources. Even the atmosphere is threatened. North America is running at a severe oxygen deficit that is bound to increase as the use of combustibles increases in industry and in so-called "private" dwellings and means of transportation.

Wherever there is rapid growth, says Nietzsche, there is also great-decadence. We have just begun to pass through the period of the most rapid and vertiginous growth in the history of the species; the decadence which is concomitant with that growth has hardly begun the inexorable process of rectifying global biosphere.

The evidence for that decadence is all around us. It is in the pall of smoke and noxious fumes that covers every major city. It is in the spoliated forests, strip mines, quarries, eroded watersheds, depleted oil well and ravaged rivers and lakes.

It is in the decimation of wildlife populations through chemical interference in various food chains — through pesticides, chemical wastes, garbage and fertilizers.

Yet all our conditioning tells us that the future extends indefinitely from the present, that mistakes made today may be corrected tomorrow, that present losses may be recuperated in the near or distant future.

This works so long as resources are limitless, so long as production can continue to accelerate at exponential rates.

But in terms of the very finite resources now available to mankind such economics can only be considered as the most specious kind of metaphor.

No matter what we use in the environment, there is always some waste. This is especially the case with combustibles, but it is also true of metals, forest products and land itself.

Our situation today is thus: we can no longer borrow against the future without measurably depriving our descendants of a livelihood. Every acre of land that we excavate for construction takes food out of the mouths of our grandchildren.

Every gallon of water that we vilify with industria and agricultura especially chemic renders the envir hospitable for our was undertaken two years ago by mailing the cans to John Robarts.

2) THE RIDEAU TRAIL ASSOCIATION was formed some two years ago to construct a trail between Kingston and Ottawa for hikes and to provide access to fauna in the area. Interest grew rapidly and through an Opportunities for Youth grant, the trail was constructed. People are needed to help maintain the trails, to coordinate the public and private property which existing and new trails cross and to help lay out the new trails. The Association plans to organize hikes and cross-country skiing through the school year. For further information contact Dr. Cooke (tel. 547-6601) or Doug Donald (tel. 544-0657)

3) POLLUTION PROBE has existed at Queen's for some two and one half years. Some of the issues tackled in the past have been excess smoke at Collins Bay Penitentiary, the installation of a garbage pulverizing plant in Kingston, the cancellation of Evening Bus Service, and recently the problem of contaminated wells in Harrowsmith. Its voice can carry a lot of weight given hardwork and effective lobbying against specific environmental problems. This year, its coordinator Rob Hutchison (tel. 542-8811) has some goals which would be very valuable in the Kingston area if enough students are willing to help carry them out.

There has been excellent communication between local Boards of Education and Pollution Probe with the result that Probe would like to put a "pollution program" into every public school. Teaching kits would be provided and group discussions for children grades 6 to 8 twice a year, lead by Probe volunteers would be held. To adequately cover the area Probe requires approximately 35 people to give sufficient time to prepare and present two 2 hour sessions a year, incorporating a film and discussion. This could be used for credit work toward McArthur College of Education.

In addition, Rob Hutchison would like to have three teams of two people working in the Kingston area spotting excessive exhaust emission in motor vehicles, until such time as the number of such vehicles is brought down to a more reasonable level than at present. Brad Sloan (tel. 544-1764) is willing to help through Legal Aid in the prosecution of obvious cases of excessive emission.

Pollution Probe has an office in the basement of the Student Union (tel. 546-7311) and the nature of the organization is such that if you have a project or problem you would like to act upon, Probe will form the framework for it and hopefully provide a source of similarly interested people.

Other projects which are planned are a Tercentenary Litter Campaign "clean up for the holiday". The group hope to become an integral part of the Kingston community through the Social Planning Council.

4) ZERO POPULATION GROWTH has a chapter in Kingston; the president is Dr. G. P. Morris (tel. 547-6216). Throughout the year, they hold a number of lectures on the problem of people pollution as well as participating in lobbying to keep the number of politicians using such slogans as "Keep Going, Keep Growing" to a minimum. Their emphasis is not upon overpopulation in "third-world" countries but rather upon the concept of world overpopulation and problems of per-capita consumption and per-capita output of pollution.

This fall, an excellent Dunning Trust Lecture Series is being held on October 22, 23 and 24 with the speakers being in residence for the week. Prominent environmentalist Garrett Hardin will lecture on "In Search of New Ethics for Survival". Roy Moriyama will trace his conversion from developer to conservationist in a discussion on how to develop mid Canada (the area between our populated region and the Arctic). Ian McHarg, a landscape architect will deliver a lecture on "Design With Nature".

al things as property, then those rights must necessarily be maintained continuously for future generations.

Such a view entails a radical change in outlook over all aspects of human existence: the personal as well as the social; the supra-national as well as the national.

For example, we can no longer afford to look at a steel company as only producing steel. It also produces materials we have so far considered as mere wastes or negligible by-products: smoke, acids, iron oxides, particulate matter. These are also real products, and the value of ostensibly worthwhile production must be offset against the value of these other products.

The fossil-fueled thermal electric power station produces sulphur dioxide as well as electricity. The first is just as real a product as the second, only it is a product which is distributed among the population through abnormal channels.

Local Issues

There is a tendency amongst residents of Kingston to discuss environmental concerns as relevant only to those living in cities such as Los Angeles, New York or Toronto. On the contrary, there are issues both of a positive and negative nature which demand attention in this area.

The Kingston area is generally blessed with clean air and clean water (with the notable exception of the Belle Isle area which every Kingstonian has a share in polluting by means of the sewage treatment plant). Dupont's 'popcorn smell' is now a memory yet, Belleville's Lake Ontario Cement stack still mars the skyline. To combat crushing pollution problems, there is the possibility of a recycling plant in the Kingston area utilizing garbage and sewage to form saleable compost.

One of the biggest environmental problems in the Kingston area has always been the disposal of industrial and residential wastes. The shallow layer of soil over bedrock, plus another limestone bedrock which channels sewage into the water table makes the use of septic tanks a difficult proposition. Local villages, such as Barriefield, Sydenham and Harrowsmith have discovered how important it is for septic tanks and beds to be properly installed and maintained. In the case of Barriefield, there should not be any septic tanks and tile beds used in certain areas of the village. Holding tanks could be utilized instead.

An example of the problems of waste disposal that can be encountered was brought to the attention of Pollution Probe in Kingston this summer. In July of this year several residents on the outskirts of Harrowsmith telephoned Pollution Probe for assistance with a problem. High coliform bacteria levels in the wells of several homes had made the water undrinkable by Ontario's potable water standards. Testing has been carried out by the Ontario Water Resources Commission (OWRC) but nothing had been done to alleviate the situation. The complainants felt that the spraying of whey for dispsal purposes by a local cheese factory possibly was an important contributing factor in the appearance of such high bacterial levels.

A history of bad water in the area cast some doubt upon the situation. Nevertheless, they felt that government action had been insufficient. Pollution Probe took several samples of the five wells which were causing trouble plus a control sample from a well in the centre of the village. Chemical analysis revealed that there was evidence of protein breakdown occurring. Subsequently, a protein test and a lactose test were done and a positive test for lactose was obtained.

Pollution Probe has offered to do any further testing needed and to provide Legal Aid for the complainants should they wish to pursue the matter in court.

Government departments and agencies (in this case the Ontario Department of Health and the OWRC) generally welcome this sort of responsible action initiated by a community group on behalf of an individual. On the other hand, a complaint which is not receiving what a person considers to be sufficent response, in a given case can often obtain more comprehensive and faster action if a group such as Pollution Probe is in involved.

"Individuals can have an important role in easing the burden of pollution, waste, overpopulation, and resource depletion in the future. If the world and its populations of living creatures (including man) are to survive under habitable conditions, people are going to have to consider habits that are compatible with the earth's capabilities to sustain natural life." (publicity article Pollution Probe, Kingston.)

Some anti-pollution hints for students:

1. Avoid excess packaging, disposable items, non-returnable containers.

2. Kingston Iron and Metal Co. will take any accumulated newspapers, magazines etc. (and maybe even pay a bit for them)

3. Non-phosphate detergents of comparable cost and quality are available. Wisk has been on the market for years; Sunlight is similarly available.

4. Use that free bus in October. The Montreal Street bus goes straight to the train station, while Portsmouth, Kingscourt buses go towards the Manor.

The Salsburg Connection

Predictable but entertaining

by Carol Wood

The impression for the first half of the film is one of confusion. As one spy says to another, "The place is crawling with agents" and we have to agree. It becomes an intriguing puzzle to work out who is working for whom, against whom, and to gain what.

Obviously the archetypes are immediately apparent. The hero, C.I.A. agent on vacation, slight, sad-eyed, curly haired Bill (Barry Newman) who despite his droopingly romantic appearance can obviously be depended upon for the feats of impossible strength and skill without which no spy film would be worth the name, is quickly brought into contact with the dark heroine, Anna, and the blonde villainess, Elizabeth, though it seems to take him a little longer to distinguish the difference.

The heroine, widow of the first corpse (bumped off before the preliminary credits) is the pale and interesting victim of a failed marriage ("so much emptiness, I was afraid it was me") and has little to do but open her eyes appealingly and freeze in perpetual paralyses of fear. (Anna Karina - she does it very well though.)

The villainess, who turns out to a K.G.B. agent, acts out very well, a brilliant alternation between a dazzling mechanical charm, an extremely vicious ruthlessness and its counterpart. (Despite her supercool she is not a very successful spy.) I felt sorry when she met her just deserts from the padlock which went off too soon.

As the resident source of glamour she drips with sex that is so obviously turned on for political reasons that it gives the impression of being disinterested to the point of chastity. The other sex source in the film, the heroine's brother's night with his girlfriend, is also very tactfully shown, zipping immedately from the happy smile on her face peeping from between the sheets as she registers his arrival on the edge of her bed to his (fully-clad) bound out of the house in the early morning and irrepressible chuckles as he frolics across grassy slopes and mountain streams towards his trusty landrover.

This refreshing conservatism applies equally to the scenes of violence. The heroine's brother's sufferings under torture are for once not made appallingly and palpably real to us, but become a vehicle for his stock heroic endurance, as he gasps through the phone to Anna (as he thinks, in fact Elizabeth in aural disguise) that the pain "is not boo bad". We can believe him but this lack of realism makes for a fairytale quality that is, after all, the charm of the genre.

Occasionally one might feel that the film is restrained to the point of being uninspired. The gimmicks are appropriate but unoriginal, e.g. the radio which doubles as a music transmitter to deceive the waitress and a conversation receiver to record the conversation of the two agents at the nearby table. The centre of the plot, on which all action hinges, a fascinating crate dredged from the sea in the very beginning by the heroine's husband before him immediate denouement, the goal of so much effort, the mysterious prize which all political powers desire, either for possession or destruction, is revealed towards the end to contain lists of Nazi informers buried just after the war. As one agent complains, " a box of soggy records, 25 years out of date." Its personal and political implications are underlined., but one is still disappointed at its predictable nature.

Despite this lack of central originality, the detail of the film is superficially eye-catching, the pace is fast, the suspense of the automobile pursuit, exciting, and in fact, the whole is at least entertaining.

Krishna Yoga Festival, Bewildering Bacchic Intoxication

Written and Illustrated by Carol Wood

Anyone passing the Students Union on the afternoon of Thursday, 28th September is likely to have been stopped by a frail, shaven headed devotee in floating garments and offered a bite to eat of the spiritual food invitingly spread on a tray before him. Could this be a new theory, that the way to a students soul is through his stomach? No, in fact, it is a dogma of the Hari Krishna sect, that their food, once having been offered to God, becomes transcendental and capable of transforming the body of the consumer, facilitating the process by which flesh becomes spirt and man casts off the shackles of his earthly body.

"Everything must be done in honour of Krishna," one devotee told me seriously, "so first the food is offered to God. We only eat the remnants."

God seemed to have left plenty for everybody, at least in the rooms devoted to the Yoga Festival.

Paradoxically for a religion peculiarly concerned with escaping the body, placing a much lower value upon the flesh than, for instance, the average version of Christianity, their media of conversion seemed to me to be unusually and sensuously appealing. A thick sweet perfume filled the air, spread through the corridor and even assailed one coming up the stairs. I have already mentioned the selection of delicacies designed to tempt the palate. The walls were decorated with heavily adorned semi-naked bodies and oriental scenes in richly compelling colour. These pictures reappeared in the slides shown, revealing a phantasmagoria of scenes following each other in rapid succession, flashing colours and fantastic content: a white crowned eagle bore a limp god over dark waters where a drowning man held up his arms for help in vain; a three-headed god astride the trunk of a white elephant swayed in precarious ectasy over the heads of the multitude; three strange puppets plastered in decoration received an especial burst of applause from the devotees watching, I could not see why. The visual glamour was compulsive, aided by chanting and music which accompanied the film.

Music, of course, is the especially consecrated medium of communication. "Sound vibration," one devotee assured us, "is beyond the material world, though we seem to hear it with material ears." They almost apologised for the use of electronic devices, such as a bass guitar, explaining that, "as everything originally emanated from Krishna, everything can rightly be used for the purpose of linking up with him again. Bondage is only caused by using them for our own personal satisfaction".

The difficulty for me came in distinguishing Krishna's satisfaction from the inevitable pleasure caused by these things, in themselves used for whatever purpose. The music began gently, rhythmically soothing and relaxing, then increased in tempo, becoming aroused, energetic, exciting and finally reminiscent of a state of "Bacchic intoxication", the chanting, swaying and stamping of the devotees accompanying it, in kind.

My impressions of the individual devotees during this time varied enormously. One man nodded his head to the music with a rather annoying complacent smile as if to say "Yes, this is how it is." A girl swayed from side, with a blank expression of rapture perilously close to inanity. Such blissful vacancy was frightening. In contrast, one of the musicians did have a startlingly bright, happy smile that seemed to express real good will and a joy that came of knowing rather than ignoring. A baby devotee lay in its cradle waving its tiny hands to the music with every sign of enjoyment. The student audience inside the room, in contrast, generally sat crosslegged or otherwise on the cushions provided, giving the impression of complete immunity to the whole scene. The muscular effort of total abstention from movement in the face of such a rhythmical assault was admirable, and I hope without serious effects. Still, the supercool die-hards, aided probably by the presence of the student audience outside the room, who were sufficiently curious to press their faces to the glass doors and stare in obvious fascination without being moved to actually enter.

Little details of the scene were distracting. For instance, one man knelt with his camera and was immediately photographed in action by a rival across the room. While most devotees wore their feet naked or clad only in socks, beneath their floating robes, my eyes were irresistibly drawn to one in pink, who had chosen, for some reason, to wear bright red football boots.

The general atmosphere among the devotees was one of people enjoying themselves; among the audience, of people not enjoying themselves, for various reasons, inhibition, confusion, serious preoccupation, (congenital gloom?).

The devotees were appealing in their obvious happiness, gentleness, and lack of aggressive Evangelicism one has come to expect from Minority Religious groups, but I failed to see the specifically religious nature of the gathering. One devotee I talked to afterwards assured me that certain seemingly physical experiences, such as eating their "transcental" food and listening to sound vibrations like the chant "Hari Krishna", are in fact spiritual experiences providing a way to realize and relate to God. I left in non-comprehension, but with still some doubt as to whether there might not have been something to comprehend.

Two Free Concerts In Dunning Hall Auditorium Last Week

Vaghy film and concert

by Geoffrey MacGibbon

A concert was given last Wednesday evening, September 27th, by the Vaghy String Quartet. The program consisted of Prokofiev's String Quartet No. 1, Op. 50, preceded by a film about the Vaghy String Quartet, which no doubt helped in attracting the large audience.

"Vaghy", made by Peter Harcourt, for the Ontario Council for the Arts, presented an interesting picture of the Quartet and their varied activities on the local music scene. It conveyed a good impression of the seriousness with which they take their art, as shown by Robert Dodson's remark that he preferred formal concerts because of the greater freedom they give to present a work of art from beginning to end, uninterrupted and undistracted. I was also struck by the quartet's keen interest in educating people about music, not merely through formal instruction in the music department, but also in their work with the Kingston Symphony Orchestra, their concerts in the local schools, and of course, their concerts and anti-concerts at Queen's. Unfortunately, the film's sound quality was poor, since it had been made on a shoestring budget.

The String Quartet No. 1, composed by Prokofiev in 1931, has been described as his masterpiece. Although more accessible than many 20th century composers, since he never abandoned major-minor tonality, I had always considered Prokofiev rather arid, judging from works such as the "Classical Symphony". However his String Quartet is in a much more personal, reflective vein, and builds up to a deeply contemplative final movement, which is marked Andante. Although it was demanding for the listener, I think there is an advantage in being introduced to such music at a performance rather than from a recording.

As well as the sense of occasion and freedom from distraction created by the setting, there is a feeling of communion with the performers as one listens and watches them attempting to express the thoughts of the composer. Anyway, the work was performed with the deepest conviction by the Vaghy String Quarter and I found it a rewarding experience.

South Indian Concert Melodic Success

Last Friday night, a good-sized crowd came out in the rain, to hear Muthulakshmi Ranganathan perform on the vina, a South Indian classical instrument, which closely resembles the guitar. Heard with her were P.H. Amarnath on the mrudangam and Nancy McKay playing the tambura. They performed wearing the traditionalclothingof the East. For a newcomer to the field of Eastern music, it was difficult to separate the stance and honest presence of the performers from the entire aestheticism of the evening. Everything was dazzling, pure and clean, with sparkle in the eyes.

The instruments themselves stood formidable in their electrifying statelines and pride; one would almost think them to have characters of their own, so unique and exquisite they were, the children of craft. Not that the music took one away from the rough synthetic chairs, or the bleak symmetry of the white stucco walls, or the cardboard squareness of Dunning Hall. Oh, no. . you could never say that the music was exotic or that it dove deep into the waters of the mind, stirring its own currents, flowing inside each other, dragging by the stagnant matter of memory. After all, it was a concert and well-attended at that, with much spontaneous applause, that in spite of its occassional ill-timed presence, brought forth warm exchanges between audience and artists.

If the concert seemed to whisk away its hour and a half in ten minutes, and kept us enthralled, waivering between the peaceful colours of sweet sleep and the bright intricacy of form, that's not much to say when I missed most of it, lost in the swirls of convection somewhere beyond my understanding.Like a floating bird, the music would rise and fall in its passage over quarter-tone scales, tumbling subtle descents through micro-tonal cascades, as smooth as the locus continuum of points.

Of the quality of the playing, I can say, at least, that I was ashamed of my slow-motion thinking. I was a sloth in an arena of gazelles, swift and delicate. Mrs. Ranganathan was extremely proficient on the vina, that being apparent even to an ignorant listener like myself. Her skill stood out even more, for she was able to induce her love and respect for the instrument to a great many ears which had never before heard such music. Distinct it was, quite different from the more celebrated Indian instrument, the sitar. The sounds of the vina, distorted, mis-represented, robbed of their fragile sheen by amplification through industrial jackhammers, promised more lovely treasures in intimately vibrant circles.

Mr. Amarnath, who offered a brilliantly controlled solo on the percussion mrudangam, and Miss McKay, playing the droning strings of the gambura, supported the vina with intricate lace and light cobwebs of sound in a field of flowers. The tambura is not supposed to be audible to the audience, but serves to set the rhythm.

All in all, the concert was wonderful, and we can feel lucky to have such musicians in Kingston. Can we hope for more such music, perhaps in a less stiflingly formal auditorium?

Archers open with win

The Queen's women's archery team opened its fall season with an exhibition win Saturday, dumping Guelph by a score fo 747 to 499. Individually, Bev Glenn shot 203 to take top spot, with teammate Peg McLeod second with 197. A Guelph player was third, with Queen's gals Marie Iwania, Lynne Wilson and Marilyn Wheeler fourth through sixth respectively.

Golfers qualify for finals

Queen's golf team, of Doug Painter, John Wellard, Dave Clarke, Ron White and Bill White finished in second place in a weather-abbreviated 27-hole competition held at Cataraqui Golf and Country Club last Friday, thus qualifying for the OUAA Finals this coming weekend at Carleton in Ottawa. The Gaels finished 9 strokes back of U. of T. with a 470 total. Carleton (473) and York (481) were the other qualifyers. Doug Painter of Queen's and Russ Swan of Carleton tied for low individual scores with a 27-hole total of 111; Doug Finlay and Paul Skinner, both of U. of T., tied for second with 115 totals.

Cross-country looks good

Queen's Cross-Country squad turned in its best early-season performance in years Saturday, competing in the Central Ontario Cross-Country Championships at Sunnybrook Park in Toronto. The Queen's thinclads won the Junior Team title, with Bill Bryden and Dieter Stein coming in 6th and 7th respectively (out of a field of 60) over the 8000-metre course. In the Senior Team competition, the Gaels placed second to Toronto Olympic Club, defeating local rival R.M.C. in the process. Walter Eadie placed 10th, Bruce Elliot 15th and Steve Dillabough 17th to spark the Queen's shoring over the 12,000 metre route.

Win streak ends; York downs Rugby Gaels 10-0

by Kees Kort

Queen's Rugby Gaels had their long-standing undefeated string snapped by York on Saturday. The Gaels, who had not lost in league competition since November 1969, dropped a 10-0 decision to the York Yeomen in their league opener, played in Toronto.

Those aspects of team play which marked Queen's exhibition vicotry last week were all but missing against the York side. This inability to play as a unit, coupled with many needless penalties, were the main reasons for the Gaels' defeat. Indeed, if York had had a better kicker, the score could have been 30-0, by virtue of the numerous penalty kicks he attempted during the game.

Man for man, the Queen's side was probably better than York, but the Yeomen played much better as a team, with their back line licking effectively with the forwards. The disorganization of the Queen's side was most apparent in the second half, when, down 10-0, they were continuously in York territory but failed to score. On four occasions, the Gaels worked the ball within five yards of the goaline, but were unable to put it over. Twice, they committed foolish penalties which allowed York to kick the ball to safety; on the other penetrations it seemed as if each of the backs was taking a turn at smashing into the York line, while forgetting that his teammates were also capable of running the ball.

This phenomena was not restricted to the backs, however. In rugby, it is essential that the forwards work together as a pack. On Saturday, it seemed impossible to get even a quorum at the loose rucks. As a result, York recovered a great many loose balls, and retained possession for a greater proportion of the game. This forced Queen's onto a continuous defensive, and from this aspect came the most promising signs of the game. York, although they enjoyed ball control, were able to cross the line only once, and that early in the game. The rest of the scoring came as a result of the success of two of the York side's numerous penalty kicks.

Be that as it may, if Queen's wishes to capture its third straight OUAA Rugby title, the Gaels will have to show more sustained team effort, rather than sporadic individual excellence, throughout their upcoming games. In all fairness to the Queen's side, it must be stated that this was only its first league encounter, while for York it was their third. However, Queen's plays two more opponents this week meeting R.M.C. here on Wednesday (game time is 4:00 pm at west campus) and hosting Trent at 12:00 noon on Saturday, and if the team does not display a little more cohesion - quickly - they will be looking from the bottom up in the league standings.

Women's gymnastics: on the way up

by Donna Melkman

Queen's gymnastics team, after placing a surprising third in the O.W.I.A.A. competition last year, may have even higher expectations this year. Practices are now into their second week and several people stand out. Vivien Symington, who last year placed third overall in the Senior division, and went on to win the parallel bar event at the Provincial level then placed 5th in National competition, is displaying fine form. Chris Goodbrand is another who is considering Senior competition after providing a strong impetus in the intermediate division. Penny Smith, who also is a strong contender after placing first on beam and floor as a Junior, will go on to intermediate. Peggy Hutchison, Leanne Hoar, and Jill Harrison are the other returnees.

Many new faces are appearing. Sue Menard, a previous EOSSA champion and provincial contender, is a young hopeful; Christa Craig, with a series of awards behind her, also shows promise.

With a much larger turnout this year and a much stronger team, Queen's gymnastics shows great hope for the season.

Track Gaels off to flying start

A double gold by hurdler Dave Jarvis got the Queen's track Gaels off to a flying start at the McMaster Invitational Meet, held under cold, windy and wet ditions in Hamilton. Jarvis edged Neeland of Waterloo, last year's OUAA champion, in the 110m hurdles, then went on to set a new meet record with a clocking of 53.3 sec. in the 400m hurdles. This is a full .7 seconds better than the current OUAA mark, a remarkable performance considering the conditions. Sprinter Hugh Fraser passed up the 100m event, but came up with another big performance for the Gaels, finishing a good ten yards ahead of Tony Powell of York in recording a time of 21.5 sec. This is .4 sec under the existing OUAA record; considering that Powell was on our Olympic team, things look good for Hugh in the upcoming season. The Gaels also got a fine performance from Don Price, whp picked up thirds in the 110m hurdles and in the high jump. The mile relay team was second to U. of T., losing to a strong anchor leg by Varsity.

In field events, the Gaels showed some signs of much needed depth, with sophs Axel Becke and John Ongarato taking 3rd and 2nd in long jump and shot put. Becke was especially hampered by the weather conditions. Ongarato also grabbed second in discus, while Mark Ashmore and Dale Huddleston recorded personal bests in these events.

If their field performers can come up with big performances, the Gaels could have a good chance to challenge perennial champions Waterloo for the OUAA title later this month. If not, the speed men could still set a lot of records.

Soccer Gaels on target

by Dave Cottee

After a frustrating three-game goal drought, the soccer Gaels found the mark this week, defeating R.M.C. 4-1 in a Wednesday exhibition match before meeting league opposition from Trent University at the west campus Saturday afternoon. Dave Robertson, Andy Pipe, Don Baragar and Gord Howard notched goals against the Redmen as the Gaels put together a strong team effort.

On Saturday, as most of Queen's was giving its attention to the final, disastrous stages of the football game, the soccer Gaels, supported by a loyal following, took the field against Trent. The team played well, earning a 3-1 victory on goals by Emile Tickert, Dave Robertson and Gord Taylor. Robertson's goal was a bit unusual, coming when a Trent defender headed the ball into his own goal.

In an attacking role, both Robertson and Gord Taylor performed excellently, while on defense, veteran Gerry Birks did an outstanding job; Peter Dickie was very steady in goal for the Gaels.

This Saturday, fans have a chance to catch a football-soccer doubleheader, with Ryerson meeting the soccer Gaels at 4:00 p.m. After the Queen's-Carleton game, walk a few yeards south to the soccer pitch and cheer the soccer Gaels (real footballers!) on to victory.

Dunkley shotgun blasts Gaels 46-18

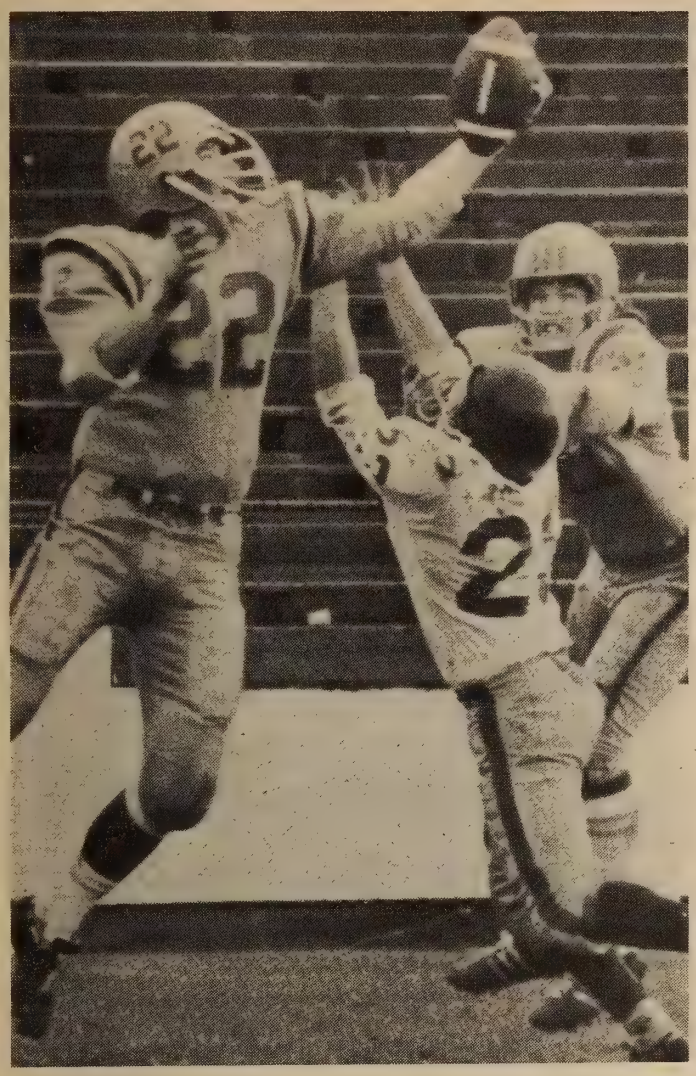
by Chris Boon

A well-aimed shotgun, carried by Varsity quarterback Wayne Dunkley, did in the Gaels 46-18 Saturday, despite the at times valiant efforts of the Queen's defence. The Blues signalcaller, an All-Canadian selection last season, completed 26 of 43 passes for 387 yards and 4 touchdowns before giving way to rookie Steve Kerr late in the fourth quarter. The Toronto effort was aided and abetted by a dismal offensive showing on the part of the Gaels, who were unable to generate a running game against a tight 4-4 defense, and apparently unwilling to go to a passing game until the middle of the third quarter. The offense also committed several costly turnovers, setting up two T.O. majors in the first half with a pass interception by Peter McNabb (run back to the Queen's 8) and a fumble on the one yard line. Toronto's third TD of the first half (actually their first score) came on a pass from Dunkley to halfback Cor Doret. Corner Darryl Penner slipped on the greasy field, just as Doret made the catch, and the swift T.O. back was able to sprint into the endzone.

The Gaels' only first-half points were set up by a fine interception of a tipped pass, by linebacker Gord Squires. Squires got a great block from defensive tackle Paul Hand as he ran the ball back to the Toronto 10-yd line. It took Tom Taylor just one play to hit Stu Lang with a pass for the TD. Doug Cozac converted.

Toronto also picked up a single on a wide field goal attempt by Jeff Sokovnin to make the half-time score 22 to 10, with the Gaels' other three points coming on a Cozac field goal. That in itself was quite a story. The score was set up when Geoff Hamlin stole the ball from Varsity punt returner Paul Kitchen, to give the Gaels a first down on the Varsity 21. Warrender drove 15 yards to the 6, then carried twice more to the 4. On his second carry, the big halfback appeared to be in, only to be tripped up as he cut upfield. 3rd down, and Taylor lobbed what appeared to be a TD pass to Stu Lang. But guess what,-folks!?! An official said Lang had moved up to within a yard of the line of scrimmage, thus making the tight end on that side an ineligible receiver. Penalty called, score wiped out, and Cozac collects 3 points.

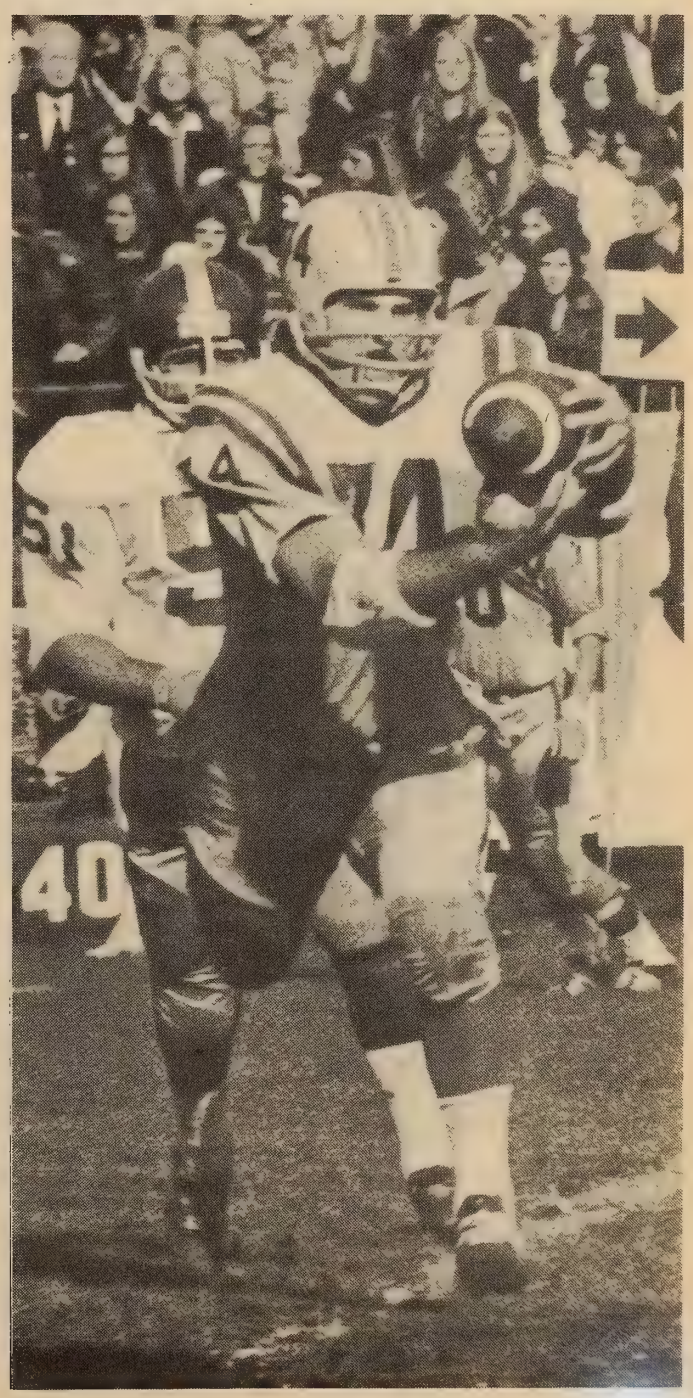
At this point, in spite of some incredibly inept play (and play-calling) on offense (you can't run inside on what is effectively a goal-line defense with four linebackers right up on the line of scrimmage), the Gaels were still in the ball game. 12 points is not an insurmountable lead, and the defense had been more the victim of offensive mistakes and the muddy field than of its own errors. (Not that the defense was blameless. Linebacker Bob Grimm was having problems picking up T.O. fullback Libert Castillo on swing patterns, and he whiffed twice on tackles when he did have Castillo covered.) The Blues had consistently good field position, due partly to the offense's inability to move the ball, and partly to bad punting (another 29-yard day) by Dave Campbell. The Gaels' coverage on punts wasn't great, either, although it showed some improvement over last week against Ottawa U.



However, if the Blues had been hot in the first half, they gave off steam in the second. After recovering a short kickoff attempt at their own 53, the Blues moved into paydirt on just four plays: a completion to Ackley, an incompletion (due mostly to a good play by Penner) a long pass on which Alex Morris was nailed with a most dubious interference call (the same official 27, hit Queen's with an equally questionable call last year---maybe he has something against us, and a 7-yard toss to Ackley The convert made it 29-10. T.O. kicked off, and John Booth ran the ball out to the Queen's 33, Taylor dropped back to pass, had a receiver open. . and threw a perfect strike to Varsity deep back Bob Billinghurst. A clipping penalty against the Blues gave them the ball on the centre-field stripe. Dunkley immediately went to work, completing a 40-yard bomb to Ackley, who had gotten a step on Penner. With a first down on the Queen's 15 Dunkley stepped back and hit Elsey for six points. Wham! The Gaels were down 36-10 before they had a chance to draw a deep breath. To add insult to injury, Sokovnin added a 16-yard field goal to make the score 39-10 with 8:48 to play in the third quarter.

After an ineffectual exchange around midfield, the Gaels regained possession on the T.O. 52, and Raold Serebrin, who has been used sparingly this season, got the call to see if he could get the offense working. And, within limits, he did. Despite throwing interceptions on his first two series, Serebrin managed to put together Queen's only drive of the afternoon, mostly on passes to John Hollingworth, who had a great game individually, Stu Long, and Alex Melvin. Tight End John Waddell, who has been used more for blocking than receiving so far this season, caught a long bomb after running a pattern that left him yards open. . except for a fan who made a fine tackle. Penalty, natch, but the TD would have been better. After a rather confused exchange of penalties Serebrin hit Stu Lang on a little hitch pattern to make the score 46-18. Toronto had added another score on a pass to John Rhamey, and Cozac a single for the Gaels. Mercifully, the clock ran out on the scene of the debacle.

So, what happened? Roughly speaking, it was a combination of red-hot passing by Dunkley, inspired catches by his receivers, and a bad day for the Queen's offense. Surprisingly enough, the defense did not play that badly, especially in the first half. The Gaels' offensive line had trouble getting off the ball most of the game, and the play selection, especially that of Taylor, was suspect. Queen's didn't attempt to loosen up the T.O. defense until too late in the game, although the loss of Gord McLellan in the second quarters and the slippery field made outside running difficult. Even so, the passing game was there, but the Gaels didn't use it until the outcome was almost in-con-testible. There were a few good points . . . but only a few. Darryl Penner played well, inspite of slipping and getting burned a couple of times. Hillingsworth played a tremendous game, especially in the fourth quarter, and rookie Greg McNamara played well when called upon in the second half.



In summation, a defensive lineman (unidentified for obvious reasons) put it well: "Our defensive line (Queen's) and their offensive line could have taken the afternoon off and gone for a beer, for all the effect we had on the outcome. When Dunkley is throwing like that (from a shotgun) it's a game of pitch-and-catch, and there's not much a pass rush can do about it." Dunkley hasn't thrown like that against anyone else this year. The big hope is that he won't three weeks from now.

The Gaels come up against Carleton this weekend at Richardson Stadium. The Ravens lost 30-0 to Ottawa U., and posses an absobutely terrible offense. (6 points in three games ain't great.) The question mark is what the Gaels do on offense. They should win; the question is. how?, and, by how much?

Despite some defensive heroics in the first half (LB Gord Squires' interception, above set up Gael TD)...

.....and the efforts of John Hollingsworth (74 below; et. al. in the fourth quarter, a wet field and Wayne Dunkley were too much for the Gaels.

World: Japan may extend friendship to China

PEKING — An end to decades of hostility between Japan and The Peoples' Republic of China is about to be realized, as Japan appears close to recognizing the government of Chairman Mao Tse-tung.

Prime Minister Kakuei Tanaka of Japan ended a three day tour of Communist China in a friendly meeting with the Chairman. Although no promises were exchanged during that conference, Chairman Mae stated that he was optomistic as to a successful outcome to the talks. The tour by Mr. Tanaka has been viewed as the last step before Japan formally recognizes China.

Taiwan has registered a protest with Japan but it now appears that the establishment of diplomatic relations between the two powers is left beyond doubt. Japan will be the eighty-ninth country to recognize Communist China.

MANILA, PHILLIPPINES — President Ferdinand Marcos told his people to "stand in line" as he made an announcement outlining a series of extensive reforms to be instituted in the Philippines, which have been under military rule for about a week.

The reforms, which are to cover almost every area of public and private life, are to go into effect immediately and will be completed by the end of his term in office, in 1973, Marcos stated.

They will include a crackdown on illegal possession of firearms, stiff penalties for crimes against tourists, a roundup of "subversives", a works program for the unemployed, sweeping tax and land reforms, action against corrupt or inefficient judges and reforms of banking laws.

There will also be teams of Reserve Officer Training Corps to teach the citizenry proper driving habits as well as correct public behaviour.

Operators of the islands' media were told that they would be allowed to operate if they get in line. Marcos announced the banning of gossip columns, society pages, and offensive and political advertising. The papers will be allowed no editorial comment or opinion. Three of the Philippines' fifteen dailies are now operating.

Marcos has put a maximum price on a wide range of essential foodstuffs. He is also waging a battle against the "war lords" who have been on the islands since they gained independence from the United States 26 years ago.

Marcos announced that only ten percent of the subersives wanted by the state managed to escape the dragnet put out last week. A total of 106 have been arrested.

COPENHAGEN — On the eve of the referendum to decide whether Denmark will enter the European Common Market, nearly twenty percent of the populace have not decided how to vote according to advance polls.

The major conflict facing the populus is whether they might be imperiling their enviable society by joining the larger, more troubled nations in the Community in order to accept the economic advantages that would result from union.

Denmark's constitution requires that there be a five-sixths majority of the 179 members of parliament in order to pass changes in the country's sovereinty. However, the motion to ratify the treaty of accession to the EEC got only 141 votes, nine fewer than were needed. It was then necessary to submit the treaty to a referendum which will be binding on the government.

Canada: International payments deficit recorded

OTTAWA — Canada's deficit in international payments for goods and services rose by $73 million in the second quarter of this year according to Statistics Canada. This brings the mid-year total to $543 million.

The international position has been tending downwards since 1970, when a one billion dollar surplus was registered. In 1971, there was a surplus of $348 million, $261 million of which was attributable to the first half.

During the second quarter of this year net surpluses in exports were offset by net payments for services such as freight, insurance, interest and dividends.

There was a net inflow of capital to offset the real sector, as $612 million came into Canada in the form of long-term investments. There was a net outflow of $217 million in short-term form.

The quarter registered an increase in foreign ownership of $200 million, bringing the year's total to $435 million. This is on top of $885 million in 1971 and $835 million in 1970.

On a seasonally adjusted basis, which shows the underlying trend, the second quarter deficit was only $17 million.

TORONTO — Premier William Davis has announced changes in several key Cabinet posts and has introduced Ontario's first woman Cabinet Minister.

George Kerr will be leaving his position as Minister of Colleges and Universities, to take up the position of Justice Secretary. Jack McNie will be taking the Colleges and Universities post.

Eric Winkler was appointed to the Chairmanship of the Management Board of the Cabinet. He will be leaving the portfolio of Consumer and Commercial Relations which is to pass on to John Twining Clement.

Claude Bennett and Margaret Birch are to be Ministers without Portfolio.

Margaret Birch, elected last October 21 from Toronto Scarborough East, is to be the first woman to hold a position in the Ontario Cabinet. Although she has not been assigned a department yet, her interests lie in working with the mentally handicapped and housing.

Birch has been chairman of the Standing Social Development Committee.

MONTREAL — One hundred and thirty-eight Ugandan Asian refugees arrived in Montreal's Dorval International Airport on Thursday. They were greeted upon arrival by Immigration Minister Bryce Mackasey.

After their twenty-seven hour trip from Kampal via Athens and Paris the refugees were taken to Longue Point Military Base in east Montreal where they will reside for several days while they go through customs, health and immigration procedures.

The new arrivals will also receive landed immigrants papers and councelling by manpower department staff while at Longue Point.

In his address to the refugees at the airport, Mackasey recalled Canada's acceptance of refugees in the past from Hungary, Tibet and Czechoslovakia.

OTTAWA — The federal government has announced plans to store spent radioactive fuels from domestic nuclear power reactors in above-ground, specially constructed buildings.

The first is to be built in the mid 1980's somewhere in Ontario to handle the accummulating radioactive wastes from nuclear reactors like those at Pickering and Bruce.

The radioactive fuel must be stored for a million years before all the radioactive components have decayed away safely. Each of the proposed containers will be built to last 100 years, with hopes that by 2080 better techniques for dealing with the waste will become available.

TORONTO — Manpower and Immigration Minister Bryce Mackasey has announced a $40 million program to create jobs. The work program will begin on December 1 if the present government is returned, he stated.

In the new program the government will pay 75 per cent of the direct wages, during the first half of the new employees' training period and 50 per cent during the second half.

The federal government's on-the-job-training program will be expanded into a permanent Industrial Training Program. Mackasey also stated that the government is also planning closer ties between the Manpower Department and the Unemployment Insurance Commission through a job information center where people will be able to readilly find information on job openings from computer based job banks.

TORONTO — The Toronto Dominion Bank has announced the appointment of Richard M. Thompson to their top post. At 39, Thompson will be the youngest of the presidents of the nine operating chartered banks.

TORONTO — Premier William Davis told an impromptu meeting of a half-dozen students that there will be no increase in tuition fees at Ontario Universities next year.

The Premier defended this year's one hundred dollar increase as necessary to maintain equity in the distribution of education costs between students and taxpayers.

Looking About

by Peter Jensen

Promise

At a high school assembly in Regina, Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau was asked, "You promised, four years ago, a just society. What happened?" He answered, "the next time you see Jesus Christ, ask him what happened to his just society". This is the sort of retort for which I do not care. It is devoid of honesty and is insulting to one's intelligence, unless Mr. Trudeau thinks he is about to be crucified.

Fees

Before an assembly of students at York University, Premier Davis stated that tuition fees were not to be increased next year. Whenever I hear Mr. Davis speaking of university tuition, I am reminded of the eunuch who, after taking a course in voice production, could pass himself off fairly well as a baritone. Yet when one listened closely one could hear the squeak just the same as ever.

Spoerri's Camemberts

Last summer, President Georges Pompidou commissioned Exposition '72 in the Grand Palais of Paris and ordered the displaying of works of French artists of the last decade. One particularly intriguing piece drew attention like a Pigalle whore at Maxim's. This was Spoerri's assemblage of rotting camemberts, forks and Knives, tables and chairs, all quite filthy. One might be inclined to think his work a comment on the Fifth Republic. Whatever its point, there were few in attendance who grasped it.

The patriot

"British pigs go home is the latest slogan scrawled on the walls of West Ireland. However, an Irish patriot decided it would just not do to have English defacing good Irish walls and so substituted Gaelic. So it is, sadly, incomprehensible to anyone who might take its advice.

AMS stands then waffles

by Jennifer Grass

The AMS outercouncil gave unanimous support on Wednesday night to a motion urging all Queen's students to vote "yes" to the three questions on the upcoming Ontario Federation of Student's referendum.

On October 11 students across Ontario will be asked the following questions: Would you support withholding your fees in January if negotiations with the government are unsuccessful? Would you support a move to withhold all 1973-74 tuition fees if the Ontario Government announces further tuition increases or further detrimental changes in the Ontario Students Awards Program? Do you support the demands made by the OFS upon the Ontario Governement.

These demands include the recommendation that all tuition fee increases in post-secondary institutions for 1972-73 be deferred until full consultation has been held with affected groups and, in particular that no increase be approved until full public discussions have been held on the Wright Commission Report. The OFS also intends to ask that all regulations governing the Ontario Student Awards Program be amended to facilitate greater access to the program; that the loan ceiling recently raised to $800 be lowered to a maximum absolute level of $600 and that the age of independence be reduced from 24 years.

Greg Leblanc, AMS president stressed the point that "the $100 increase in fees is not the whole issue." "Accessibility to higher education and the arbitrary manner in which fees were increased are th issues at stake," he said.

With a dramatic plea to the AMS to take a stand, Ken Wong, External Affairs Commissioner resigned his post Wednesday night for medical reasons. He told outer council to "pull together, get tight, quit bitching and get going."

A campaign to approach as many students as possible in the remaining days before the referendum has been hastily undertaken. "We should have begun a campaign a long time ago," Andy Pipe, Acting Services Commissioner commented.

The co-ordinator of the OFS, Craig Heron was on hand to explain the projects already in full swing at the University of Toronto and the University of Western Ontario.

Steve Mansell, President of the Engineering Society told outer council that the "Engineering Society will have all their representatives out to talk to classes next week." "We haven't made a stand until now so we'll have to scramble to catch up," he added.

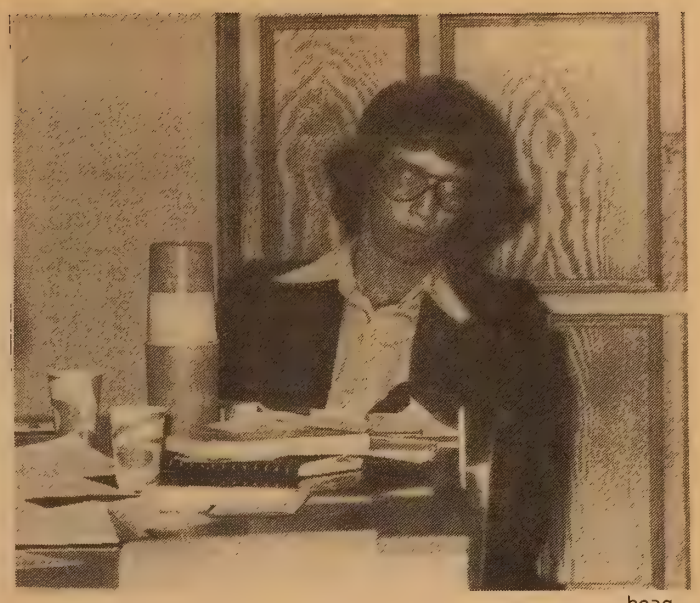
After support for the AMS stand on the fee strike was obtained, outer council then waffled for an hour on the subject of whether or not to close the Tumblewood Craft Shop, formerly Heffalump.

Pipe presented volumes of figures to prove that it was unfeasible to keep the shop open. These were compiled in consultation with the auditors, Thorne, Gunn Associates. It is estimated that the shop would have to triple their sales to break even.

ASUS president, Ted Cape interceded on behalf of Tumblewood by commenting that they were not given sufficient notice to prepare their own statement.

"I'm tired of this bloody numbers game," said Stuart Clark, Vice President of the Graduate Society. He added, "I want a definitive, impartial statement."

Pipe retorted that "the bank statements kept by the AMS bookkeeper are the only objective data that there is." And according to the auditors, "it's thumbs down on Heffalump," he said.



Alan Broadbent, student rector told the meeting that financial questions were not the only ones involved in this issue. "This is one of the biggest political questions we've had in years. Tumblewood should be given the opportunity to prepare its figures and its arguments," he said.

The motion to close Tumblewood was eventually tabled after further nitpicking.

The financial status of the Typing Service was also called into question. Pipe explained that the Service lost money last year because they did not buy supplies in sufficient quantities to warrant the best discount. They were also unable to get a rebate from IBM for damaged copies because these were not returned. Insufficient control over the Xerox machines also resulted in significant losses. Students often made 10 copies but only paid for 5, Pipe said. But he assured outer council that "These problems have all been licked."

Other AMS business included a motion to refuse membership to the ASUS replacement for representative at large to the AMS outer council, This came in response to a decision by the ASUS executive to extend the deadline for nominations for this position and for an ASUS senator. The motion was struck because it was considered to be outside the realm of the AMS. However, the council referred the complaint to the judicial committee of ASUS.

The meeting ended after passing a motion which will permit KGH nurses along with part-time students, faculty and staff at Queen's to purchase AMS concert cards.

Heffalump

There is a deeply held belief that if a wealthy man admits even to himself that he can afford a measure of recklessness in his expenditures, an angry God will strike him dead - or certainly take away his money. This holds also for the AMS and they don't have money to lose. At least as long as they keep waffling over the Heffalump.

Knowing that they are pouring increasing amounts of student money into a losing venture, going completely against repeated advice from their business administration and a professional audit, and facing a fast-depleting capital fund from which to drain funds, the outer council decided to postpone the inevitable. Why? To close it correctly. "Let's not be hasty. Let's not step on anybody's toes". Sure.

As I've often said, its too bad the place should close. It was a nice idea. But when nice ideas cost $13,000 of student money and benefits very few, its time for action.

Get the AMS out of the unseemly economics of opulence.

Yours very truly,
Greg LeBlanc

World studies

Dear Editor,

I feel that many of the problems existing in the world today, are due to a lack of understanding between the different peoples of the world. To correct these problems, a greater understanding of the other peoples, cultures and societies in the world is necessary. . .For this purpose, I believe a department of International Studies should be set up here at Queen's.

New park on reclaimed land

The landfill operations on Lake Ontario between Lower University and Collingwood Streets are part of a project which will become an extensive park, according to Kurt Gesell, Acting Campus Planner.

Rockfill from the underground parking lot which is under construction on Lower Campus has been dumped along the shoreline and top soil which was being stored at West Campus is now being brought down to cover it.

The new park is a joint project of the City of Kingston and Queen's University and will add to the city's recreational facilities as well as provide a cheap means of disposing of fill from campus digging operations.

There are three phases to the project, Gesell stated. Stage one, which is currently underway will create parkland for 170 feet into Lake Ontario. At the completion of stage three there will be 280 feet of new land, complete with mini-bays, islands, elevations and 'lagoons'.

While Queen's is paying for the actual landfill operations, the city will take responsibility for landscaping and planting of trees.

Mr. Gesell stated that the fill should be in place this fall and that the city may begin landscaping next spring after it has settled. A detailed sketch of the reclamation project is now on display in the Collins Room in Richardson Hall.

Reaction

October 1, 1972

Dear Editor,

Congratulations to Paul Gompertz. Though misinterpreting several of my basic points, his response shows commendable knowledge and thought; an intelligent response to citicism. But only one such response.

Can so few accept the fact that they are open to criticism; as they should be, and enjoy confronting it? Laugh and think and fling their answer back, glad of the opposition as chance to grow?

Two other letters have appeared, both variations on a theme of inability to respond creatively to my challenge. One illustrates the attitude which is a common defensive reaction--"well, then, let's see your stuff and see if its any better. . " Childish. Which totally evades the point--that they are under criticism, and must make some response of their own: rather they would like to wait, abdicate the responsibility, and think they are making themselves invulnerable to the criticism by "assuring" that the person who questions their significance is, in their opinion, not obviously more accomplished. All of which is a most point.

My accusation of vacuous dabbling, with the sole selfish aspiration of achieving the image of "poet" still stands firm and unchallenged. The appearance is enough for almost all now--what need of any of the essence? That would imply hard hard work and gamble and doubt. The image alone is enough for any fool.

The last response, in Friday 29 Sept. Journal, contains such a concise statement of exactly my objection: "by students, for students". Such a closed minded concept of the nature and function of poetry! Such a complacent proposal of inbreeding (and its acceptance) can only bring the ineveitable consequences of inbreeding: the intensification and proliferations of defects of all types, a growth of weakness, a total vitiation and debilitation: congenital idiocy. Such a bald-faced statement. "By students, for students" only strengthens my belief that here are serious, monumental flaws in the approach to poetry.

I do not decry the lack of "professional touch" in the sense of empty slickness, but rather the lack of the least aspiration to sophistication of though or approach. For, when appearance (the most basic illusion) is all that is necessary, what need of effort? Poetry demands more than appearance. The "poets" whose "poetry" I challenge are all much too wound round themselves to wish to touch the world or anyone but themselves.

In reality, these illusions are of little concern to me. But the criticism, the question, the doubt so begs to be put by its absence). And now it has.

Yours,
James W. Smith

John Hazlett hasn't heard about them. He says that Liberal economic management has produced "a phenomenal growth rate in the Canadian economy" which has allowed all Canadians to share in prosperity. (Kingston Whig-Standard, 3 October, 1972).

Flora MacDonald knows how widespread poverty is in this country and she understands its human costs. In 1969, 5,135,000 Canadians lived below the poverty line, as set by the Senate Committee on Poverty. They still do.

Back in 1968, it was good to hear the pledge of the Trudeau government that their first priority was going to be the fight against poverty. But, somewhere along the way, the problem fell further down the list and it has been relegated over the past four years to an exercise in delaying tactics. Talking about a just society without doing anything about it is playing with words, and that is what the Prime Minister is doing.

According to George Bain of the Globe and Mail, what the Trudeau government has done about the entire problem of poverty is "a cop-out; it's part of an effort to wriggle around the awkward fact that the celebrated war on poverty of a few years ago hasn't been so much lost as the field has been abandoned."

Flora MacDonald and Robert Stanfield are pledged to a real attack on this problem. The policies they will implement include the following:

+ the establishment of a national income floor for individuals and families who have no earned income because of physical disability or other valid reasons.
+ the planning and institution, in concert with the provinces, of an Income Development programme as an alternative to the present ineffective welfare system.
+ changes that will ensure that individuals or families capable of earning income below the poverty line will be entitled to retain a specified amount of this earned income without any reduction in public assistance.

This will give such people an incentive to work.

You have a chance on October 30 to elect a new government that is serious about breaking the poverty cycle in Canada.

Is this your Canada? It's some people's

Course evaluation undergoes study

The report on Course Evaluation at Queen's was received by the Senate last week. It was submitted by a sub-committee of the committee on Academic Procedures. Members of this committee included Dr. R. Bernabei, Classics; Dr. T. Willmott, Mathematics; Dr. D. W. Holden, Sociology; John Desmarteau, Meds '74, and John Bankes, Arts '73.

The study was undertaken at the request of Senate in October 1971 after gross errors were discovered in the first printed course evaluation guide which was produced by the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society.

Information was solicited from a large number of Universities and colleges throughout Canada and the United States concerning the methods of course evaluation that they employed.

The report points to the course evaluation produced by George Washington University which is noticeably superior to other publications. It employs a limited amount of statistical references; rather it relies on verbal accounts in describing courses, disclosing the background of teachers and rendering students assessments of courses and of teachers.

In contrast, the report pointed to the published results of course evaluation at the University of Utah, where questionaire results were disclosed solely by means of a computer print-out. The committee found this material tiresome to read and difficult to interpret.

The desire for course evaluation stems, in part, from the failure of university calendars to provide anything more than a generalized smattering of information about the content of the courses.

However, the usefulness of published course evaluations for the selection of courses diminishes with the number of optional courses available to particular categories of students. Those whose programmes are oriented toward professions are most severely restricted in their freedom to choose courses so course evaluation will have little value in determining courses.

However, students with extensive freedom of choice might well desire to compare various courses on the basis of more information than university calendars provide.

The ways in which course evaluation can improve teaching appear to stem largely from the force of possible disparaging criticisms. If done well, course evaluation are useful in drawing attention to shortcomings and eliminate difficulties or redundancies. However, the committee saw certain inherent problems in a published guide.

An unfavourable evaluation was seen as likely to damage the reputation of the person teaching the course. Even in cases where such criticism might seem well deserved, the abrasive effect would be ameliorated if unfavourable criticism were given privately. It is also possible that course evaluations encourage popularity courting.

The quality of the teacher's work might be sacrificed in order to enhance his entertainment value. There may also be legal implications in publishing assessments that are unduly damaging to a teacher's reputation.

The committee explored the area of signed or anonymous evaluations. Some professors equate an anonymous evaluation with an anonymous letter and will refuse to read it. But there are also those who see it as unlikely that meaningful data can be obtained from students if they are required to be identified with potentially derogatory evaluations.

Both students and teachers have reasons to want a course evaluation. Students desire the information to help in choosing courses and teachers wish to have an indication of the problems experienced by students.

Therefore the effort of both groups is required. The report suggests that students design the questionaire, distribute them, and collect the information in consultation and co-operation with the teaching staff. The comments of teachers would be published along with the report of students if such a thing were to be made available to a large audience.

This was the formula followed by John Bankes, a member of this committee and co-ordinator of the ASUS course evaluation guide compiled at the end of last year.

It was considered advantageous to carry out course evaluation once each term. This would allow for evaluation both for half and full courses and it would allow the instructor an opportunity to take the first term evaluation into consideration in carrying out the work of the second term.

This report will be passed on to all faculties and to the AMS for consideration.

Queen's enrollment

Principal John J. Deutsch told the senate on September 28th that "although many universities this year are facing declining enrolment and a corresponding financial embarrassment, available statistics show that Queen's is very close to its target."

Several years ago Queen's adopted a policy whereby student enrolment would grow to 10,000 by 1975 and then remain constant until at least 1981. The steady state policy was couched in scenes expressing concern for the quality for the academic environment at Queen's.

In particular there was a rejection of the concept of the multiversity with its associate growth, both in numbers of students and in ever-expanding areas of research and teaching interest.

The senate considered the multiversity as a threat to the relatively intimate scale of operation of the university and also the relationship of Queen's to its host city.

A more recent projection indicates that growth towards the upper limit of approximately 10,000 students will be slower than previously anticipated. The Draft Report of The Commission on Post-Secondary Education and recent Government Actions, make it clear that the period of rapid expansion of universities in Ontario is over. The steady state period appears likely to begin in 1980 instead of 1975.

The fourth report of the Senate Committee on Academic Development at Queen's was received by the senate last week. It says that undergraduate enrolment will continue to expand but at a much slower rate.

Demand for places in all undergraduate faculties except engineering, continues to outrun capacity.

Although the demand for graduate places is much more difficult to predict, the report concludes that there will be room for a modest growth of graduate work.

Certain enrolment shifts are expected within the university. In the 1972-73 session among the total first year students accepted for admission to the faculty there has been a decline of those entering the Applied Science program and an increase of about 20 per cent over last year of those choosing the B.Sc.

Sociology to get MA program

Last week the Senate approved a recommendation to implement an M.A. program in Sociology in September 1973 provided that an additional senior appointment is assured by January 31, 1973.

The emphasis in the program will be on both preparation for consideration to the PhD and a terminal MA for those seeking career opportunities in community colleges and high schools, or in research and administrative positions.

A report of the committee on Academic Development states that a terminal MA program is needed in order to provide the depth necessary to bridge the gap in levels of sophistication between undergraduate experience and that needed in a position of responsibility.

All students will be required to take some course work in theory and Methodology. Proposed career plans will influence the choice of other sociology courses.

The department of sociology co-operates with the politics department in order to provide courses in political sociology. Professor J. Lele offers one undergrad course in Political Sociology which is shared by the Department of Political studies and sociology.

He also teaches a graduate course in this area in the politics department. Professor J. Meisel, who is currently on leave from his teaching duties will begin supervision of graduate students in the sociology department as soon as the MA program is launched.

He will supervise study in the areas of Sociology of Development and Changè in Canada with special reference to political aspects. His graduate courses will be available to students in the sociology program.

Negotiations are also under way to appoint a senior psychiatrist with sociological training and with specializations in the areas of drug addiction and alcoholism, as well as a specialist in the area of Urban Studies who will be available for supervision of graduate students in Sociology although officially a member of the School of Public Administration.

Arrangements exist for co-operation in research with Penitentiary Services, the National Defence College, the RCMP and the OPP Graduates could propose research projects in the fields of Criminology-Deviance.

The report says that, when the academic do well as administrative and ethical implications are worked out, co-operation from these agencies and support from the Department will not be lacking.

Informal arrangements also exist in the mental health field which will be formalized when the proposed joint appointment in Psychiatry and Sociology comes about.

Turner urges political involvement for students

by Bob Mutrie

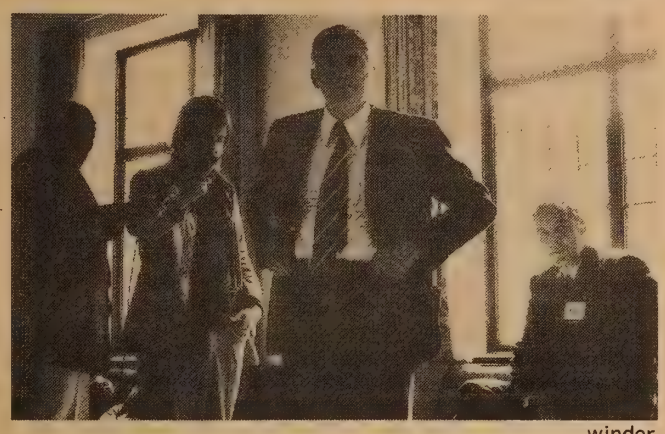
On a Liberal campaign swing through Eastern Ontario, John Turner, federal Finance Minister joined John Hazlett, Liberal nominee for Kingston and the Islands in an informal talk with students at Queen's.

"Political power can and should be held between the ages of eighteen to thirty," Turner stated, pointing out that this age group represents forty percent of the electorate. But he stressed that nobody has the right to criticise unless they participate. "Students must get involved in the political system," he claimed.

The Finance Minister, told the audience that his goal, as head of his department, was to try and continue economic growth in an attempt to even out the unemployment problem and at the same time maintain stability of prices.

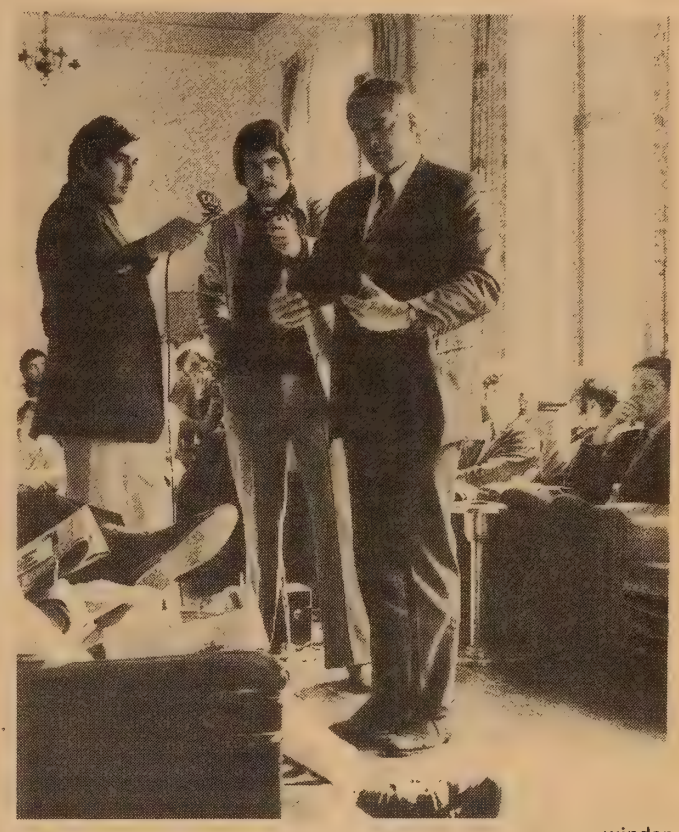
"Canada, has the fastest growing labour force in the world," he stated. Between 1965 and 1970, 100,000 more Canadians entered the force than in fifteen European countries combined. Canada, during that time provided 400,000 more new jobs than those fifteen countries," he said. Although, he expressed regret that so many university graduates could not find jobs, he pointed out that we are still doing 'relatively well'.

John Hazlett was asked to comment on the tuition fee increase implemented by the Ontario government. He stated that it was not appropriate for him as an individual to take a stand, but stressed that if the majority of students came to a decision and were ready to stand on it, then he would encourage and support them.



Turner told the gathering that a second primary goal of his ministry will be to establish a 'more fertile' capital market in our country, so that development may be with our own money. He stated that within a couple of years, the Canadian GNP will be approaching the levels presently held by Britain and France. Turner pointed out that there is a lot of money being currently held in pension and trust funds that with proper incentives could be freed for investment. He pointed out that, for some reason, "Canadians are cautious about investing in Canada."

On the subject of foreign ownership of Canadian industry, Turner commented that any action against the present foreign presence must be taken 'over a reasonable length of time without sacrificing employment.'



Turner is also seeking a balance between economic growth and distribution in Canada. "Through tax incentives we have encouraged business to settle in areas to which they otherwise would not come," he pointed out. "Although there is always the risk of other firms in an industry being placed in non-competitive situation," he said, "the department has gone out of its way to prevent this from occurring."

The controversial subject of tax exempt property which sparked a conflict between the university and Kingston last year was also brought up. According to Turner, cities, containing large masses of lands not subject to property taxation, have been subsidized for ninety per cent of the amount in federal grants.

In concluding his talk, Turner stressed that Canada must take inventory of her needs for the future. Pointing out that we are now competitive on a world level, we must demand concessions from other countries for use of our resources and certainly insure that they are processed in Canada.

A Polar City with Summer Weather

Only climatic conditions have delayed development of the polar regions and mining of the mineral wealth beneath them. Tomorrow, new cities may arise in these remote climes, encased in gigantic domes made of an incredible material developed by Hoechst — new Trevira high tenacity polyester fabric. Inside these artificial greenhouses, covering many square miles and held aloft by streams of air, temperature and humidity would be controlled to create a perfect environment for both working and living.

Cross-Fertilization of Ideas

New Trevira high tenacity polyester fabric and the various uses projected for it are examples of the cross-fertilization of ideas that inevitably results from the several scientific disciplines Hoechst is active in. Our chemical research and discoveries reinforce our developments in the newer fields of plastics and fibres. Research, development and product experience in many areas combine to solve specific problems.

Helping Build Canada

An affiliate of the worldwide Hoechst organization, Canadian Hoechst Limited concerns itself with supplying both the present and future needs of Canadians. The range of products and services covers the spectrum through industrial chemicals, dyestuffs, plastics, printing plates, human and veterinary medicines, pharmaceuticals, and textile fibres. Hoechst products and services, Hoechst techniques and know-how in these fields, combined with a large international fund of experience, have given the company a reputation for expertise which takes constant striving to live up to. The Doctoral Syndrome

by Peter Trenton.
Reprinted from Today's Generation

What do Motel T Fords and a PhD degree have in common? Both are serviceable but obsolete by today's standards.

That, sad to say, is the truth. PhDs are about as valuable today as Edsels, Avro Arrows, and all the other mistakes of this technological age. And, just for openers, here are a few examples why:

(1) Last year, a college in California signed an agreement with the local plumbers' union that guarantees campus plumbers more than $20,000 a year. The average faculty salary at that campus is about $1,000 less. So far nobody has argued that this wage differential is unfair.

(2) Memorial University is located in St. John's, Newfoundland. Now it is a fact of life that most post-graduate students come from the major urban areas of the country - and they like to stay in those urban areas. So Memorial has traditionally been forced to take the dregs of the annual crop of new PhDs. But this year, some graduating PhDs from the University of Toronto, which is generally regarded as having the best economics department in the country, were not even able to obtain interviews for the few teaching vacancies in economics that Memorial was filling. And - surprise - economics is still considered to offer more opportunities for those with graduate training than most other academic disciplines.

(3) The traditional method for universities to hire new PhDs for faculty positions has been to offer a two-year introductory contract with another two-year renewal almost certain. Then, barring an act of God, the PhD could expect to be granted tenure (a lifetime contract). So what can new PhDs expect today? Most likely a one-year appointment to such centres as Brandon, Manitoba, or Fredericton, New Brunswick. Tenure? Oh, don't even mention that.

(4) Finally, just when the financial rewards for graduate studies seem bleakest, the Ontario government has jacked up tuition fees. A typical graduate student in Ontario paid $485 in tuition last year. The Ontario government has graciously raised this figure by almost 100 per cent for the coming year (face it, students are politically vulnerable). At the same time, the amount of Ontario government fellowship money (the basic source of most students' grants) has been cut from $5 million to $3 million. Just for good measure, those students who do obtain fellowships are paying income taxes on those fellowships to the federal government for the first time this year.

In case you missed the point, a graduate student today has every right to feel that the cards are stacked against him. Most graduate students entered graduate school on the understanding that, while they might not be approached by would-be employers on bended knees, they would be in a favourable competitive position compared to the rest of society. Instead they find that the old joke about plumbers earning more than doctors is no longer a joke. (There are, to be sure, still some individuals who go to graduate school for the classic reason that more knowledge is a desirable state. But there are fewer and fewer people today who believe in the classical ideal of the well-rounded man. For the purposes of this article, these individuals are considered about as relevant to current conditions as the Neanderthal man.)

Most people today are aware that there are worms in the education apple. But it is doubtful whether anyone who is not actively involved with the training and hiring of PhDs could ever fully appreciate the advanced state of decay.

Sadly enough, the institutions which should be providing the information on employment probabilities for PhDs are abdicating their responsibilities. The government, which has the best over-all picture of employment prospects, has not actively publicized the falling ratio of demand to supply for PhDs. Perhaps the government is afraid of the political scandal that widespread publicity of the situation would cause. After all, how many people would approve of spending $26,000 or more to train one PhD after the BA level - simply to become unemployed?

But the universities are as much at fault as anyone. Even as the universities are experiencing considerable difficulty in placing their PhDs (it is considered good form for universities to place their doctoral graduates), they are actively recruiting even more grad students - and establishing new graduate departments. The whole plot is reminiscent of the Sorcerer's Apprentice.

Not that the universities are guilty of anything more serious than a natural human weakness. In Ontario, the provincial government pays the university operating grants of $1,000 for each freshman student. By the time that freshman becomes a master's student, he is worth $6,000 a year to the university. And, best of all, a doctoral student brings in the incredible amount of $10,000 yearly. So what would anyone with a head for simple figures prefer - freshmen or graduate students?

Moreover, graduate students are a cheap source of labour. On average, some 40 per cent of all undergraduate teaching is conducted by graduate students. But graduate students are also versatile - they can mark papers, supervise exams, and do the legwork on departmental experiments, too. The grad student is, in so many ways, a departmental serf.

Accordingly, the game is to expand one's graduate department to the greatest extent and still convince the government that the student quality is high, several schools now have well-organized recruitment drives that send professors (at public expense, as all university costs ultimately are) to various parts of the country to entice new graduate students. Until recently, it was even considered fair play to recruit foreign students (hence the very high proportion of Asian and African students in Ontario graduate schools); but the Ontario government yelled foul and refused to subsidize all foreign students, though a certain number are still allowed under various treaties and scholarship plans. Not all schools, or all departments in the schools that do, are guilty of these ploys, but the practice is sufficiently widespread to be disturbing. Another aspect of the recruitment game is to use a portion of the government grant to provide a subsidy for students. It is any wonder that the graduate school business is booming?

For all that, however, the schools do not go out of their way to make it easy to be a student. The popular image of the carefree grad student who would rather sit in the coffee shop than work is a depressingly unfunny joke.

A PhD degree involves a minimum of three years of university study following graduation with a bachelor's degree. More often, it works out to four or five years - and several of the physical sciences can require even longer depending on the progress of one's research. During that time, the course of study makes remarkably little provision for wine, women, and song (although no small number of grad students turn to the wine and related products as a means of maintaining their sanity).

The first year typically leads to a master's degree (an MA in arts or an MSc in sciences). Most master's degrees require five year-long courses of four courses and a thesis. The master's thesis is declining in favour among faculty (and was never particularly popular with students) because supervising a thesis is more demanding than teaching a course.

Very few people who are accepted into a master's program fail to earn the degree, so if you really want an MA, don't worry about the outcome. The catch is that the year is spent in weeding out those students who don't have what the faculty believes is necessary for a good PhD (generally a combination of a good analytical mind, the blind obedience of a dog, and a total lack of imagination). Imagine the thrill of writing an examination and knowing that the slightest slip means the end of one's scholastic career. Here they call it education but the Geneva Convention undoubtedly prohibits the use of such psychological warfare.

O.K. Perhaps you are one of the 30 to 40 per cent of the master's students who will be accepted into a PhD program. And here's where the real fun begins. The normal course requirements are two, and they are a formality - nobody ever fails a PhD level course. Offsetting this unusual show of compassion, however, North American universities have devised a cunning scheme known as comprehensive examinations (known far and wide as comps). And you haven't lived until you've written your comps.

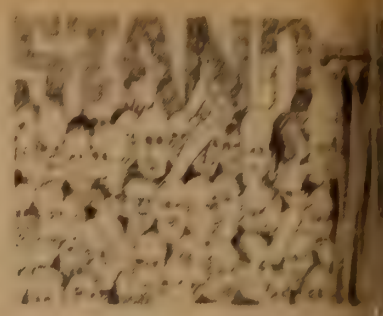
The idea is that, after seven years of university study beyond high school, the student is given a set of written and oral examinations that can cover anything in the student's field. Anyone who fails twice (and it is easy to fail solely because of mental pressures, despite a good understanding of one's field) is dismissed from the school. Liquor stores love comps because they increase business. Psychiatrists love comps for the same reason. Students hate comps.

After the course work and comps are completed only a thesis stands between you and the right to call yourself "Doctor" (and get phone calls in the middle of the night asking if you make house calls). What is a thesis? Nothing much, just "an original and important" contribution to the subject. What's important? Try a study of the Easter Island bettle nut industry.

But wait. The worst is yet to come. After all, you only spent a minimum of seven years in university because of the understanding that when you finished employers would be lining up with offers. Perhaps $1,500 a month to start, executive title liberal vacation and retirement allowance. Well, we've already settled that that isn't how it works anymore.

There have been instances of students who were offered jobs after completing their master's degrees. They declined, only to reapply for those same jobs after completing PhDs. The employers no longer were interested; "overtrained" is a very significant word for the PhD in today's world.

"Overtrained" is an ambiguous term with two meanings. On the one hand, it means most jobs would be too boring for the individual with the ability to obtain a doctorate (though, by foregoing doctorate training, anyone can cover up this undesirable excess of ability). Employers know that most PhDs become restless after a brief stay in most private-sector jobs, which are generally below their abilities. On the other hand, after seven or more years of constant studying and living on small incomes that do not allow for extensive social contacts, PhDs require no small amount of time to adjust to working with people.



So the PhD turns to the government and becomes a civil servant. (Question: is the government expanding rapidly just to absorb the amount of high-priced talent that it has trained?) But, even at the incredible rate at which government has been expanding, there are no longer enough jobs to go around. Once the government cannot accommodate any more PhDs, where will they go? To drive taxis? It is a very real possibility.

In the meantime, the students who are unsuccessful in the job market stay in school and stretch out their theses, living off the subsistence-level fellowship incomes. And wonder about a system that pays more for plumbers than doctorates.

A plea for anti-nation

by George Woodcock

Reprint from Canadian Forum April, 1972

Long ago the pioneer socialist Charles Fourier ("that bizarre genius" as Proudhon called him) posed an ideal transformation of society and of existence. Though he never used the phrase, he foresaw something resembling the Aquarian age which our contemporary oracles announce as imminent. A time would come, he declared, when all the evil in existence would be purged away, when the salt seas themselves would be transformed into a fluid as delicious and drinkable as lemonade, and beside the lamb would lie down those benevolent creatures, the anti-lion, the anti-tiger and the anti-wolf. I do not think many people other than Fourier believed in this Gallic version of The Peaceable Kingdom, but it is a naive and extraordinary parable, and regarded as a metaphor it contains the important truth, that every evil reveals by implication its opposing good. War makes inevitable the pacifist dream of a world without armies, government ensures the durability of the anarchist dream of a free society ruled by mutual aid, and the evils of the nation-state make inevitable the posing of the vision of the anti-nation as the necessary corrective. It is, I suggest, a vision particularly meaningful to Canadians at a time when, from the Left especially, they are being urged to accept nationalism as a solution.

Indeed, it is one of the paradoxes of the revolutionary tradition that in preaching the universality of man it has encouraged nationalism, and in preaching international liberation it has promoted imperalism. The French Revolution, in which the need to defend the frontiers fanned patriotism into nationalism, and in which the desire to spread the gospel of liberty ended in Napoleonic catastrophe, has been the classic example, followed during almost two centuries with amazing faithfulness. Under the impact of nationalism and imperialism, all the ideals cherished by the precursors of the Revolution vanished; liberty was destroyed by the invention of universal conscription, fraternity by the liquidation of the Girondins, equality by the creation of a new class of fonctionnaires from which France suffers to this day. It was a society very different from the small and simple democratic communities of which Jean Jacques Rousseau had once dreamed. It was bred of a collective paranoia, the psychosis that creates aggressiveness out of a sense of persecution, and its almost inevitable result was the transformation of France into a predatory nation, crazed with an incurable undulating sickness named la gloire which recurs at intervals and at present is manifesting itself in a systematic defiance of world public opinion through the continued experimentation with atom bombs in the South Pacific.

It was by inheritance from the French Revolution that one of the persistent elements in the revolutionary tradition of the 19th century became an equivocal relationship between nationalism and the movements of the socialist left. In 1848 no cause was more popular among revolutionaires throughout Europe than that of Polish independence, despite the fact that most of the Polish nationalists were aristocratic reationaries, and when Proudhon called in question in his classic writings on federalism this bizarre alliance, he was almost ostracised by the left of his time. Beneath the resounding ideological battles of the First and Second International, national rivalries played their part, Bakunin's Francophilism competing with Marx's Germanism and neither accepted by British chapel socialism, and the fact that these national inclinations were more than skin deep was to be shown not only by the lining up of the mass socialist and labour parties behind their respective militarists in World War I, but also by the way in which, once socialists and communists eventually came to power, they developed into nationalists as extreme as any Tory xenophobe. Lenin, carried through Germany in the sealed train as if the virus of internationalism he bore would otherwise infect the whole of central Europe, established a regime that under his successors has proved as nationalist as the France of Robespierre, as imperialist as the Britain of Disraeli. Only the anarchists (for Bakunin was an exception in this) and a few socialists on the libertarian left like Rosa Luxemburg, consistently preserved the internationalism that the whole of the left at various times has claimed. Now, in 1972, half mankind lives under communist or social governments, yet the world republic of the working class, of which we talked so much in the thirties, is still far off when Israelis and Arabs who call themselves socialists hate each other as fervently of Czechs and Russians who call themselves communists.

The cult of the nation has in fact become more rather than less widespread than it was in the 1930's, and no less dangerous. With the breakup of the empires, we have more nations than ever, and most of them are militaristic, bureaucratic, undemocratic, xenophobic, and more inclined to spend their resources on war materials and such symbols of national vanity as unnecessary airlines than on developing their countries or raising the living standards of their populations. Today it is not so much the danger of wars of conquest that these proliferating states present, though there is always the chance that some petty dictator's dream of glory may start us down the slide towards global conflict. However, most of the new nations find blackmail more profitable than war as a means of self-aggrandisement, and the real danger to humanity is that in the crucial quarter of a century that lies ahead of us these intransigent sovereignties will make it difficult to establish any viable worldwide programme for population and pollution control and for the intelligent use of the world's resources.

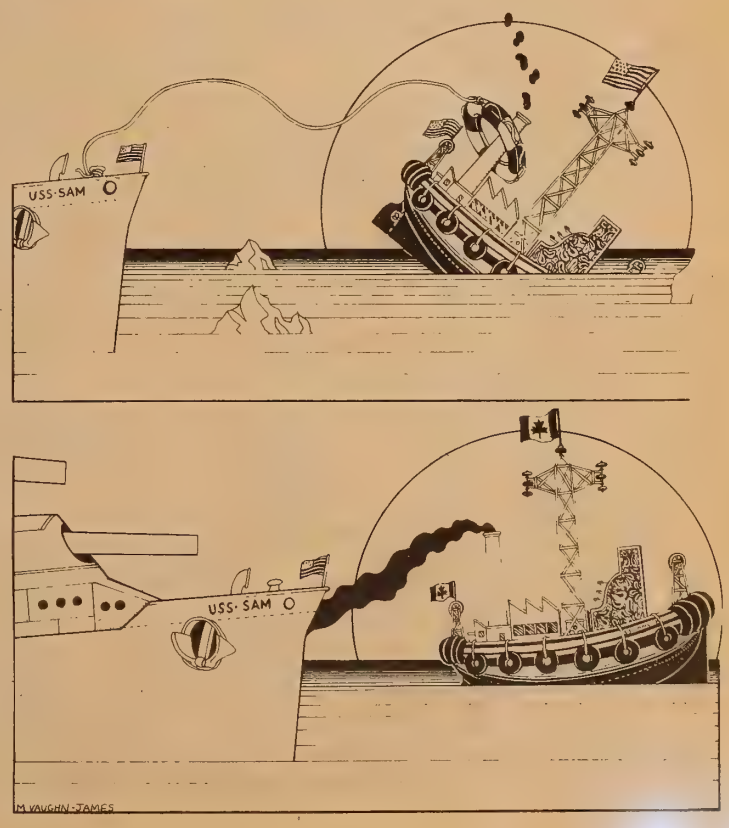
federalism, and here Canada has the kind of start that an ill-considered exercise in centralization would merely ruin. Already, in name, Canada is a federation, not a nation, and this fact, which has survived the efforts of centralizers ever since the days of Sir John A. Macdonald, reflects a realization of our country's destiny to which, almost against their wills, the Fathers of Confederation had to bow. Our geography, dominated by the Shield and the Cordillera, is no more conductive to bureaucratic centralism than the Russian steppes and the wastes of Siberia, while our history (in which unity appears only as a reaction to the American threat) favours the development of a diffuse political pattern, divorced from the imperative of power and made strongly independent by the extension of the federal principle, which is also the participatory principle, to the most basic levels. I believe that Canada, more than any other country in the world today, can develop in a revolutionary way the experiment of Switzerland, which was aborted when the French Revolution diverted attention away from federalism to radical nationalism. We are among the few peoples who still have time to avoid the fever of nationalism and to create the anti-nation, a society open within because it is fully participatory, and open towards the world, inclusive and not exclusive, a society which other countries, under the spur of disaster, may find an example worth the imitation.

Merely to sketch such a Canadian society in its entirety would take a book, and one day I may write it, drawing on the neglected federalist tradition, on Kropotkin and Proudhon, on Geddes and Morris, on the Spanish communes and the early kibbutzin, on the Peckham experiment and the direct democracy of Appenzell, on Gandhi's insights into rural reconstruction and Mimford's into the regeneration of cities, and bringing all these untried libertarian visions together in the setting of a country whose physical realities would make it an inevitable failure as a nation-state - Canada.

In concrete terms - and in brief - I propose a hastening of decentralization, a rigorous devolution of power, a universalization of the concept of responsibility. I propose that we abandon the image of the pyramid in thinking of society, and substitute that of a mosaic, where the pieces create patterns which are more than themselves, but the patterns remain on the same level as the pieces. In these terms, the Canadian type of federalism, a two-level structure of dominion and provincial governments, with little constitutional link between them, is quite inadequate. This is why all the talk of new constitutions, and of confirming Canadian independence by patriating the BNA Act is irrelevant. There is a potent relevance, on the other hand, in Proudhon's remark when he cast a solitary vote in France of 1848. "I vote against the constitution because it is a constitution." For above all other characteristics, the society of the future must be based on voluntary decisions, and hence it must be liable to perpetual revision.

This means a more varied and flexible kind of social and political organization than we have known before, an organization whose very suppleness will make it better adapted to deal with the threats of technological change than the present rigid organizations. This makes it difficult to sketch in blueprint detail because it will emerge largely as a reaction against changing technological threats to a rational existence. However, there are certain basic requirements that can be laid down. The starting point of organization would be as far as possible from the national level: in those places where men meet face to face, the shop, the street, the office, the college, the village. This immediately implies the economic consequence of true federalism, which is the control by a community of producers over their means of work, though not ultimately over the destination of the product, for here the locality associations, the groups of residents embrace the producers in their role as consumers.



Beyond this level one can see certain peculiar Canadian conditions imposing themselves on organization, especially distance and regional differences. At the point where the locality groups, the producers' groups, the factories run by guilds of workers, coalesced into municipalities or rural area associations, there would probably be little difficulty, since these would merely be more participatory forms of existing organizations, concerned largely with municipal affairs and education, though involving themselves in the co-ordination of distribution. But at the point of regional coalescence it is obvious that there would have to be a radical change in the Canadian political structure in the direction of decentralization. The provinces as now constituted are far too unwieldy to be responsive to the day-to-day needs and demands of a socialized community, and their electoral patterns create unnecessary clashes of interest. A small province like Prince Edward Island may be fairly homogeneous, but even in Nova Scotia there are obvious conflicts between the interests of Halifax people and country people, and between those of Cape Breton and the rest of the province. The intolerable situations of Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver, harnessed to provinces whose governments are dominated by rural and small town interests, is equally obvious, and perhaps the most urgent step of all in making Canadian federalism a reality would be the creation of five free cities (the three I have mentioned plus Ottawa and Winnipeg) of provincial status and the devolution of the provinces into federations of regions determined by geographical and economic interests. This would encourage the emergence of rural nuclei of activity which would provide a counter-attraction to the cities and perhaps slow the space of metropolitan growth.

Within this structure, the principle to follow would be the minimization of remote control coupled with the maximization of responsibility through participation. In other words any decision of any kind that affects only a local group must be reached by that group alone and by consensus if possible. District and regional boards would consist of elected delegates, subject to immediate recall if they act against the obvious wishes of their constituents. (To give only one example, such a provision would have prevented Mayor Campbell from recently defying the wishes of the city people on the issue of the Four Seasons development.) Beyond that level, provincial and federal assemblies would be elected under similar provisions, which should greatly trim the arrogance of political leaders, and, to ensure the prompt response to rapidly changing social needs that is essential in our era, the referendum and the initiative would be brought into all levels of government.

The great advantage of such a system is that, by creating multiple levels of responsibility, all related directly to the basic level through the possibility of popular votes on all important issues, it produces a deeper participation, and while it is impossible to conveive that all conflict of interest will be eliminated, the socialization of the sources of wealth would be likely to reduce them. It will be objected that federalism which begins by encouraging the most local of interests may disintegrate into parochialism, but my experience is that once people begin to take any interest at all in political or social affairs, their horizons soon spread beyond their narrow personal interests, and, since national prejudice can hardly be strong in a country where the central super-structure is minimal and where political mythologies are discouraged, the chances of honest international co-operation based on a sense of world-responsibility are more hopeful among countries than among nation-states.

A more important objection to my suggestions is obviously that based on the certainty of a lowering of material prosperity. It has been one of the unfortunate aspects of the progress syndrome in socialists and communists that they have been unable to conceive a better society except in terms of higher and higher living for more and more people, an eventuality which the steady depletion of the world's resources renders impossible. The anarchists have always been more realistic in this respect. Long before the pundits of the counter culture, they made a virtue of returning to a simpler existence where work would be done for joy rather than money and, in that dignified poverty which Proudhon and Paul Goodman extolled, things of the spirit and mind would have more importance than material wealth. Some such consolation we shall all have to accept in any case if we ever embark on the course of making ourselves economically independent of the United States. We shall have to reverse the direction of technology, to use it for the simplification rather than the complication of production, for the reduction in size of manufacturing units and power grids, for the recycling of materials and the use of renewable forms of energy, like sunshine and the tides. (I doubt if we shall have to go back to the horse-plough and the abacus, though that would do us no harm.) All this retrenchment will be easier if we have abandoned the habit of seeing such things, in imitation of the Americans, on a megalomaniac national scale. It will also be easier then to admit that what we have in abundance is land and water, that in a country like Canada the encouragement of the trend towards urbanization has been an aberration, and that industrialization is no solution in rural areas where the need is to bring the lost farmlands back into cultivation and restore the balance of existence between town and country.

What, after all, are our alternatives at this crossroads of destiny where Canada now stands: With improbable luck, we can allow nationalism to harden our country into a single centralized and authoritarian state that will enter the suicidal competition of the existing nations for space and resources. It is more likely, however, that a policy of nationalism will result not in one, but in two such states, plagued by the kind of conflict that has wracked the Indian continent for a generation. But a genuine federalism - unlike the disguised statism of Trudeau - would stand a chance of retaining Quebec as an autonomous constituent region, and on Quebec's own terms. Federalism is the one way in which we can turn to advantage the very factors of cutlural and geographical diffusion that tell against us as a national state. After all, the Swiss succeeded in keeping themselves together with four languages and cultures; they did so by refusing to accept the temptations of nationalism. But they never became the complete anti-nation. And that leaves it for Canada to create the proto-type of the post-nationalist world.

Williams, Loyola plan merger

CUP — Representatives from Sir George Williams University and Loyola College announced on Sept. 21 that they had approved the proposal which would merge the two institutions by September 1973.

The plan proposes two joint faculties of commerce and administration, and engineering; faculties of arts and science for Sir George; and a faculty of Loyola College with programmes in arts and science.

The fact that Loyola would be restricted to a majors programme in science aroused opposition from its science professors who demanded that the college retain its honours science programme, for the sake of a maintenance of "excellence". The objection was overruled for the sake of the merger.

The merger proposal still must be approved by the governing bodies of the two universities and by the Quebec government.

Loyola president Father Patrick Malone said that he expects "there will be loud rumblings, loud and clear within the next three weeks", but indications are the plans will be approved.

It is expected that any opposition will be easily diffused by administrations which have never been sympathetic to student demands of faculty activism.

He'd rather close universities

CUP — The Ontario government will close down universities rather than retreat from fee increases under pressure of a tuition strike, colleges and universities minister George Kerr said Sept. 21.

When speaking to about 200 York University students, Kerr accused many full-time student politicians of organizing the fee strike "to justify their jobs." He accused them of making "inaccurate" statements about government education policy.

Kerr said that the provincial government is "adopting a philosophy whereby the users of the university should pay more of its cost." He claimed that the fee increases would better balance the sources of university funding, adding that the taxpayer now supports 80 percent of university expenditures, the students only 15 percent.

Kerr criticized the OFS claim that the tuition hike would hinder universal accessibility to higher education. He pointed out that despite the fee increase university enrolment across the province was up 4.5 per cent and that there have been more applications for student aid this year.

Toronto students stand trial

CUP — Conflicts have emerged in the testimonies of officials appearing at the trials of four persons arrested when Toronto police ended an occupation of the University of Toronto's administration building last March.

Acting president of U of T at the time, Jack Sword said that he authorized the use of metro and campus police to end the occupation, which had been protesting a restricted access policy to the new Robarts library.

He said that he had made it clear that the occupants were not to be considered trespassers. They were simply to be evicted after warning had been given.

Instead 19 people were charged for trespassing. These charges were later dropped when a second and larger occupation forced the administrators to concede to student demands. Four persons remained charged with the more serious offences of assaulting or obstructing police.

Sword told the court on Sept. 26 that when he gave the eviction order he did not believe the occupiers would be considered trespassers. However, U of T chief security officer Gordon Huff testified that the chief campus safety and security officer J. F. Westhead's instructions to him led him to assume the occupiers were trespassers.

Westhead said that there had been a warning to demonstrators to leave but that it might not have been heard in the noise and confusion. He had interpreted his instructions to mean that those who remained would be removed by police, arrested and charged with trespassing.The question now is: Were they trespassing or not? The court has adjourned until Nov. 12.

How the AMS spends your money

The total AMS budget this year is $69,130, up from last year. Nearly three-quarters of the revenue is drawn from AMS fees. The rest comes from Dunning flicks, the pub, the hoods and gown services, Tricolour '72 and an AOSC rebate of $1500.

General expenditures amount to $29,400. This includes honoraria, salaries to full-time employees, as well as legal and office expenses. The president and vice-president received salaries for their work this summer and get $750 and $500 respectively in honoraria for the rest of the year.

The five AMS commissioners spend a total of $38,924. This includes Internal Affairs expenditures of $13,180, Services $11,000, Campus Activities $4,225, External Affairs $3,684 and Education Commission $7,035.

Hildi Adelhelm, assistant education commissioner, asked for additional financial support for Festival '73 at the AMS meeting last week.

The request was denied as cuts had been made in certain areas in order to balance the budget.

At present there is $806 left in contingency.

Listen to your world

This may all seem to be a bit of a set-up. Consider - here we have two records on the block, both of which just so happen to belong to artists you'll get a chance to see before the wrath of winter descends on our lovely little village, if you so desire. Consider again - concert committee hires dupe, of questionable moral character to extol the flawless genius of said acts, convincing multitudes of "undecideds" to dash out and pick up a ticket to the next concert. Ah, not so, not so. Actually, you may be curious as to what you're getting into musically, in purchasing a record by these people, as they are relatively unfamiliar artists to at least a number of us. So let's give it a shot and see if I got burnt or not, on either of these albums, shall we?

Malo - Warner Bros. (BS2584))

Apart from being blessed with probably the most attractive cover design produced in a long while (perfectly virile warrior - Hunter cradle's adoring nymphet in his arms - a sigh and a shiver) Malo is one Jorge Santana - brother of one Carlos Santana, who has a band of his own. Jorge is all of 18, but he handles lead guitar with an authority well beyond his years.

Of the 10 members of Malo, most grew up in San Francisco's Mission district, a predominantly Chicano-Black Ghetto, and most began their respective musical careers early. Band members come to Malo by way of several varied San Francisco based groups - Jorge's Malibus, Janis Joplin's Kozmic Blues Band, Soul Sacrifice, Naked Lunch --- among others. They bring to Malo a history of Latin Jazz flavoured with soul and laced with tight, hard rock.

The obvious comparison is of course to be made with Santana. Both are Latin rock bands and both feature equally nifty lead work by the Santana Brothers, respectively. Malo comes off as a more fluid band in general, however, partly because of a greater emphasis on vocals and vocal harmonies (giving much of the album, and particularly the album's current hit single "Suavecito", a beautifully pleasant, slick, nightclubby type of tune, a very smooth quality) and partly because of a tight horn section led by trumpeter Luis Gasca, which Santana could just never match. Result, here we have a group of Latins who could pop conga's with Santana anytime.

There are but six cuts on the album, all solid, all enjoyable.

The album is simply, "Malo"; it's on Warner Bros. and I'll wager it's 45 minutes of the nicest stuff you'll come across in the next little while.

Mark-Almond II Blue Thumb (BTS32)

This one I got burnt on.

My feelings here, no doubt, arise out of my musical prejudices - I object to having to project myself into the fantasies of the musician rather than being able to absorb music into the realm of my own experience. Relating to music is an important concept, just as it is in literature, theatre, and most any other form of art. The self-indulgence of the Mark-Almond Band limits any personal involvement in their music and thus leaves one, ultimately, with a rather "incomplete" feeling upon hearing the album.

With the possible exception of "Friends" the last cut on side "A" (in which Jon Mark laments as his friends "dream their lives away" think of the past - it is a very folky, well handled number) I come away relatively unimpressed.

Ah, but surely my inability to transcend my own dismal existence in order to appreciate Mark - Almond's obvious intellectuall approach to their music is but a function of my ignorance. And surely such an "intellectual" approach to music, as opposed to an "entertainer's" approach (i.e. exemplified in purest from by, Blood, Sweat and Tears doing "You made me feel so very happy" - or by Shanana doing just about anything) is a worthwhile pursuit which demands a high degree of ability and musical creativity. The members of Mark-Almond possess remarkable talent. They are highly creative in fact, excellent musicians. There is great difficulty to be encountered in trying to project oneself to the level of "musical consciousness" aspired to by the band - consequently, the album comes off as somewhat exasperating and-or boring.

The group consists of Jon Mark - leadsinger-Lyricist, classical guitarist; John Almond - soprano, alto, and baritone sax, vibes, alto and bass flute, and vocal harmonies; Tommy Eyre-pianist and vocal harmonies; Roger Sutton - bass, second vocals; and percussionist Dannie Richmond. The music is a rather unique blend of Jazz, Blues, Rock, Classical, and Soul, and each member has had extensive musical training. (Tommy Eyre can sight read Bartok and Ligeti pieces and played at one time with Joe Cocker's Grease Band. Unique blend, to say the least...

The first Mark-Almond Album revolves around the concert of the city, with all its wonderful trimmings. The despair of the ghetto and the meaninglessness of urban society is handled admirably well. Mark-Almond II deals with the country and speaks of the harmony to be found in a "Journey through New England" specifically, as opposed to the blues of the city. It is well done, and Mark-Almond is musically speaking, an excellent group. Maybe you'll have better luck with it than I did. .

Keep in Touch,
Slip Mahony

Cheech and Chong Disconcert

by S. Wilson

Beginning with a dazzling Neil Young - type rocker, Lorence Hud sank into a Shondells' routine and soon outgrew his welcome. By the middle of his set he was indistinguishable from a transistor radio. I desperately wanted to turn him off. At first I had admired his group's tight rhythm and instrumental control but I quickly realized that what they were playing was no more than the automatic, slickly commercial music of Boss 40 genre. What was more, they were happy to leave it that way. No trace of spontaneity existed as Hud clumsily riveted himself to the keyboard or signalled to his drummer to continue the unchanging beat. At least Hud had the condolence that his 45's would soon be making him a mint. Maybe that's why he looked so comfortable beneath the dollar-green spotlight.

I laughed alot at Cheech and Chong but I wasn't sure I really wanted to. I wondered how many of the people around me felt the same way. Sure they were funny but after an hour and a half of chemical jokes, stoned bleary - eyed Cheeches, TV commercials, greasers and imitations of dogs going at it on stage my head started to hurt just a bit too much. But still at the end the Canadian duet got a standing ovation. How come? Why do we always have to show our approval en masse? Maybe the continuous barrage of unpleasant words and images had desensitized our usual aversion to that sort of humour.

But sometimes Cheech and Chong showed just a bit too much originality and wit. When they did we became consciously and individually unsettled. It seemed that many of their comments were a little too pointed to hit us without sticking in. Were they teasing their audience with the spoof of the television game show or trying to impress upon us the sordidness and desperation of the North American drug cult with their many portrayals of dope devastated kids? Maybe if they had we would have been a bit more reserved with our standing ovations.

by Peter Watts

With the Bews program well underway now, I would like to get one point straightened out before it gets worse. To date, about eight events have begun on the program. In only two cases has this reporter been given any results.

It is imperative that convenors and league supervisors keep scores, results, and standings up to date and report them to the Publicity Office. Only in that way can Queen's men be properly informed about what's happening athletically and how their year is doing in relation to the rest of the teams. All information should be directed to the Publicity Office, Room 102A, Physical Education Centre. "PLEASE!", I would like a report about each league on Monday morning. It is not a job which takes a lot of time and it is extremely important.

The Finals in Monsterball and Tug-o-War were held at the Outer last Thursday and Civil and Math won both events. The Monsterball Tournament, however, nearly sparked a riot before it was over and Bews director, Bob Carnegie told me that the sport will have to be closely re-evaluated before next season.

The indoor softball season got underway Monday night and in the first games the scores were: Electrical Engineering 12, Mechanical Engineering 10, Medicine 11, Mining Engineering 4, and Commerce '76 by default over Education. Tuesday night saw Science '76 defeat Commerce '75 9-6 and Arts '73 beat Chemical Engineering 5-3.

In Golf, while the team champion has been decided, the individual title is still up for grabs. At present, there are eight players trying for top individual honours. The quarter-finals must be completed by October 12 and the semi-finals by October 19. The winner should be decided by October 26.

In Tennis, the first round matches have been posted on the bulletin board in the locker room of the Physical Education Centre. Sheets for Tennis doubles are now available and entries close next Wednesday, October 11. Entries also close for inter-faculty softball, Volleyball, paddleball and harrier next Wednesday. The deadline is noon, and no entries will be accepted after that time.

Entries close today for the track and field events. They will be held next Wednesday, October 11, beginning at 7:00 p.m. at the West Campus.

Entries for other Bews events will be due later this month. These sports include hockey, paddleball, squash and innertube waterpolo. All students are reminded that lists are posted on the locker room boards and they should be consulted two or three times a week. This applies particularly to students interested in team events.

As well as this column which appears weekly in the Journal, Queen's radio station carries two programs which should be of interest to all Queen's students. One is College Sport Today - a program devoted to news and views about the intramural programs for both men and women, and about the athletic clubs on the campus.

This program may be heard Thursday evenings at 7:15 p.m. The other show is Sunday Sports Roundup - a new program which premieres this Sunday, October 8 at 7:30 p.m. This show will be devoted to summaries of the week-end's activities.

From the sidelines...

by Chris Boon

With most intercollegiate sports now well under way, the situation for Queen's teams looks a little confused. Soccer appears to have found the scoring touch after a shaky start, having defeated R.M.C. 4-1 and Trent 3-1 last week; this Saturday's match with Ryerson could be a big one for Queen's. The game is set for 4:00 p.m. at west campus.

Track also looks to be off on the right foot, with Dave Jarvis and Hugh Fraser providing a great one-two punch in the track events. The field men are looking deeper than in recent years, too; sophs John Ongarato and Axel Becke provide the Gaels with reliable point-getters in shot, discus, and the long jump, while Don Price can get points both as a hurdler and high-jumper.

Veteran Brian Aiken is another clutch performer in the middle distances, and the mile relay team will be strong again. This could be Queen's year in outdoor track!

Football and rugger, on the other hand, have some adjustments to make. The rugger Gaels apparently played like a bunch of distrustful recent aquaintances in their 10-0 defeat by York, and their effort Wednesday night against R.M.C. resembled a bad accident more than the well-coordinated machine that Queen's has been famous for.

On several occasions, the Gaels had worked the ball in close, only to lose the scoring opportunity through thoughtless play by individuals who seemed to ignore the abilities of their teammates. Things have to change here, and soon.

The football Gaels have to rebound from their 46-18 beating by U. of T. Some of the wounds here may be more psychological than physical, although Gord McLellan is a very doubtful prospect for the next couple of games.

Dave Hadden may be back, though, and the Gaels offence could use his hard running

Look for some more passing by the Gaels this Saturday....Lang, Hollingsworth, Melvin, Waddell, and the backfielders are all good pass-catchers, and last week's lesson is clear: running alone is not enough, unless teams have to respect your passing game. Toronto didn't.

The women are also moving along, with field hockey and archery recovering from a narrow escape on the weekend. The archers look like they could be in line for a better showing than in recent years, and if field hockey can get the experience in a hurry, the talent to win in the OWIAA is certainly there.

Tennis also comes up this weekend, with the Gals competing in the western regionals at Guelph. Queen's host the OWIAA finals next weekend, so there will be some quality action coming up for the raquet fans in the crowd.

Finally, a prediction on Saturday's football game: look for the Gaels to win by 10 points or more---- with the defense doing a good job in maintaining the record of the Ravens' offense (so far, they've scored 6 points in three games). I better be right - I'm still sore from last week.

Words from W.I.C.

by Susanna Trebuss

The W.I.C. program got underway this week with Basketball, badminton and tennis. The basketball tournament started Tuesday night in the Ross Gym, with Badminton getting under way on Thursday, Tennis entries closed Tuesday,; a one-day tournament will be held on Sunday, October 8th, from 12 noon onward.

Although it is still early in the season, now is the time for years to start building up points! So, why not find a sport which you enjoy, and come out to support your faculty and year.

CULTIVATE US FOR DIAMOND ADVICE

Don't despair if your diamond knowledge is sparse. Diamonds are measured in carat weight. The more carats, the bigger the diamond. But a large diamond isn't necessarily the finest. You must be sure it is clear and expertly cut. But what you really need to know . . . is a reputable jeweler. You can trust his knowledge of diamonds, and his pledge to advise and satisfy you.

Rugby 1sts drop another; seconds win big vs. R.M.C.

The Queen's rubgy 1st XV dropped its second game of the young OUAA season Wednesday night, losing 11-3 to local rival R.M.C. The Gaels were plauged by a lack of teamwork on the part of the backs, and some half-hearted efforts by the Queen's forwards. The Gaels were also guilty of repeated unnecessary infractions that cost them scoring chances. R.M.C. twice scored on interceptions that came through careless ball-handling, and added a penalty kick to make the score 11-3.

Queen's only points came on a penalty goal by Dave Murley. Put bluntly, the Gaels are anything but a cohesive team. If they continue to play as they have to date, it will be a long season indeed. Fortunately, the 2nd XV appear to be on better terms with each other than their senior counterparts. They dumped R.M.C. 28-0, dominating the Redmen with brutal tackling, especially by Kees Kort, and some heads-up play by Allan Frizzell on the line-outs.

Phil Hamilton, Bill Warburton and Gord Wyatt scored four tries for the Gaels, while Ron Easteal kicked two lovely drop-goals and converted three of the tries. Several of the seconds appear to be worthy of promotion based on the results of the Wednesday games; if the Gaels fail to defeat Trent this weekend, they will have their backs to the wall. Queen's rugby is on hard times indeed!

Waterpolo Opens Season Here Saturday

Queen's waterpolo team, under the able guidance Simon Beitler, will open their 1972-73 season here this Saturday, hosting an Invitational tournament with four visiting squads. Although Gord Hurd, last season's leading scorer and team MVP, had graduated, and regular defenseman Brian Warren is expected to miss the OUAA season with injuries suffered in an automobile accident, the Gaels should be stronger again this season.

Jack Muir, a member of the Queen's swim team last year, is expected to add speed and endurance to the Gaels' attack and the presence of two transfers, Richard Zajchowski from McGill and Tomasz Kasprzxk of McMaster, should give the Gaels the veteran poise needed to win in league competition.

As well, five veterans return from the squad that finished 5th in the Canadian Waterpolo Championships last spring; they are Archie Nesbitt, Dave Howard, George Craig, Tom Kewen, and Steve Patterson.

The Gaels' first league competition comes on Saturday, October 14, in a round-robin tournament with York and U. of T., to be held at the York pool. The same three teams play at Queen's the following weekend.

Field Hockey Gals Split

by Sue Moffit

Not easily discouraged by a few mishaps (and minor injuries) suffered en route, Queen's field hockey teams went on to play in Guelph's Invitational tournament last Saturday. Both the Senior and Intermediate teams competed for Queen's, although Guelph and Waterloo fielded only senior squads.

Despite this disparity in experience, the Intermediate gals aquitted themselves reasonably well, losing 4-0 to Waterloo, but holding Guelph seniors to a slim 2-0 victory in a game played under cold, windy and wet conditions.

Meanwhile, the senior team enjoyed mixed success, defeating Guelph 6-0, then losing 2-1 to Waterloo in a game that was terminated in the second half "at the coaches' discretion."

This years' senior squad is a young, aggressive team with excellent overall speed, and the first game showed it. Centre-forward Karen Carson, last year's leading scorer, potted two goals, as did newcomer Sue Moffit.

Laney Marshall, another of Donna Gallagher's prize rookies, scored once, and Gail McLeod, a McArthur student who played (and played well) for McMaster last year added the last Queen's marker. Goalie Pat Jamieson, who may be the league's best, played a very steady game for the Gals.

Against Waterloo, the events of the weekend appeared to catch up with the Gals, aided and abetted by the weather; Gail McLeod scored the lone Queen's goal before the game was called.

Queen's hosts an invitational Field Hockey tournament here October 14, with teams from McGill, Ottawa U., New York University, and U. de Montreal.

The games will be played at the west campus field, so if you have managed to wend your way back from the Ottawa U. blast Friday night, drop out to watch some high-speed action on the turf.

Men's Field Hockey: A Coming Thing

by Nada Bogdanovic

Have you ever seen people playing a soccer game armed with hockey sticks? Well in the near future you may. Queen's could have a crack at winning yet another O.U.A.A. championship - men's field hockey.

With the aid of Donna Gallagher, coach of the women's field hockey team, Brian Groos and Mike Barclay, natives of Victoria B.C., bravely intend to try and organize a Queen's club.

With practices planned for the fall and winter, exhibition games and possibly competition within a city league may be arranged for the next spring and summer.

If a sufficiently large and enthusiastic group of intended athletes can be attracted, men's field hockey can be adopted as an O.U.A.A. sport within a year or two.

Brian and Mike's experience in the sport should be a great asset in the organization and the formation of the club. Both have played on well known teams in the Vancouver area.

The calibre of field hockey out west is high; some of their former teammates are now members of the Canadian national team.

It takes people with interest and willing to work in order for the idea to become reality. So get involved, stay in shape and help make Queen's athletic program a really comprehensive one!

Canada: Trudeau in Kingston today

KINGSTON — Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau will be arriving here today to support Dr. John Hazlett, Liberal candidate for Kingston and the Islands. Trudeau will be arriving at Norman Roger's Airport from Ottawa at eleven a.m. and there will be a motorcade along King and Montreal Streets to CKWS radio and television station on Queen. While there Hazlett and Trudeau will tape a television interview and take part in an openline radio show between twelve and one p.m. Trudeau will then return to the airport.

REGINA — William Kashtan, leader of the Communist Party of Canada has announced his party's platform for the upcoming federal election. He has put out a call for Canadian economic control through public ownership, national unity through an equal partnership between English and French speaking Canadians, major economic reforms to produce full employment without inflation, and a "genuine redistribution of national income".

McLENNAN, ALBERTA — Three candidates representing the same movement filed nomination papers in the Peace River constituency. There will be no political affiliation for them on the ballot, but they claim to be members of a Revolutionary Political Movement.

TORONTO — Dr. Istvan Meszros, the professor hired by York University, but held up in Canadian customs for his socialist political beliefs, has rejected a special permit from Innigration Minister Bryce Mackasey. The permit would have allowed him to work in Canada for a period of one year on the condition that he withdraw his application for an immigration visa. According to Dr. Meszros, the permit is discretionary and could be withdrawn at any time. The permit also does not acknowledge that the Canadian government no longer considers him a security risk, the original reason given for not allowing him to enter.

KLEINBURG, ONT. — A. Y. Jackson, the only living member of the original group of seven, famed Canadian painters, celebrated his ninetieth birthday on Tuesday. He stated that he is still looking forward to his hundredth.

VANCOUVER — The Western Canada Party has nominated three candidates to run lower British Columbia mainland ridings. The candidates, according to national secretary Brian Lemburg, himself a candidate, will be running on a platform of public transit improvement, better grain shipments and overhaul of the fishing and fisheries industry.

Behind the Lines

by Bob Mutrie

It seems like a vicious circle. Uganda is presently negotiating a resolution to its conflict with Tanzania after weeks of fighting and months of bad feeling. Israel and Lebanon are observing an uneasy peace after the former's retaliatory raids to force out the Black Septembrist guerilla movement which claimed responsibility for the slaying of eleven Israeli athletes at the Olympic Games in Munich. India is observing a ceasefire with Pakistan after the latter moved three hundred yards into India's Kashmir province. And now the Yemen Arab Republic and the People's Republic of Yemen are going through border raids, bombings, accusations, counter-accusations, threats of aggression and denials of aggression.

Can it end? Is it possible for the globe to exist in a state of peace and discourage or even ban arms buildups? As long as one nation continues to force its presence on another and looks egotistically for aggrandizement at the expense of the other, which is itself an entity with a right to govern its peoples, peace cannot be possible. Nations which are being aggressed against, themselves love their own sovereignty too much and even have their own dreams of aggrandizement to allow subjugation to an alien power.

The world's nations seem to be a group of children who need advice and occasional direction from an understanding but firm and knowledgeable parent. Unfortunately this guiding presence has not been provided and the world has been left to wander aimlessly under the direction of a few hundred very individual polititians and rulers with few, if any ties of common interests.

However, there is another side to world events which has finally blossomed during the 1970's and this year especially and in this phenomenon there may be real hope for tomorrow. More and more small groups and whole nations which exhibit a common interest on one or many fronts are coming together to resolve disputes and assist each other's development.

This feeling was given expression by Premier Mobuto Sese Seko of Zaire who has just embarked on a peace mission to Uganda. He told reporters in Kampala, "As you know, we are Africans. . .We know that when two brothers are fighting, it is no use pouring more oil on the fire". It is this reference to brothers and this knowledge of the values of brotherhood which many nations are embrasing to avoid a headlong fall into world chaos. Not only has the Uganda-Tanzania conflict received attention from Zaire but also from Somalia, whose president drafted the peace proposal for the two countries, and the Sudan where the negotiations are to be held.

This movement toward brotherhoods of nations is also finding expression in the Yemeni conflict, as a five nation councilliation commission, including Egypt and Kuwait, set out from Cairo to the conflict area to try and resolve the dispute. This use of friendship to promote peace and compromise among a common group of countries may yet convince the world that there is an alternative to open conflict. The examples are many, if you consider the work of such diverse organizations as the European Common Market, the International Monetary Fund, NATO, and the British Commenwealth of Nations to name a few. For each of these groups in some form or other express President Mobuto's feelings and belief in brotherhood, and as long as this exists hope for peace may also exist.

World: Danes join ECM

COPENHAGEN — Denmark is to become the newest member of the European Common Market as the referendum put to the people received the approval of 57 per cent of the total electorate. The fate of the accession proposal was left in doubt right up to the actual counting of the ballots as over twenty percent of the populace were as yet undecided. Denmark's special contribution to the Community is its spectacularly productive agriculture which produces food for 15 million people, and her light industry which exhibits a high level of technology.

The accession vote was considered to be a major political victory for Premier Jens Otto Krag and his Social Democratic Party. Krag stated that he had been looking for an opportunity to leave office and that now he is planning to retire after more than ten years of active politics, seven of them as premier.

The accession move is expected to create new problems for Norway, who after turning down ECM entry, had hoped to form an economic union of the Scandinavian countries.

BEIRUT — North Yemen (The Arab Republic of Yemen) has confirmed the loss of a border town to South Yemen (The People's Democratic Republic of Yemen) in a six day border dispute in the ill-defined mountainous border regions. Both sides are accusing the other of bombing raids and ground force movements. North Yemen has claimed that it has ordered only defensive action and no attacks on the neighbouring state, but South Yemen claims that the northern state is attacking with ground troops and claims that four of their villages have been occupied.

The ruling National Liberation Front in South Yemen claims that the raids are the effort of its political opponents who are living in selfimposed exile and that Saudi Arabia and even Britain were aiding them. The neighbouring Sultanate of Oman has been fighting with South Yemen, employing British officers and using British trained troops, for sometime.

South Yemen has put out a proposal for a ceasefire to North Yemen, but the latter state has declared that they will not observe such a proposal until they recover the fallen border town.

Egypt and Kuwait have expressed concern and with representatives from three other states are sending a delegation to the conflict area to try and resolve the dispute.

WASHINGTON — The second gallop pole to be conducted during the presidential campaign has shown that Senator George McGovern, the Democratic candidate, has narrowed President Richard Nixon's lead in the race. In his first inroad on the popularity of Nixon, McGovern has narrowed the lead from 34 per cent to 28 per cent. The pickup is attributed to his launching of a national television campaign. McGovern has stated that he will announce shortly his plans for ending the war in Vietnam.

WARSAW — The average Polish worker will have to pay almost a month's wages to have a telephone installed, double what it cost before the government increased the rates. There are presently 450,000 Poles waiting to have them installed. The price hike to an equivalent of $99 was attributed to a streamlining of the nation's communications system in order to cut the waiting time from the present eight years.

NEW DELHI — The commanders of the Indian and Pakistani armies have agreed to observe a ceasefire in India's northern Kashmir province after Pakistani troops invaded the area on Saturday.

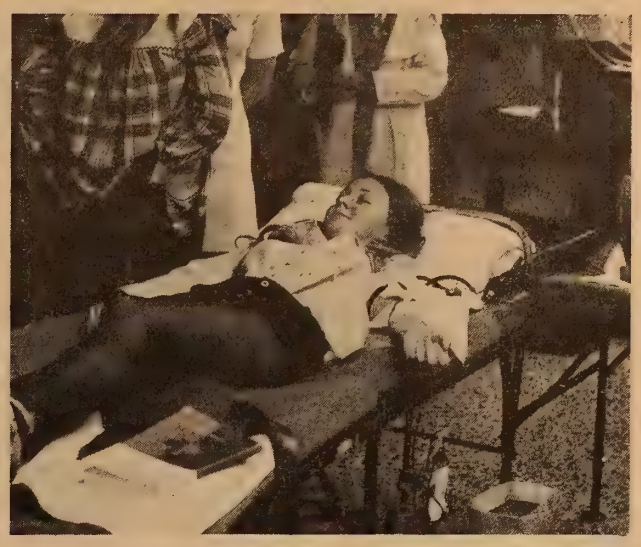
KAMPALA — Approximately twelve thousand Uganda Asians have been rendered stateless after Britain and Uganda both disclaimed any responsibility for them. These people are former British subjects who had applied for Uganda citizenship but failed to gain acceptance. The Uganda government has claimed that they are the responsibility of Britain. However Britain has rejected this interpretation and considers the Asians to be stateless.

WASHINGTON — The United States is planning to admit 1,000 Uganda Asians on a parole basis. These will be admitted in addition to those who will be given immigration visas. The purpose is to allow those with no other valid claim to citizenship to enter the country. However, they are to be screened carefully for professional capabilities so that they will be able to provide a means of selfsupport.

SAIGON — Over twenty U.S. B-52 bombers attacked North Vietnamese positions near Saigon, to destroy plans for an attack on Saigon.

South Vietnamese officials claim that the Communist command's latest push has been directed towards the Saigon area in an attempt to discredit President Nixon in the weeks prior to the November presidential election.

A letter from Rehab students



Dear Editor:

We're sure that during the past month every student on campus has become aware of the $100 fee increase, the raise in the loan ceiling and the demand by students that the age of independence be lowered from 24 years. These matters will affect some students more than others depending upon their financial background. However, one group of students who will be seriously affected by recent government decisions is the students in the School of Rehabilitation Therapy. Along with the problems mentioned above, comes the added fact that the government has decided to abolish their weekly stipend for mandatory summer internships in hospitals away from home. This decision, like all the others, was made suddenly and with no forewarning whatsoever.

Needless to say, the Rehab students are very concerned. Students protested with letters to the government during the summer. In return, they received form letters which were vague and misleading. It seems that each minister concerned thinks that our problem belongs to an area other than his own department. It is not only the students who are experiencing this "runaround" but also the faculty. Any attempts to make appointments with ministers has been met with an unlimited number of excuses with the result that it is not October and nothing has been done.

The removal of the stipend becomes effective January 1, 1973, just three months from now. There has still not been any proper explanations of the whys and wherefores. Therefore, Rehab students will be circulating a petition this week and we ask your support in signing it. After all, someday you might need the use of a well-trained therapist and then you'll be hoping your therapist is qualified with brains and ability — not just money. Help us by signing the petition, and vote yes on the referendum on October 11.

The questions:

Do you support the demands made by the OFS upon the Ontario government?

Would you support withholding your fees in January if negotiations with the government are unsuccessful?

Would you support a move to withhold all 1973-74 tuition fees if the Ontario government announces further tuition increases or further detrimental changes in the Ontario Student Awards programme?

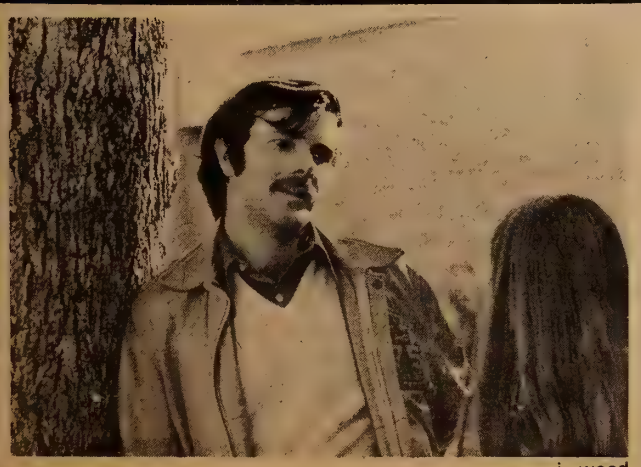
Polls.....

Polls will be open as follows on Wednesday:

Humphrey, 10:30 to 2:30; Kingston, 10:30 to 2:30; Jeffery, 10:30 to 2:30; Union, 10:30 to 4:30; Library, 10:30 to 7:00; Matheson Room, 11:30 to 12:30; McArthur, 10:30 to 2:30; Leonard, 4:45 to 6:15; Ban Righ, 4:45 to 6:15.

On Thursday:

Ellis, 10:30 to 2:00; Humphrey, 10:30 to 2:00; Union, 10:30 to 2:00; Library, 10:30 to 2:00; Leonard, 11:30 to 1:30; Ban Righ, 11:30 to 1:30; McArthur, 10:30 to 2:00.



Students are being asked to vote tomorrow and Thursday on a second-term "fee strike" to be coordinated by the Ontario Federation of Students.

A mass meeting at 1:30 p.m. today in Grant Hall will hear Wally Palmer, vice-president of the Alma Mater Society, and Doug Pritchard, president of the Graduate Student Society, appeal for "yes" votes on the strike.

Letters from student leaders (above and on page 4) also urge students to support the strike, which is intended as a protest against the education policies of the Ontario government.

The text of the ballot, and the hours and locations of polls, are shown above.

ASUS Senate election

Artsci students vote tomorrow for a senator for a two year term. Running are Susan Jackson and Patty Muldoon.

Pools are open in Humphrey, Kingston, and Jeffrey Halls from 10:30 am to 2:30 pm; the Union from 10:30 to 4:30 pm; and the Library from 10:30 to 7:00 pm.

There will be a meet the candidates night tonight in the Main Common Room of Donald Gordon House at 6:30 pm.

Susan Jackson

I wish to be an ASUS representative on the Senate at Queen's University. Why the Senate. Mainly because it is there that academic changes, university development, campus planning and budget proposals, programmes and developments are discussed and final decisions made on the priority and necessity of matters. If Queen's is to remain abreast of the times, there is no room for stagnation. We have to maintain our superior reputation and standards. Both standing and special Senate committees provide effective methods to attain improvement. Curriculum, facilities etc., must be constantly reviewed and revised so as to provide us, the students, with the best in all facets of university life.

The fact is, things are accomplished through Senate action and legislation which are significiant in our lives as Queen's students. An ASUS senator is a link between students and the entire university faculty -- representing your interests.

After all, many of us spend three or four years of our lives here. Why not get involved in effecting changes which will make our stay more fulfulling and enjoyable? This is not merely an idealistic whim, it is a very realistic and attainable goal. We have a voice in the direction which Queen's is to take -- lets use it to get something done! Help me help you. On October 11th vote Sue Jackson for ASUS senator.

Patty Muldoon

The recent flurry concerning the financing of postsecondary education in Ontario has very serious implications for Queen's students. The move by the COU counteracts the basic principles of accessibility presented in the Wright Commission Report. Education should be a right, not a privilege. Therefore, I urge students to take a strong stand and vote yes in the upcoming referendum.

By 1980, 90 per cent of the teaching staff at Queen's will be eligible for leave. Although we cannot predict the results, or their effects on the student body, I feel it should be a matter of concern for all students.

As a member of the Senate Committee on Appointments, Promotion, Tenure, and Leave I feel I have the necessary qualifications to represent arts and science students as a student Senator.

Do you know your rights?

What can you do if the car you bought is "lemon" or the meat you purchased turns bad or the landlord demands a deposit in case of damages? You might see a lawyer, file a suit in the small claims court or lay an information before the magistrate. You might contact Queen's Legal Aid Society or write the Consumer Complaints Department, Box 99, Ottawa. But you probably won't do anything if you don't know what your rights are.

The Law Student's Society along with the AMS has undertaken a week long information program designed to acquaint students with their rights. The first session will be a discussion of the law as it affects landlords and tenants. On the following day a panel of Doctors, Social Workers and Legal Personel will discuss problems of family law. Many parents feel that they should be able to treat their children as they wish. But if a battered child is brought to hospital there is reason to believe that the parents should be turned over to the police. Discussion will also centre on the divorce act. While a divorce is much easier to obtain now, it has not yet been decided who should have custody of the children. On Thursday a lawyer, engineer, economist and a representative of industry will speak about their roles in regulating the environment. Can we prevent pollution with laws or with scientific developments?

Consumer Rights is the topic of discussion on Friday. The Consumer entangled in a frustrating struggle with large business organizations often views his role as that of a modern David pitted against an indefferent Goliath. He and his defenders in an national consumer organizations, therefore, demand increased public regulation of corporate advertising warranty policies and sales contracts. On the other hand the embattled sales manager or corporate chief may regard such interference as a dangerous threat to free enterprise society and may insist that the rules remain in force: let the buyer bewre. To this, consumer advocates reply that the time has now come for the vendor to beware.

The debate on consumer rights will focus upon avenues through which individuals may obtain redress for injuries and as well influence future federal and provincial consumer protection legislation. It will attempt to understand industry's problems in response to consumer demands and will propose possible solutions to controversial issues.

Rehab stipend abolished

On March 28, it was announced in the provincial budget that the stipend formerly paid to Rehab students for their summer internships was to be abolished.

Although Dr. R. Potter, Minister of Health notified all Hospital Boards concerned, no formal announcement was sent to the schools of Rehabilitation Therapy. As a result, students were unaware of the problems at hand until a much later date.

This stipend formerly amounted to $37.50 per week for students who had completed their second year and $50 per week for those who had graduated. These funds were recommended by the professional associations such as the Canadian Physiothereapy Association and the Canadian Association of Occupational Therapy. The Ontario Government budgeted the money through the Ontario Services Commission. Internships are mandatory in order for students to be registered in Ontario. From the stipend a student is expected to pay for room, board, transportation and living expenses during his internship.

Due to the length of the internship, students have difficulty obtaining employment for the remainder of the summer. And as internship involves full time work, it is impossible to get part time work to offset expenses. These circumstances place many students in untenable position. Therefore, the Rehab Therapy Society is curculating a petition to be sent to the Ontario Government.

Frosh pics lost last year

There have been a number of complaints from students in nursing and rehab that their frosh pictures were not present in the frosh section of Tricolor '72, which appeared last week. Pat Rae, frosh editor for Tricolor '72 said she was aware of the ommission and regretted it, but that the registrar's office had not been able to find the pictures. When contacted by Tricolor last November the registrar's office agreed to provide all the frosh pictures and did provide most of them by Christmas. However, despite repeated enquiries, they were unable to produce the rehab or nursing pictures even though the Tricolor staff held the pages back until May. Miss Rae also regretted the poor quality of many of the frosh photos, but explained that they had been copied from the photo ID cards produced at registration last year. She further commented that the discontinuance photo ID's would mean that there would be no more frosh "mug-shots" in Tricolors in the future. She added that Tricolor '73 would instead contain a frosh section dealing with the events of frosh week.

A complaint

Dear Editor:

We would like to register a formal complaint against TRICOLOR '72, regarding the absence of frosh pictures of our entire facutly, not to mention the almost total omission of Nursing Science. As students of a long standing science we are an integral part of the university, and are entitled to our rights. We believe a formal apology is in order.

Vote "yes" on fee strike,

Dear Editor,

The ASUS Executive urges all Arts and Science Undergraduates to vote in favour of withholding second term fees this Wednesday and Thursday. Our objections to the fee hike imposed by the Davis government are several.

First and most important, it strikes us as simply one more step towards an entirely elitist system of higher education in Ontario. The Davis government has made no attempt at accommodating low income students within its schedule of tuition increases; given the regressive changes in the loan system, the tuition of a low income student has effectively risen by $300. In light of the wealth generated in Ontario every year there is no reason why it cannot support a system of extremely low cost education for its disadvantaged citizens.

Secondly, the government's handling of the fee hike has been inept. It neither consulted students prior to the increase nor has it made any serious effort at justifying it since, despite repeated pleas from the Ontario Federation of Students. Had it engaged in dialogue with students explaining its financial position prior to its decision, a compromise might have been evolved whereby the increases fell on those students who can most afford it. Instead, by its failure to consult students, the Davis government came up with a fee schedule which takes no account of income variations in the student population.

We do not support withholding fees so that all students can get their $100 back. We agree with the Davis government when it argues that students must bear a greater share of the cost of higher education. However, they should bear it in proportion to their means. We object to a policy which fails to distinguish between the poor and the rich as does that of the Davis government.

Yours very truly,
Ted Cape

Union noise

Dear Editor:

On one of our trips to the Union (Thurs., Oct. 5) we were bombarded by horrendous blasts of sound as far away as Ontario Hall. As we gingerly approached the entrance to the Union, we made the fatal error of trying to communicate with the Manageress of the booth...conversation was practically impossible but we did manage to ask what tickets were available. The answer that filtered through the noise was barely comprehensible and we questioned the necessity of maintaining those "horrendous blasts". The reason for this inquiry was a personal concern for the probable damage to the delicate components of the ear that would result from this bombardment.

The deafening reply was one of gross insensitivity. As we turned to leave the music seemed to increase in volume.

Dear Editor:

Sue de Stein made an interesting slap at the McArthur residences in her once-over-lightly article on residences. Something about a lack of community spirit. While the block programming by sex was obviously a block-headed idea, a community is something that people must create, not something that can be imposed or denied by a structure.

Case in point. 12 (male, McArthur) and J2 (female, Queeen's). We have had parties together, cooked meals for each other, consider ourselves to be one hall, and live as one.

Barriers between people are bad, but if you start to believe that you can't get around the barriers to form a community, then all the fault isn't that of the barriers.

SVB Nite

Dear Editor:

Wednesday night, October 4, the Student Volunteer Bureau held a conference called SVB Nite, to acquaint the students of Queen's with the volunteer needs of some 35 social service agencies in Kingston. It was attended by approximately 350 people, and over 200 of them signed up with one or more agencies. These people were responding to the needs of others and making a definite time committment to someone who needs them. This brings our total of committed volunteers since September to something over 300 - probably no other University in the province can make this claim. We feel that this says something important about "student apathy at Queen's, a topic that always becomes popular at this time of year.

We would therefore like to extend our thanks to the people that came, the agency representatives, and to Pat Neville, all of whom helped make SVB Nite a success.

For those people who missed the conference, we still have a large number of volunteer needs unfilled in all areas - prisons, hospitals, mentally retarded children, tutoring, sports, drop-ins, distress-call centres, etc. Please cal at 544-0517 or drop in at the office in Union (come in the University St. trance) for more information.

I noticed in the October 6, 1972 editio the Queen's Journal a letter from AMS president, Mr. Leblanc, eschew the "unseemly economics of opulenc Mr. LeBlanc was commenting in letter on the Heffalump cum Tumblew Craft Shop, contending that $13,000 student money had been poured into venture and little had been gained return. This kind of investment, or l must be what Mr. Leblanc calls ' seemly economics of opulence".

I admit that I am not so familiar as Leblanc is with opulence, but it seem me that many of the major expenditu of the AMS are directed to opulent tures. A brief survey of AMS budgets and present will show that major amo of money are spent on such things drinking establishments, rock conce and dances. Surely these thi represent opulence. In addition, g amounts of time have been spent arranging free bus services for a month period, which in a sense represent a kind of opulence.

On the other hand, minimal money time have been spent on publicizing informing campus concerning the la question of education in this provin Surely to appear so unconcerned for a long time on this vital matter shows t

Dear Editor,

The government of Ontario's philosophy on post secondary education seems to have changed in the last year. In the past it has been the policy of the Government to encourage university education with the rationale that social benefits exceeded the social costs to the taxpayer. Recently, many citizens and politicians have come to the conclusion that the social costs now outweigh the social benefits. If this is the case then one could argue that students should contribute a larger portion of the costs of their education - after all the student derives more 'direct' benefit from education than society.

Students and citizens alike should be aware of the economics of education in view of the increasing amount of society's resources channcelled into the education budget. Government policy changes of such magnitude should be brought to the public arena for discussion and acceptance. I realize there is a trade off between better democracy and the speed of policy implementation. The Government should start planning a little farther in advance in order to cushion the shock of such abrupt reversal in policy. George Kerr and his Government unilaterally imposed the increase in fees without a murmur of warning.

I think students are shocked because for many of us it is our first important confrontation with a drastic change in policy by the Government.

I hope Queen's students will show their desire to be represented by the Government we helped elect, by voting YES to the Fee Referendum. By withholding fees for a short period students can show our politicians that we want to be more representative, conscientious and better administrators of change.

The referendum should not protest a $100. increase in fees but to ask the Government for an overall policy on post-secondary education. We want to know what is going on, so we can formulate our own plans regarding further education. If the Government does not tell students of its intentions then students cannot make their own cost-benefit analysis for furthering their education.

At this undecided stage of life for many young people the last thing we need is a Government creating uncertainty as to what we should expect in the future.

EDITORIAL: "yes" vote vital

Tomorrow Ontario students will vote on the most contentious issue which has arisen since the student power turmoil in the 60's. There is more at stake here than just the increase in tuition fees and the decrease in student awards. The whole matter of accessibility to higher education has been seriously questioned by the recent government moves.

When the provincial budget was announced last March, Provincial Treasurer Darcy McKeough said that students would have to bear a larger part of the costs of their education as they benefit directly from it. Since the increase in fees was not accompanied by sufficient measures to provide financial support to those who need it, universities are being forced to move towards institutions for the wealthy. We can only surmise that if fewer students are able to attend university the facilities and quality of higher education will be seriously affected.

Due to the high average income, many students at Queen's will not even feel the pinch of increased fees. But we must look beyond our own situation to the whole concept of higher education in Ontario. The large number of unemployed university graduates must make society wonder if the university is worth supporting from public funds. Yet under the present economic conditions of the country, an influx of students unable to attend university will cause a flood on the job market.

Many students at university are supported by loans from the Ontario Students Awards Program. Under the new conditions of the program a student will now accummulate a debt of $3200 over four years compared to $2400 under the old system. Formerly, students did not pay interest on a loan until the first day of the seventh month following graduation, but now they will be required to pay interest bearing upon receipt. These circumstances may act as a strong deterent to many potential students.

Negotiations with the government have been underway all summer and will continue until students feel that a more equitable solution to these circumstances has been reached. Support for the fee strike in January is not an end in itself. Rather the strike is part of a campaign to show the government that measures must be taken to ensure accessibility of higher education to low income students. We must force the government to take steps to alleviate the new conditions and prevent them from contemplating future cutbacks. Their actions demand the overwhelming opposition of students. It is important to vote yes in the referendum.

Rugby Gaels steamroller Trent 52-11

by Kees Kort

Saturday afternoon, the Rugby Gaels announced to the world that they had arrived as a team, thumping a hapless Trent University side 52-11 in Kingston. After a slow and rather ignominous season's start, the first XV put on a dazzling display of rugby, despite the fact that the game was played in the rain and the rugby pitch resembled a quagmire rather than a playing field. The problems that had beset the Rugby side in their first two games appeared to have been washed away by the rain. Throughout the match the Queen's forwards showed their Trent counterparts that the Queen's pack was superior in all aspects of set and loose play, and in the line-outs. This dominance of play was the result of concentrated team effort. From the opening whistle, the pack ran, not as individuals, but as a cohesive unit, resulting in solid possession of the ball. When the forwards did pass the ball to the backs, the latter consistently moved it down the field with accurate, unselfish passing and incisive running. Time after time, the backs sprung their teammates for long runs with good fakes to draw in the Trent tacklers. This was best exemplified by Dave Bowker, who continually drew double coverage, allowing his mates to establish an overlap against the Trent side. When Bowker did pass the ball to the rest of the line, they scored with regularity. The backs accounted for five tries: two by Warren Smith, and one each by Geoff Evensen, Dave Walters, and Jim Oppen. However, it was wing-forward Dave Murley who turned out to be the Gaels' scoring machine (and, incidentally, their long-sought kicker), collecting 24 points on two tries, two penalty kicks, and five converts. Dave Cook and Steve Shelly scored one try each to round out the Gael attack; Shelly's goal was set up by a beautiful fake by Cook.

The team that trounced Trent was obviously not the same side that went down to defeat against York and RMC. For the first time this year, the Rugby Gaels molded their individual talents into a cohesive unit, with awesome results. And, Trent is not a league patsy. They held RMC to a 6-6 tie last week, and the Redmen shut out Queen's 10-0 on Wednesday. If the Gaels can maintain this kind of team attitude, a third straight league title is not an impossibility.

Not to be outdone by the scoring feats of the firsts, the Gaels second XV held their opponents scoreless for the second consecutive game, blanking the Trent seconds by a 24-0 count. Bill Warburton scored three tries, while Brian Titley and Gord Wyatt added one each. Ron Easteal converted twice. As against RMC, the seconds' pack completely dominated play with sterling performances by lock-forward Mike Dyer and prop Peter Verhoeven. Coach Mike Booth certainly has no depth problem as there is almost nothing to choose between the two sides.

The 1st XV pack prepares to give chase as ball is booted to Trent.

Soccer Gaels drop Rams 6-1

by Dave Cottee

Queen's soccer Gaels, on the basis of two 3-goal outbursts and steady defensive play, gained a decisive 6-1 victory over Ryerson on Saturday afternoon. A few loyal, shivering fans watched the game and were warmed by Queen's spirited play which helped counter the chilling drizzle and the spectre of the football scoreboard which showed a 26-23 defeat at the hands of Carleton.

The team got off to a fast start with two goals by Davy Robertson and one by Gord Taylor. Robertson's second goal came when his corner kick carried all the way into the goal, with some assistance from the wind. After scoring those three goals, the Gaels let down a bit. At this point Gerry Birks displayed his defensive skills by breaking up Ryerson's attacks and starting Queen's back up the field with accurate passes.

However, it was during this lapse that Ryerson got its only goal. The Gaels' goalkeeper, Peter Richie, made the initial save but was unable to stop the second shot. The remainder of the first half was somewhat disorganized as both teams struggled with the field conditions. Players slipped in the mud when changing directions, and many passes either skidded on the wet surface or stopped short in puddles. One exception to the confusion was a fine play by Robertson. He broke into the clear, but his hurried shot went just wide.

The second half started more briskly, with play becoming a bit rougher, but despite the fast action there were few serious attacking plays. However, Ryerson did come very close once, hitting the cross-bar with a hard shot.

About midway through the second half the Gaels began to assert themselves, particularly through the efforts of Robertson and Taylor. Robertson was dangerous throughout the game as he showed excellent anticipation, which was aided by Ryerson's lack of teamwork. Another constant threat was Taylor whose outstanding footwork created several scoring opportunities for himself.

However, the real turning point came from an incident near the Gaels' goal. Ryerson was awarded a penalty shot, but before it was taken, an argument developed during which Ryerson's number 9, Averkiou, was ejected for rough play. He gave Gerry Birks a shove that caused Birks to wind up flat on his back in the mud, and gave Ryerson something else to argue about. They spent a good deal of their time shouting at either the officials or the Gaels.

Meanwhile, back at the game, Ryerson took the penalty shot and Peter Dickie made a fine diving save. Shortly thereafter, Queen's had its turn for a penalty shot, when Robertson was tripped as he broke in on the Ryerson goal. Birks took the kick and showed his ability with a hard, perfectly placed shot to the lower left-hand corner.

From then on the game was all Queen's. Gordon Howard manoeuvred past two Ryerson defenders, and with his left foot put a quick shot into the top right-hand corner, giving the goalkeeper no chance. The Gaels had several more good opportunities, and from a crowd near the Ryerson goal, Don Baragar notched the sixth and final Queen's score.

With football on Friday in Ottawa this week and rugger at Toronto, the soccer Gaels have Saturday to themselves as they host Carleton. Maybe they can avenge the football team!

Waterpolo Gaels win

Simon Beitler's waterpolo Gaels proved to be bad hosts Saturday, defeating RMC and Ottawa U. to win the Queen's University Invitational Waterpolo Tournament with an undefeated record. RMC was second. The Gaels dumped the Redmen 16-5 in their opening game, after RMC had led by a goal in the first half. The entire Queen's squad came up with a big second half, pouring in 13 goals to only 1 by the cadets. Steve Patterson led all scorers with five goals, while Jack Muir and Chris Whatley added three each.

Against Ottawa U., a newcomer to OUAA Waterpolo ranks, the Gaels had little trouble, playing aggressively and checking Ottawa into the water. The final score (17-3) relects the edge in play enjoyed by the Gaels. Muir and Whatley scored three goals each to lead the Gaels.

In both games, Queen's was led by the strong offensive efforts of captain George Craig, and the defensive play of Whatley and Rich Zajchowski, a transfer from McGill. The Gaels open their OUAA season this coming Saturday in Toronto, taking on Varsity and Ottawa U. The GeeGees should pose no problems, but U. of T. is quite another matter. The Blues have yet to lose to Queen's in league play, but this could be the year. If they do, we could have another league title here this year.

Golf team 2nd in OUAA

The Queen's golf team was able to survive the high winds and rain that periodically lashed the Carleton Golf Club in Ottawa Friday and Saturday, but couldn't overcome a hot U. of T. squad. The Gaels had to be satisfied with a second-place finish in the eight-team finals, played over 36 holes. At press time, no results were available on team or individual scores.

OWIAA Tennis washed out

Both the Eastern and Western Sectional playdowns in OWIAA Tennis competition were washed out by the heavy rains that blanketed southern Ontario on the weekend. The remainder of each round-robin tournament will be completed at Queen's this Friday, prior to the start of the OWIAA Tennis Finals on Saturday. The sectional playdowns will commence at 9:00 a.m. Friday, and are tentatively scheduled for the west campus courts.

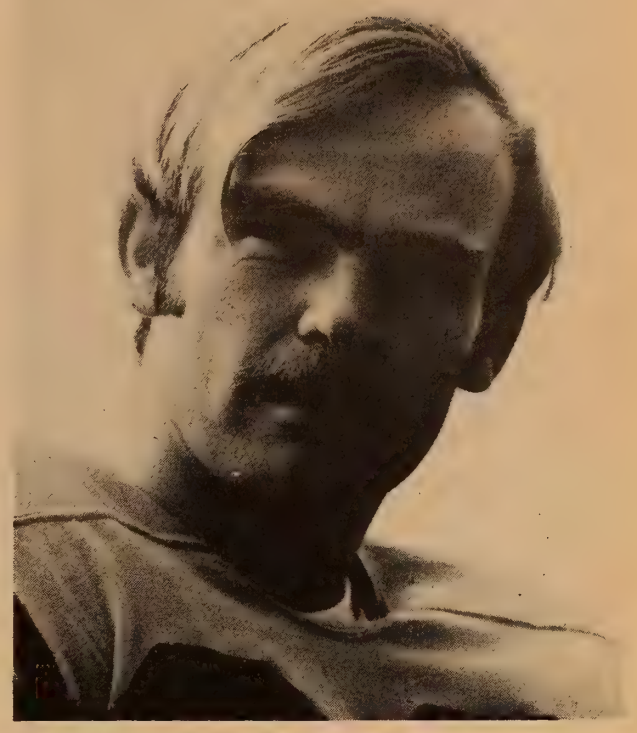
Ravens shock Gaels with big first quarter

by Chris Boon

"What happened out there?" This question came from more than one Queen's players Saturday afternoon, as they sat in the stunned silence of the dressing room. The Gaels had scored 23 points, 15 of them in the second half; they had held the Ravens to just 7 points after the first quarter; and they had lost, 26-23, despite a valiant comeback attempt in the final period.

What happened was this: Carleton took advantage of a strong wind and some mass confusion in the Gaels' defensive backfield to put 19 points on the board in a little under 13 minutes.

After that, it was kitty-bar-the-door, and Queen's plays lousy catch-up football. The horror show started with a little over 7:00 to go in the quarter. The Ravens, who had been having some success with quick pitches to halfback Don Gormley, faked a wide run and sent the swift back on a deep pattern over the middle. Dave Montagno's pass was right on the money, and the Ravens led 7-0. Gormley was about five yards open on the play.



After the Raven kickoff, the Gaels' offense could not move the ball (Warrender dropped a second-down pass, but he got really belted by two Ravens) and the Queen's was forced to kick. Rookie Greg McNamara was injured covering this punt, and had to sit out the rest of the game, although his arm problem is not thought to be serious. His absence hurt the Gaels on offense for the rest of the game.

Montagano wasted no time in putting more points on the board. He sent backup QB Peter Stenerson, who had been spotted at halfback for this play, on a wide run. Doug Cozac read run, left his man in the pass coverage, and started up to make the tackle. Stenerson promptly flipped the ball over Cozac's head to Robin Harber, for 45 yards and another quick six points. The convert was no good. Neither was Queen's offense. After again failing to move the ball out of their own end, the Gaels were victimized by yet another bomb from Montagno to Gormley. This one covered about 30 yards, and set up the Raven's third major, on a Montagno pass to end Paul Schubert. This time, Paul Hand and Don Smith combined to block the convert attempt.

The Gaels got the wind in the second period, but were unable to move the ball until Alex Morris picked off a Montagno toss (Merc's third of the year) to set up a Taylor to Melvin throw for the first Queen's score. Cozac's convert made it 19-7. Rookie linebacker John Tovee picked up a Carleton fumble in the dying moments of the half, but the Gaels could add only a single, for a 19-8 half-time score. Things didn't pick up much in the third quarter, though. The Ravens took advantage of some sloppy tackling and missed coverage to run the count to 26-8, with Joe Colvey scoring on an 8-yard screen pass.

Alex Melvin, who probably played his finest game ever for the Gaels, got the comeback going with the recovery of a fumbled punt on the Raven 40. This time the offence made no mistake, working the ball into the 6-yd line, from whence Geoff Hamlin powered into the end zone. The convert made it 26-15, and the Gaels were on their way-almost.

The Gaels put together a fine fourth-quarter drive, with Taylor mixing up his plays very effectively, and Melvin making some spectacular catches, only to have an end-zone interception of a pass intended for Lang snuff out the scoring threat. However, the Gaels quickly got the ball back, and Taylor hit Melvin for his second TD catch of the game. A mishandled snap force Cozac and Campbell to scramble, with the result that the convert attempt failed. 26-21. Ravens. The Gaels' defense, which had been greatly helped by the insertion of rookie Norm Hagarty at defensive end, came up with a big series, stuffing Gormley on a sweep, then nailing Montagano for a big loss with a great second-down pass rush. (Don Smith reinjured his already-sore neck on that play- his status is doubtful for this Friday's contest.) The Ravens conceded a safety touch, to keep possession of the ball. 26-23. The Gaels had possession several times in the dying moments, but an untimely penalty for pulling the facemask, and the Raven defense, proved too much. Final score was 26-23, for Carleton.

Alex Melvin - two TD's, plays his best game ever for Gaels.

Track Gaels third

Queen's track Gaels rode a strong effort by Dave Jarvis into third place in the University of Waterloo Invitational Track Meet last Thursday. The blond hurdler won the 110-metre hurdles in a time of 15.2 seconds, added a second-place finish in the 200-metre event (22.5 seconds, behind Western's Terry Notondo) then ran a fine leg in the 4 400 relay to help push the Gaels to another first, in a time of 3:26.4. Waterloo won the meet, with Western in second spot.

Queen's also got a fine performance from Brian Aiken, who ran a great last 200-metres to ege out Matt Duncan of Toronto in the 800-m run. Aiken's winning time of 1:57.8 was excellent, given Waterloo's slow track.

Axel Becke was the lone field competitor to get points for Queen's Thursday (John Ongarato didn't make the trip) with a second-place win in the long jump. Becke's leap of 6.36 metres was a scant 3-cm behind the winning jump.

The track men also got good performances from Don Price (2nd in 110-m hurdles), Dieter Stein (4th in the 5000-m event) and Jim Van Meer (4th in 400-m run). As well, two Queen's competitors set personal-best marks, although finishing out of the points gaining positions. Robert McLeod set his mark in the 5000-m with a time of 16:14, while pole-vaulter Ron Stolz cleared 11'6" for his personal record.

The track men move on the London this coming weekend to compete in the University of Western Ontario Invitational Meet. Hugh Fraser and John Ongarato, both absent at Waterloo, should make the trip, so look for the Gaels to challenge for top spot on the weekend.

Track Gals game but understrength

A small but determined segment of the Queen's women's track team invaded Waterloo Thursday, and managed to make an impression out of proportion to their numbers. Aileen Kirby, one of the team's veterans from last year, took third in the 400 metres, clocking 1:05.6. Janey O'Rourke, another veteran, Diane Jameson, back after a year's absence, and newcomers Joanne Ronan and Kathy Wynee all pressed the leaders during the race.

A full team should make the trip to Western on Friday. The addition of competitors like sprinter Irene Harris should make the Gals competitive.

Comeback win for Hockey Gals

by Sue Moffat

Thursday's game against St. Lawrence U. from New York witnessed Queen's field hockey Seniors "come through the back door," to win by one goal. Half-hearted offensive action and inaccurate passing characterized Queen's 1st half play versus the strong, albeit slow, pass-reception tactics by S.L.U.

Queen's came to life at 21:30 into the 2nd half, sparked by a goal from Gail McLeod.

Passing became co-ordinated, fast breaks took the ball down the field and well-timed defensive checks kept it there.

The previously held 2-0 score for S.L.U. fell in these last 7 minutes of play. The tying goal by Sue Moffatt was followed by centre Karen Carson rushing to score the winning shot with one minute to go.

The score: 3-2 for Queen's Seniors over our good neighbours to the south.

In the following Intermediate game, Queen's played consistently good hockey both offensively and defensively. Determination was their theme and it was evident in their unrelenting back-checking and persistent fast breaks.

Ten minutes into the game S.L.U. scored, but did this discourage Queen's? If the redoubled effort in the back field and the do-or-die attacking on the part of the forward line was any indication,the answer had to be "No". Queen's held the score to 1-0 until their efforts were rewarded at 28:30 of the 2nd half with the tying goal by Leslie Ferrari. The final score remained a draw, one all.

Keep your eye on the Journal for news of up-coming Queen's Field Hockey games. These Queen's gals play a good fast game, and besides, they have much better looking legs than the Golden Gaels ever had.

World: Vietnam talks at "sensitive stage"

LONDON There is reason to believe that a broad agreement on the war in Vietnam has been reached between Henry Kissinger of the United States and North Vietnamese representatives during recent meetings in Paris and Moscow.

In television appearance last week, President Richard Nixon stated that the peace talks were now in a "sensative stage". Details of any peace plan, however, are not to be announced until after the November presidential elections, he stated.

In recent disclosures, the North Vietnamese government has proposed that South Vietnamese President Nguyen Van Thieu be removed and a coalition government with representation from all political groups be set up. In his February speech last year, President Nixon announced that he was in favour of withdrawing American troops from South Vietnam if all American prisoners of war were returned, and a suitable government found.

COPENHAGEN — Anker Joergesen has been chosen by an executive committee of the Social Democratic Party to replace Prime Minister Jens Otto Krag, who retired shortly after his victory in the referendum bringing Denmark into the European Common Market.

Joergesen has for several years been the leader of the General Workers' Union, Denmark's largest labour movement.

MANILLA — About twenty members of the Maoist New People's Army in the Philippines have been killed, captured, or wounded by government troops. There were several shooting encounters between the Maoists and the Philippine troops but all the members of the New People's Army were finally routed.

Philippines President Ferdinand Marcos' military rule, now in its third week, is sweeping through the islands destroying Communist elements among the populace. A series of reforms designed to make the public "stand in line" and to forge a new society for the Philippines, have been instituted. Marcos has announced that he is about to start a clean-up of the police force and that he is presently driving "undesirables" out of government departments.

BEIRUT — The five member Federation of Arab Republics has entered Aden, capital of South Yemen, to begin mediation talks between North and South Yemen in an effort to end their week-old conflict.

North Yemen claims that the South is still holding one of their border towns and that they are being subject to raids by South Yemeni planes. The other Arab Nations are expressing concern through the Federation, which includes Egypt, Libya, Algeria, Syria and Kuwait, that the conflict could develop into a large scale war.

MOGADISHU, Somalia — Tanzanian foreign minister John Malecela and his Ugandan counterpart, Wanume Kibedi, have signed a peace agreement ending the border clash between the two nations. The talks took place under the chairmanship of Somali foreign minister Omar Arteh.

The agreement was reached after two days of negotiations between the parties. It is believed that they revolved around a secret five-point plan proposed by Somalia, which won't be published for a few days.

Meanwhile, in Kampala, Uganda President Idi Amin claims that he can site documentary proof that several powers were plotting to overthrow his government in a large coup.

He accused Britain, India, Tanzania and Zambia of preparing for an invasion of Uganda, timed to take place shortly before the November 8 deadline for the expulsion of non-citizen Asians from his country. So far 11,700 Uganda Asians have left.

Zaire President Mobuto Sese Seko claims that he gained three consessions from Amin on his recent visit to that country. He stated that Amin agreed to extend the deadline for expulsion of the Asians from Uganda, and that he would not institute his proposed internment measures for Asians after the deadline. In addition Mobuto claims that Amin promised to rescind the restrictions on what Asians may take with them upon leaving the country. However, no official word confirming this has been received from Kampala.

Looking About

Waffle Right?

by Peter Jensen

A recent survey conducted by the Queen's politics department indicates that the national parties are underplaying the sovereignty issue. The survey of approximately three hundred homes in Kingston reveals the greater proportion of those interviewed to be apprehensive in regard to the evident, and increasingly well-known, degree of foreign control and influence in our nation.

This is in marked contrast to the sentiments of Mr. Trudeau who, in a speech given last week in Edmonton, remarked that Canada would not be independant for another twenty years. In his opinion Canadians were not upset by the present level of foreign influence.

Further, the Queen's survey shows the switching of votes from normally Liberal people to the Conservatives. I'm quite sure this information underpinned Flora Macdonald's decision to press the nationalist issue in her campaign. Let us hope the national parties rid themselves of their humbug and rot which pass for national policy, and follow.

Dear Bill

Just a short allegory to end. - Once two labourers were conversing. One said, "What is this here transmigration of souls they talk about?", and the other said he would explain it to him. "You see Bill," said he, "it's this way: Suppose you was to die and we was to bury you, and suppose daisies was to grow up over your grave. Well, suppose a cow came along and ate the daisies and after a while the cow was to walk along and drop something in the street and we was to come past and look down at it and say, "poor old Bill, he ain't changed much, that is what this here transmigration of souls means".

Canada: Income tax cuts become election issue

OTTAWA — There is a possibility that Finance Minister John Turner may cancel a scheduled increase in personal income taxes that is to go into effect next January 1. The three percent cut made by the then Finance Minister Edgar Benson in October of last year is scheduled to run until the end of December after which they will return to the previous rates.

New Democratic Party Leader David Lewis predicts that Turner will cancel the increase. Progressive Conservative Party Leader Robert Stanfield claims that not only should Turner drop the increase but also that he should generally cut the tax rates.

The subject of personal tax rates has become a contentious political issue on which few officials will comment. Reports from the Finance Department show that tax revenues are higher than forecast, but that this does not apply to the personal income tax area.

During the first five months of the current fiscal year, which began on April 1, the treasury held a surplus of $697 million. However, it is impossible to use these figures to predict how the year will end, as expenses usually pile up just before the finish of the fiscal year.

Turner predicted in his May 8 budget speech that we would end the year with a $450 million deficit. A tax increase after December 31 would mean an increase in revenues of only $50 million for the three months remaining in the current fiscal year.

TORONTO — Ontario's major grocery chains are bracing for a large-scale price war, as Loblaw Groceteria's Co. of Toronto and Dominion Stores Ltd. of Toronto have begun massive competitive price cuts.

Loblaw reduced the prices of eight items featured in their ads last Wednesday after Dominion Stores undercut a number of the Loblaw weekly specials in their Thursday advertising.

The Great Atlantic and Pacific Co. of Toronto and Steinbergs Ltd. of Montreal both claim that they are adjusting prices to meet market conditions and that they do not intend to be undersold.

The Dominion Stores ad on Wednesday promised that the Dominion Stores would refund the difference between its price and a lower price advertised by its competitors on any gorcery item. Kieth Padden, Loblaw vice-president replied that if anyone tried to undercut Loblaw prices, "they are in for a hell of a fight."

TIMMINS, Ont. — On January 1, 1973, the city of Timmins is to become the largest by geographical area of any other North American city. Thirty-four geographical townships with a total population of 40,000 and a total area of 1200 square miles will be giving up their names to become wards of the new city. By comparison Toronto with a population of 2,000,000 has an area of 240 square miles. The largest city in the United States is Jacksonville, Florida with 827 square miles.

Each ward will be represented by an alderman and Timmins mayor Del Villano has been re-elected to direct the new city.

TORONTO — Fred J. Pilgrem, Deputy Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations has been appointed Deputy Minister of Industry and Tourism. He will be replacing Don J. Collins who was recently appointed chairman of the new regional municipality of Sudbury. Pilgrem is to be replaced in Consumer and Commercial Affairs by J. Kenneth Young, who was Assistant Deputy Minister.

MONTREAL — Kraft Foods Ltd. of Montreal has been found guilty of false advertising in its Explore Canada 70 contest. The contest offered its contestants "fifteen big chances to win" a trip to any Canadian city, free use of a vehicle, $1000 spending money and a set of luggage. According to the court ruling, no contestant had "fifteen big chances to win" and that 120,900 of the 271,000 contest entrants wasted a stamp.

The contest was conducted on a regional basis, with three prizes going to Quebec and Ontario, two to British Columbia and the Yukon and one each to the other provinces. The court told that of 26,896 Albertans who entered, only 504 made it before the one prize had been awarded.

TORONTO — The Bank of Montreal has announced plans for a new head office tower which is to be the tallest in Canada. The project is to include a "pedestrian city" which is to cover five acres between King and Adelaide Streets and fronting on Bay Street.

There will be three underground parking areas with connections to the Toronto Dominion centre. The actual tower will be seventy stories high, fourteen more than the Commerce Court and fifteen more than the Toronto Dominion Center. It will stand just short of one-fifth of a mile high.

Battered children myth or problem

by Debra Barr

The Law Students' Society, along with the AMS, presented their second discussion of the Majority Rights Symposium on Wednesday afternoon in Grant Hall. The discussion centred around family law as it affects battered and neglected children. Panelists participating included Dr. M.W. Partington (Pediatrics K.G.H. and professor of pediatrics at Queen's), Cyril Greenland (McMaster School of Social Work), Keith Farquhar, (a lawyer sitting the Ontario Law Reform Commission on Family Law) Judge James Felstiner (a family court judge) and Mary Ellen Johnson (Calgary Law Society, and currently a graduate student of Queen's Urban and Regional Planning). The various interests of the panelists allowed a more complete insight into the problem.

Dr. Partington introduced some history. He said that it was only twenty to twenty-five years ago that radiologists first noted injuries such as clots of blood under the brain in children. It was not until much later that it was discovered that these injuries were due to trauma. At an even later date it was realized that this trauma must be willfully inflicted. Dr. Partington said he saw his battered child in 1955. The term "battered child" was not introduced until 1962 by a doctor in Colorado. This history makes it clear that the realization of the existence of child neglect is recent.

The physically abused child was described by Dr. Partington as young with a history of accidents. The injuries are multiple and at different stages. Types of injuries usually experienced are abrasions on the skin (as if made with a belt), bruises, dislocations, bites and burns. Occasionally a child shows signs of malnutrition and neglect (such as dirty attire).

There is a high recurrence rate (up to forty or fifty percent) if the child is returned to it's same environment.

Dr. Partington described parents of battered children as being five percent psychotic, five percent being aggressive psychopaths who talk little but act violently. The other ninety percent are indistinguishable from other parents. They may isolate themselves by being members of immigrant groups, by having unlisted phone numbers, or by not joining social groups. Parents of battered children tend to have the same background they are giving their children - that of little care or affection and physical discipline. The parents often have inappropriate expectations of their children. Dr. Partington said, it is not uncommon for such parents to expect children of five months to have a knowledge of right and wrong.

It is difficult to recognize cases of abuse, stated Dr. Partington, due to little outside evidence. However, he estimated figures for Kingston. For children under two years he said twenty five percent of fractures are due to abuse. For children under twelve years, ten percent to twenty percent of all forms of trauma are caused by abuse. Of the children admitted to hospital for "failure to thrive", twenty percent are due to neglect.

Dr. Partington explained the guidelines to manage such children. The first step is to admit the child to hospital which takes him out of this environment. The case is then reported to child welfare agencies. Dr. Partington noted that it is only since 1963 that this could be done legally with no fear of libel. Here the responsibility ends. "Should it end here?" Dr. Partington asks. It does no good for the recurrence rate. Dr. Partington believes we are "chickening out" by stopping here. It would help the child better to stay involved. Dr. Partington says we must research this, "not just opt out".

Local pediatric groups have written about the treatment of battered children. They believe that the non accusational, non-punitive approach is best. All efforts must be made to remove the child from its environment then an attempt can be made to alter that environment, so that the child can be returned to it.

"Are we flouting the law?" Dr. Partington asks. The child has been assualted, or murdered, or in danger of such. "We may be utterly neglecting the rights of the child."

Cyril Greenland looked at the battered child from the point of view that we are dealing with a myth. He used statistics for Ontario to support this theory. The number of children reported abused to the registry from 1966 to 1970 were one thousand one hundred and twenty one. The types of injury were mainly minor bruises and lacerations with fewer bone and skull fracture. Of the 1121 reported cases, 167 required hospitalization, 297 were released after examination, 100 were treated with one visit to a doctor, and 142 required no treatment. Of the same number of cases, 274 children were taken into the care of agencies and 387 were put under agency supervision.

Only 50 people waiting for Elrond

Only 50 people are still waiting to move into Elrond, John Blanchard told the Journal. These people will occupy half a corridor on the fifteenth floor. "They will be moved in within the next week," Blanchard commented.

Forty per cent of all available commercial space in Elrond has been sold and Blanchard feels that in the next week the figure should rise to 80 per cent.

There remains a great deal to do in the units themselves, he added. Certain deficiencies won't be corrected for several months. Desks and drawers have still not arrived, and the bookshelves have not yet been installed. The lounges however, are completely furnished.

In the occupied units there are many small faults to be attended to, such as spotty painting, and doors that rattle.

It will be several months before everything is corrected, Blanchard stated.

Eng. Soc to study course complaints

A general investigation of first year courses, has been undertaken by the Engineering Society. Steve Mansell, President of the Engineering Society told the Journal that "we are acting in response to complaints made about a computer course." A questionaire was circulated at the end of last year and recommendations drawn from that have been sent on to the Engineering Drawing Department and the Dean of Engineering.

The Engineering Academic Committee is also studying what options and types of courses should be available to first year students.

Organized twice annually by the Engineering Society the blood drive, held last week was a great success according to Mansell. There were 875 donors, 99 per cent of which were Queen's students.

"The pub in Clark Hall is also working out well", Mansell said. "It's better than the Queen's pub now," he added. It is open in Clark Hall on Friday afternoons for faculty and students.

Meds celebrate '100 year itch'

The Aesculapian Society will hold its annual formal on October 20.

The theme of this year's dance is "The 100 year itch", in accordance with the fact that the Aesculapian Society is celebrating its 100th anniversary in 1972-73. It will be held at the Lasalle Hotel from 9 p.m. to 2 a.m. Jerry Reidt and Orchestra will be providing the music. Tickets are $15 per couple and are available at the Medical Office, the Alumni Office, and from officers of the Aesculapian Society.

The annual Aesculapian Society Lecture this year presents Dr. Charles Huggins, the Nobel Prize winner in medicine of 1966. Dr. Huggins is with the Ben May Cancer Research clinic in Chicago. The lecture takes place on Thurs., Nov. 16 in Dunning Auditiorium at 7:30.

Other meds activities include the Variety night at Grant Hall on Friday, Nov. 17 and a smoker, which is being planned jointly by the Meds and Commerce societies on November 25.

Douglas Library fines apply to all

A recommendation by the Senate Library Committee was approved by Senate on May 25, 1972, "that fines in the Douglas Library be standardized with respect to overdue books and recalls for all users."

Library users are reminded that the fine schedule currently in effect is twenty cents per day, except on Reserve books. Loan periods which should be particularly noted are:

Bound periodicals, one week to all users; fines will be applied at once because of the heavy demand on many periodicals.

Undergraduate loans, 11 days.

Graduate students and courtesy cards, one month.

Faculty and staff loans, four months.

Recalls (requests to return a book immediately for use by another person) are due three days after the date of recall. Fines will be applied at once to all users after the three-day period.

Reserve books (course reserves, shelved at the Reserve Room desk, third floor): three or twenty-four hours. Fines on Reserve books, applicable to all users, 25 cents per hour.

Arts students try to strengthen DSCs

Three Arts and Science students are attempting to strengthen the Departmental Student Councils on campus. This campaign was started by Ross Sutherland, Kathy Turner AMS rep-at-large, and Leslie Bankes, AMS rep-at-large.

Miss Turner, told the Journal that "we hope to encourage the formation of DSCs in areas where they don't exist, such as Engineering and in the Geology department of the Faculty of Arts and Science. It is also important to strengthen those DSCs which are not very effective," she said.

"Many DSC's do nothing but organize smokers and course evaluation," Miss Turner commented.

The potential force of the DSC's in determining curriculum will be discussed at the upcoming meeting of all DSC's next week.

Rights of tenants discussed at symposium

by Steve Winnett

The Majority Rights Symposium, sponsored by the Faculty of Law, opened Tuesday evening in Dunning Hall with a discussion of landlord and tenant relations. A great deal of useful information concerning the new Ontario Landlord and Tenant Act was proffered by Prof. Gorsley, who was research supervisor for the draft report for the Law Reform Commission of Ontario on landlord and tenant law.

In an opening statement, Prof. Gorsley emphasized that there have been major changes in the landlord and tenant laws in many provinces since 1970. Under previous laws, it could be said, with certain reservations, that a tenant had practically no rights. For example, one question put to the audience was, "if the plaster is falling from the ceiling....., and rats live in the basement, can I withhold the rent?" Before 1970, the answer was 'no'. Under the new laws, the answer is, in effect, 'yes and no'.

Prof. Gorsley warned the audience that few of the provisions of the Act have been adjudicated by the courts, hence he could only give a laywer's opinion on many issues based on what the statute appears to say.

Furthermore, the term "majority rights" can be misleading: the law is there for the use of both tenants and landlords.

In dealing with specific problems posed by a questionnaire circulated among the audience, Prof. Gorsley, noted that what is needed in such intricate matters is a ready source of information on the law for both landlord and tenant. The new provincial act provides for Landlord and Tenant Advisory Bureaus in major cities. Kingston however, does not have such a bureau - it was deemed "unnecessary" by the City Council. The main advantage of these bureaus is that they can prevent unnecessary and expensive court actions. To meet this need in Kingston, an organization was set up by landlords to handle telephone requests; and the Queen's Student Legal Aid Society have also been active in such matters.

This is an important area of the law: almost a majority of Canadians are now tenants. There has been an accelerating trend since World War II towards rented accommodation. The major changes in the law were the result of intense citizen pressure during the late 1960's But although tenants now have more rights, "these rights are only as valuable as the means of cindication". A more rational way is needed to settle disputes when they arise. The means offered by the courts remain expensive, cumbersome, and timeconsuming. For example, why can't the courts sit at night? Citizen unconcern will lead to no change in the law, and the law required change to be more accessible.

Busit in progress

October is bound to be a month of movement for Queen's students. Our Alma Mater Society and Kingston Public Utilities Commission are undertaking an experiment in local bus transit . . . BUSIT.

To October 28, Queen's students will have free access to four of six routes of the Kingston Public Transit System. On presentation of the Green Students Card, Queen's students may ride the Kingston P.U.C. Buses to distant points within the Kingston city limits.

Data collected in the third week of BUSIT will provide the A.M.S. and the Pu.c. with details of student bus usage.

Conclusions on the possibilities and the P.U.C. with details of student bus usage.

referendum will determine whether Queen's students will wish to pay a flat rate included in future non-academic fee for similar access to the Kingston Public Transit System.

No transfers will be issued to students if a trip requires the use of more than one bus the student is to show his I.D. Card on Boarding each bus.

Bus route maps and schedules are posted on campus bulletin boards and are available on WHO'S WHERE pgs. 92 and 93.

Lunch for undernourished kids

by Debbie Hodgins

It is a harsh indictment of our over-productive, "just" society that there are large numbers of hungry or under-nourished children in Canada. Farmers grow more food than we can consume and they are often subsidized by governments not to produce. We have all heard these arguments before. The facts concerning malnutrition in children have been pointed out time and again by concerned doctors, social workers and nutrionists.

Apart from the appalling diseases which stem from malnutrition, researchers have found that a child's capacity to learn is greatly affected by dietary deficiencies. Thus his education is hampered, blocking his only avenue of escape from what many have termed "the culture of poverty". It is indeed a viscious circle.

Recently a number of students in cooperation with Barry Goodwin in North Kingston Parish, have established an experimental lunch programme for undernourished children in the north Kingston area. The purpose of this programme is essentially to provide a nourishing meal for children who might otherwise not receive one. It is hoped that mothers in the community will become involved in the programme along with the student volunteers and that these mothers might eventually assume a leading role in the programme.

Volunteers and funds are desperately needed if the programme is to be successful. Anyone interested in giving about 1½ hours of their time a week should contact Debbie at 544-3482. Any club or organization wishing to make a small contribution to the programme should contact the above number for further information.

Jackson wins Senate seat

On Wednesday Susan Jackson, Arts '76 was elected ASUS senator for a two year term. She won 468 votes, while her opponent Patty Muldoon received 385 votes.

A controversy arose last week over this election because the Arts and Science executive had extended the deadline for nominations on the grounds that there was not enough publicity and not enough time for students to consider running.

Quebec law students upset

CUP — Quebec law students may have gained some support in their fight with the provincial Bar Association. The students are protesting bar admittance exams which 58 per cent of the students failed writing earlier this year. They say the exams are an attempt by the Bar Association to maintain its privileged position as a select professional group. Students must regurgitate their entire law school studies during three intensive days of tests.

Fearful their years of study may be in vain, Quebec undergraduate law students and graduates who have not been accepted to the bar sent an ultimatum to the Bar Association calling for the abolition of bar exams. Jean Moisan, batonnier of the Bar Association, refused to consider the demand.

McGill graduate students responded by boycotting the mid-term tests and setting up pickets outside the Quebec Bar School and the Palais de Justice in Montreal. They were joined by undergraduate law students from the University of Montreal and McGill, making a group of over 1000 demonstrators.

Carleton students lose field

CUP — Despite loud protests from Carleton University's residence students, construction on a new building on a residence playing field began last week.

Residence students had delayed construction for one week by occupying the field with continuous football games and campfires in order to bring their objections to the attention of the Building Advisory Committee (BAC). The students contended that the new classroom and office building would take up the only large playing field in the residence area of the main campus and would create unbearable noise.

The BAC however, said that costs and time factors prohibited the choice of an alternative site. Residents students agreed that further opposition would be futile, but they announced 17 demands which would minimize harmful effects of construction. All demands except one were approved by the committee.

Guy gets candlelit

Chris George, 1st year arts and science student, became an official Queen's woman Wednesday night at the Levana candle-lighting ceremony. According to the traditional reading of the Candle, Chris will marry an engineer and have no children. His mother always said he'd make a good-looking woman, but done up in a wig make-up, frilly blouse and skirt he didn't rate a second look.

Program trains 'para-lawyers'

(CUP) — The Dalhousie Legal Aid Service, operating in the north end working class area of Halifax, has for what may be the first time in Canada, trained and graduated 27 members of the community in professional para-legal work.

After five weeks of intensive legal training, the majority were put out to work as part-time volunteer counsellors to assist legal aid clients seeking divorces. Another two were hired on a full-time basis in the Dalhousie Legal Aid centre to assist, advise, research and counsel in family court problems.

The program concentrated on training divorce counsellors because the Local Matrimonal Counselling Association has just published a detailed do-it-yourself divorce kit to reduce the cost of legal action for poor people. The counsellors will help people use the kits. Eighteen of the graduates are working for the association on divorce cases out of the local family Service Bureau.

Meszaros works with York

(CUP) — Although unable to assume his teaching duties, emminent Marxist scholar Istvan Meszaros has nonetheless established a close liaison with York University since his surprise arrival in Canada on September 26.

Meszaros was hired by York but was refused an entry visa by the Canadian government. He arrived in Canada on a visitor's visa. His original application was rejected because immigration termed him a "security risk".

Meszros, Marxist theorist, literary critic, political scientist, teacher of philosophy and esthetics, comes from Hungary, but has been a British subject since 1965.

Seven influential University of Toronto and York faculty members on September 27 sent an open letter to Manpower and Immigration Minister Bryce Mackasey asking for a "comprehensive review" of the case.

Most cases of child abuse are reported by the parents, usually the guilty one. Greenland stated that many more fathers than mothers were the abuser, but he questioned such data on the grounds that the father would be more likely to take the blame. Of the total number of abusers less than one half are brought to court, of those only one out of 16 are convicted.

On a follow-up in 1972 of 96 children who were severely injured in 1970, it was found that 70 had not been helped by agencies. The chances were one in ten that a child which has been abused, will be abused again. If the child is hospitalized the chances change to one in five. Therefore, Greenland suggests, intervention is not helpful.

Greenland concludes that compared to other ways children die, such as car accidents and accidents in the home, child abuse is of great concern, but it is not a major cause of death.

Keith Farquhar poses two questions from the legal standpoint. What should be the goals of the law? Is the existing law consistent with these goals? He says the law should protect the child and alter the environment that caused the neglect. The law doesn't. But Farquhar says the problem is deceptive in its simplicity.

"How is child defined?" asks Farquhar. Legally a child is denied protection at 15 years but he does not have his full capacities until 18 years.

Farquhar does not see this as a problem since a person of 15 should be able to minimize the danger of harm to himself. What alternative does the law provide for the child? The realistic answer, says Farquhar, is in fact that the state can't provide an alternative for those over 15.

The child welfare act is very vague in defining when parents are incapable, what the necessary needs of a child are, or when a child has been neglected. Ontario seems to be confused about the issue, says Farquhar. But they are not alone in this. In fact, Farquhar stated, Ontario is advancedsince it takes into account emotional and mental damage along with physical abuse while neither Britain nor the USA does so.

Farquhar argues that the structure of the court hearing should be kept in cases of child abuse. While some people, notably social scientists, argue that the court hearing denies the child the assistance he needs and would prefer open discussion, Farquhar comments that the laws of evidence used in the court setting are a good place to start when deciding on the way to handle such cases. He does not think the laws of evidence restrict discussion but finds they keep the facts reliable. Farquhar wants them maintained but perhaps in a relaxed state giving an example of the hearsay laws. He maintains that the court setting is necessary to make it clear that taking achild from his family is a serious step and should be done so only when the alternative is better.

Farquhar also discussed the fact that the child has no independent representation. Since the child's interests may conflict with his parent's or the CAS (Children's Aid Society), he should in fact be assigned his own Lawyer.

The state has a duty to intervene in cases of child abuse but when, is so subjective, Farquhar concluded.

James Felstiner said that on his two years on the bench in family court, out of 350 child welfare cases he has not seen a battered child.

However, Felstiner, sees the role of the lawyer as difficult. On one side he represents his clients, the parents of the child; on the other side his own point of view may conflict if he sees the parents as incompetent. "Where does the lawyer's own point of view come into play?" Felstiner asks. He would like to see better preparation along these lines in law schools.

Most cases of child abuse are not contested, the facts are clear. This results in a lot of routine technical work for the courts which Felstiner says could be minimized.

But the thought of the CAS being part of the government instead of a private enterprise scared him. Felstiner says that better standards of care are found in institutions run privately. He believes the same would be true for child welfare agencies.

Mary Ellen Johnson explained that there are two kinds of registry for reporting cases of child abuse: an official one (this is the only kind in Ontario) and an unofficial record of suspected parents in individual hospitals and cities. The whole idea of registry brings out the cry of invasion of the civil rights of the parents. Johnson says that it is a question of whether the parents' invasion of privacy or the child's right to be protected is most important. Some people in society still see children as the "property" of their parents, who may treat the children as they wish.

The law states that any persons knowing of child abuse shall report it. But, Johnson states, there is no penalty for non-reporting. She sees the law as ineffective until a penalty is accorded to the failure to report a case.

Johnson says that the law gives people the right to physically discipline children as long as the force "doesn't exceed what is reasonable." She puts forth that if a person believes any assault against children is bad then "physical discipline of children must go by the boards." To give this idea more impact Johnson states that "the battered child will become a child batterer." And yet our society sets the example of violence and aggression as manly and good "Where does such aggression end and where does it begin?" Johnson asks.

During the discussion period with the audience numerous interesting points came out. Dr. Partington said that there has been " a huge improvement in the way children are being treated if we look back over the last century. Stating examples from the Indian (India) and Eskimo cultures, he stated that child abuse will be found anywhere you look for it.

Cyril Greenland asked, "Why report cases of child abuse?" He likened it to having fire alarm and no firemen. It doesn't seem to help the children. He set forth that we have a reporting system "to ease our conscience only".

When asked if having an unofficial list of suspected parents was perhaps a poor way of discovering whether the child was actually being abused, Dr. Partington answered that it is a must to try to spot the abuse the second time the child is brought for medical attention. "The third time a child goes to hospital", said Dr. Partington, "he is D.O.A. - dead on arrival."

Hazlett moonlighting?

Dear Editor,

For all people interested in the welfare of Kingston and the Islands, an interesting feature has turned up in the federal election. Dr. Hazlett recently said at an informal meeting in Leonard Hall on Oct. 3, 1972 that he would not make a definite statement to whether or not he would keep his practice if he were elected because of the effect it might have on his clientele.

When pressed on the issue, Dr. Hazlett said he would probably maintain ten to fifteen per cent of his present case load. When asked why he felt justified in doing this he explained that, by seeing patients he would keep in touch with his constituents.

He also said that the Hon. E. J. Benson, had devoted two hours each Saturday morning being available to hear constituents problems and Dr. Hazlett felt in his opinion this was adequate.

In his benevolence, rather than spending a mere two hours, he intends if elected, to spend the entire day seeing his 'patients'. What that means in effect is that a constituent who has a non-medical problem will have to battle with Dr. Hazlett's medical patients for time to speak with him about a particular constituency problem.

Even if Dr. Hazlett thinks he can obtain or ferret out constituency opinions with regard to present government policy by his contacts with his patients, one wonders how effective that can be, given the fact that he would probably be seeing a relatively small, static group of patients over time.

Our basic premise is that a member of parliament is 'hired' by his constituents on a full time basis as long as he is a member of parliament. This premise is supported by the present salaries of the members of the House of Commons.

What Dr. Hazlett is suggesting, is that he is capable of representing the interests of his constituents as well as holding down a part time medical practice (and be paid for both). We think that in some circles this would quite accurately be called "moonlighting". Is this a responsible attitude for a prospective member of parliament to take?

If Dr. Hazlett is so concerned with his practice of medicine perhaps he should stick to 'doctoring' and forget about 'politicing'.

Voting troubles

Dear Editor,

Living away from home while going to school is bound to have certain disadvantages, but occasionally these disadvantages arise in the form that you would not normally expect. I say this with reference to enumeration.

Since I am in Kingston for eight months out of twelve, I decided to vote in Kingston. Having missed the preliminary enumeration in Kingston, I had to go to the County Court House in order to have my name put on the list of electors. To do this one has to produce some form of identification, usually a driver's license, to the officer in charge. While I was there the presiding officer made reference to the fact that a large number of students were declaring Kingston as their home even though their drivers' licenses showed that their addresses were not in Kingston. He implied that this was some sort of offence though I find it hard to believe that many students would change their licenses before coming to school in September. Also before one's name could be placed on the list, one had to "declare" Kingston as one's home, as was mentioned above, and state the number of years he had lived here.

Similar stories can probably be told at other post-secondary institutions across Canada. The complaint that I have is why must one undergo all this static just to vote, particularly in light of the fact that an almost constant issue at election time is the poor voter turnout. I believe that voting is a right but the people at the County Curt House make you feel like voting is a privilege which they are nice enough to grant you.

Douglas Parker.

Cut pub profits

Dear Editor,

During the school week of Oct. 2nd to 6th, I, as did many other students, suffered a rather unfortunate experience. Apparently, the rather pompous and nervy clique known as the Pub Clan felt it necessary to charge a two bit fee to enter both rooms of the Pub.

If this puritanical non-profit organization requires a cover charge for patrons of both the band and the picnic room then those dildoes running the Pub had better cut their expenses, or should I say profits?

This particular demonstration of community-university co-operation is now ten (10) years old, the first such drive having taken place in 1962.

Preliminary figures indicate that this year's campaign results have already surpassed those of last year with some returns still to come.

Again, many thanks to Science Freshman.

A teacher tells the story about an eight year old boy who asked his father 'how he had come to be! His father answered that the stork had brought him. Pondering over this answer, the boy with a quizzical expression had then asked, 'how his father had come to be'. The boy was told that the stork had brought his father also. Still not satisfied, the boy asked 'how his grandfather had come to be.' Once again, the father replied to his son that the stork had been responsible for bringing his grandfather too.

During a Grade III show and tell class conducted by the teacher, this same boy stood up solemnly and announced to his schoolmates that "For the last few years there have been no normal sexual relations in my family."

This true anecdote is a good example of the communications gap that exists today between generations in their attitudes towards sex and the increasing sexual awareness in the young of our society. With this increased awareness and growing emphasis on sexual relations in western society, there has not been, until fairly recently, a commensurate increase in information centres dealing with all aspects and consequences of sexual interaction between males and females. Many sexual myths still abound, such as the misconception that while a woman is nursing a baby she cannot become pregnant. It would seem evident that many people are more ignorant about sexual facts than is commonly realized.

We are in an age in which sex has been bandied about, exposed, exploited and used as a religious and commercial football. This exploitation has made many people lose sight of the real and crucial issues facing the young today. We are inundated with moral arguments: the morality of abortion, the morality of contraception. Yet we forget or neglect the fact that we are living in a time in which pre-marital sexual relations have become an increasingly natural phenomenon. Therefore, whether or not it should be condemned is ancillary to the fact that there should be accesible information for those involved.

North American society needs to acknowledge this new sexuality. Until we do, the emphasis will be put in the wrong place. Instead of bemoaning the fate of a misguided generation or of a degenerate society, energy should be used in making sure that tragedies involving unwanted pregnancies and venereal disease do not occur. The facile argument that one should abstain from sexual activities, however fallid, is no longer meaningful. It avoids the main issue that many are not abstaining from having sexual intercourse solely within the confines of marriage - and have no desire to abstain. It then becomes a question of 'self-control or birth-control'. Only by acknowledging the situation will we be able to handle the ramifications of a liberated sexual behavior.

Queen's University serves as a good example in that five years ago the student residences were closed to members of the opposite sex. The radical change in policy aptly reflects the change in attitudes towards sexual behavior among the student population. Along with this change, a greater emphasis on sex education has become apparent with the publication and distribution of the birth-control handbook Current Methods of Contraception and the university's support of the Birth Control and Abortion Information and Referral Centre, located at 165 University Avenue - the Student's Affairs Centre. The opening of the Centre marked the largest step taken to acknowledge the situation and to provoke the necessary action.

This service was first conceived of by a student, Mary Ellen Marus who circulated a questionaire among the students which attempted to discover the need and efficacy of such a centre. Due to the support and financial aid of Planned Parenthood, AMS funding, the backing of key members of the University administration and a positive response to the questionaire, the Centre became a reality. Almost a year later it seems to be playing an increasingly more important role within both the University and Kingston communities.

The Centre remained open this past summer as an Opportunities for Youth Project. Their report submitted to Ottawa, at the end of the summer, was very well received pointing to the fact that such centres are being viewed in a more positive light.

The Centre is primarily a referral agency. Advice or information is given out as well as the names of professional persons and services which offer the right answers, whatever the question, be it about vasectomy, pregnancy tests or therapeutic abortions.

One of volunteers who has assumed co-leadership for the centre, Sharon Singer, commented that "Dispensing Birth Control information is the biggest function that we serve, since doctors are usually too busy." The myriad posters, pamphlets and models in the Centre testify to the availability of cnntraception information. John Seveigny and Richard Lacroix, the two other students taking charge agreed in stressing that "Abortion is only one form of birth control" and that it is only one of the many reasons people may use the Centre's facilities.

People desiring not to use their family doctor, or those who do not have a family doctor use the Centre for referral. If they are in need of medical attention, they will be referred to a doctor who will be sympathetic to their individual needs. If a caller is a Queen's student they would be referred to a doctor or nurse at the University Health Centre. The staff at the Birth Control Centre have contacts, or are familiar with doctors at every hospital and clinic in Kingston, and they are in no way restricted to the number of agencies where people can be sent.

As the Centre is becoming more established, greater involvement with the Kingston community is growing also. Miss Singer was very definite in stating that "We are a community service as well as a university service." In fact the Centre has been used by people from outside of Kingston who desire that their abortion be kept confidential and unknown to their families. For the same reason, women from Kingston will use the Centre to make arrangements for them with doctors in another nearby city such as Ottawa or Toronto. With such a system those in need of help can be almost guaranteed referral to sympathetic doctors, whatever their problem.

The Centre also deals with pregnant women, married or single who want to have their child and need to be directed to the appropriate agencies or doctor. The Birth Control Centre then does not maintain or indoctrinate anyone with one certain philosophy but is an agency designed to help those with any question or problem, whatever it may entail.

The Centre is staffed entirely by a core of twenty-five student volunteers who have available in their files any pertinent birth control information. If they do not have the necessary information, they will contact someone who will answer the caller's question. therefore, the Centre is effective in its role as 'middle man' - an agency which is able to simplify complicated processes and clear channels for those not experienced with the available services.

One of the most salient and exciting projects spearheaded by the young Centre has been the sponsoring of the 'Human Sexuality Course' offered every Tuesday night at 7 p.m. in Stirling "D" until November 21. It is a program designed to cover the wide range or areas involved in human sexuality. Included are such topics as Sex Roles; Human Sexual Response; Reproduction; Contraception; Venereal Disease; The Social and Individual Question of Abortion, and Population Control and the Individual. If participation is any worthwhile indication this course has tapped a need for increased awareness and comprehension on the part of Queen's students, in an area which previously had been given only cursory examination. The program has the full support of the University administration particularly with the help of Mr. Jim Whitley. (Assistant to the Principal). Partial financial assistance has been made available through the office of the Dean of Women.

Another outside activity organized by the Centre was a teach-in conducted during Orientation Week. Future projects include working in the North Kingston area, showing films and teaching health classes in the Kingston High Schools. Now approaching its second year of operations the staff are encouraged by the increase of persons using the Centre as a referral and information depot. Between November 15 and December 15, 1971, they received eighteen calls. Over a similar one month period between August 31 : calls were recorded.

Abortion: A Woman's Right To Choose

Excerpts from Allaine Armstrong

Politics exists in all realtionships involving power. When the women's liberation movement called for the repeal of Canada's abortion laws two years ago, we organized around the power of these laws over our reproductive lives.

In fighting for control of our bodies we took on one of the most basic ways that this society oppresses women, for without this basic right to choose whether or not we will bear children, women will never be free.

In short, control of our bodies is a precondition for our liberation as women, and it is this issue of control that lies at the core of the abortion debate.

But in reaction to our efforts, anti-abortion groups with enormous financial backing sprang up all over the country crying out in hysterical indignation over the rights of the fetus.

In manipulating the argument to centre around the rights of the unborn over the rights of the mother, these "friends of the fetus" have mystified the abortion debate to obscure the real issue.

For as long as you are led into arguing the value of one life as opposed to the value of another, you cannot resolve anything. At best you become stalemated; at worst, you feed into the hysteria generated by pictures of bloody fetuses, equating abortion with promiscuity, crime in the streets, social disintegration, euthanasia, etc.

Mass hysteria is a proven tool for people in power. In other words hysteria is an instrument of control. The real issue at stake in the abortion debate is not the value of one life over another.

The real issue is this; who is going to control the lives of whom, and for what reasons. We know, as women, that laws against abortion have been written, legislated and enforced by men in a male supremacist society, and that these laws function to take control of our lives, as women, out of our hands.

Under these conditions, we must necessarily take a subservient and independent position relative to men who maintain that power to direct our lives.

Every woman should have the right to choose whether or not she wants to be a mother. Every child should have the right to know that he or she is wanted.

The right of every woman to control her body, the key issue in the abortion question, is fundamental to the liberation of women, and thus of our society. For childbearing is simply one function of women; it should not be their punishment.

Self Control or Birth Control

Abortion: A Pro-Life View

In Kingston General Hospital in 1970, a total of 121 "Therapeutic Abortions" were performed; already in the first half of this year, there have been 204 abortions.

This increase in spite of the fact that in 1951, Dr. R. J. Heffernan of Tufts, had declared to the Congress of the American College of Surgeons that anyone who performed a therapeutic abortion was either ignorant of modern medical methods of treating the complications of pregnancy or was unwilling to take the time to use them.

May I add that we are not talking here about abortions for cancer of the womb or tubal pregnancy. Let us not hide the terrible realities of abortion in semantics.

We can no longer equate "therapeutic" with serious medical reasons to save the life of the mother; therapeutic abortion or perhaps more accurately, abortion free from impunity has become licerse to kill innocent unborn babies for socio-economic reasons.

I cannot help but wonder if those who go along with abortion really understand what they are giving approval to.

Those who advocate abortion say that within the pregnant woman, the fetus is not a human. We who are pro-life must convince others, with facts that fetal life is indeed human.

The definition of all human life depends on the finding of certain factors characteristic of life as opposed to death. The factors are: heart beat, blood pressure, maintenance of body temperature, production of carbon dioxide, utilization of oxygen and respiratory activity.

Experiments performed on aborted fetuses by a Dr. Westin in Stockholm, Sweden, showed that indeed fetuses under 12 weeks did have all the vital life signs. It is stated that the fetus is "not living", "a protoplasmic mass", "a potential human." If that be the case what are we?

How many of us present tonite, have reached our potential? The fertilized ovum is not a potential human but a human with vast potential.

. . . Abortion on demand is offered as a solution to overpopulation but overpopulation is a myth created and sustained mainly by Dr. Paul Erlish in his book "Population Bomb" which was churned out in a 3 week period. One would expect a book on so important a topic to have been preceded by months of research.

. . . The ecological issue has been tied in with population problems as a justification for abortion. However, environmental pollution cannot be reduced to mere numbers of people. Although more people do produce more pollution they also produce wealth and technology to combat it.

If population growth in North America were to cease today, rivers would still be ecological slums and the air would still be unbreathable until massive and costly efforts were undertaken to remedy deplorable conditions.

"Rhinoceros" at the Domino is ailing!

by Sandy Naiman

There were several intriguing elements at work in the Domino Theatre last Sunday night. The audience, a small one was, for the most part, favourably receptive to what I thought to be an atrocious production of "Rhinoceros", a potentially fascinating play by Eugene Ionesco.

This reception was much more intriguing to me than almost anything else in this season's opening production in the small and intimate studio theatre nestled at the base of Princess Street. As one young patron left the theatre two and a half hours after the play bad begun, he said, "It was well timed and well acted!" Yet just a few minutes earlier I had thought to myself that the entire production lacked form, pace and characterization.

Yet this young man had never been exposed to Ionesco's absurdist style before, he had told me, and so perhaps the play is what enchanted him so. Perhaps he could not distinguish the cleverness of the lines and Stu Barton's flaccid attempt at cleverness of production. For it was soggy, and the sets so divinely amateurish that in the first act, when several stage hands mosied, interminably, through the motions of changing the scene, this was one of the highlights of the production, although perhaps it should be called an anti-highlight of an anti-show.

It wasn't all bad, though. The second act, in its brevity, was by far, the best of the evening Brendan McConnell as Jean, who has to make an on-stage transformation from man to Rhinoceros, does so rather well. His gangrenous skin tones add far less to his character than his voice, which becomes gravelly and thick as he succumbs to a case of Rhinoceritis, a disease which eventually wipes out all but one man in a small French village. As well, Mrs. McConnell is able to thick his neck and suggest the heavy breathing and gait of the quadruped he imitates, rather nicely. But this strength is short lived. After a draggy first act, which featured a painful counterpointing tete-a-tete between Logician-Gentleman and Berenger-Jean, this second act was a pleasure in its shortness, simplicity and single minded objective.

Mr. Barton doubled up his cast in several cases. Graham Bock plays both the Logician and Mrs. Papillon with equal coolness and sardonicism. He is unable to distinguish between the role of the sterotypical philosopher blubberer of the first scene and the controlled unemotinal head of a law publishing firm in the second. Only his costume changes and it seems strangely apparent, after his first line in the latter role, that he is trying to sound rather like Marlon Brando as "The Godfather", yet henceforth he falls into his usual speech patterns which are more like Jimmy Stewart in "Harvey".

Coralie Bartley played both the housewife whose cat is trod to death by the first rhinoceros and the forlorn wife of Mr. Boeuf, who is shortly thereafter transformed into another of these hulking beasts. As seemed to be prevalent in the production, these two small roles were well performed because Miss Bartley did not have to sustain her character for too long a period of time. In the more demanding, longer roles of Berenger and Dudard, Karl Pruner and Peter Hartwell are simple unably unable to maintain their characterizations consistently and accurately enough to convince us that they believe in what they are supposed to be doing.

In the role of Berenger, one which demands an emotionally provocative portrayal as the one man who must accept a rationally ridiculous plight, to remain human amidst a society overrun with rhinoceri, Mr. Pruner plays too realistically his innate frustrations. Because the direction appeared to be totally simplistic and begign, both Mr. Pruner and Mr. Hartwell seemed to be reciting lines for which there seemed little purpose. An anti realistic approach, or any approach with a specific directorial motif was just not apparent in the acting, the design or any of the elements that a production should encompass.

Thus, the few gimmicks used, an isolated slide show to distinguish the African and Asistic rhinoceros and the sporadic use of a green spotlight when anyone was losing his humanness to the rhinoceros ridden world, just didn't work, were more incongruent and puzzling than any of the questions the play toys with.

This juxtapositiin of realism onto an unrealistic script creates many of the problems that are encountered when updating classical plays and when transposing live theatre to film. In this case we find the conflict between realism and anti realism lurking mysteriously backstage but never brought out into the footlights. Director Barton, however fails to come to terms with this potential conflict and instead skirts about the periphery of the predicament with gimmickry and theatrical superfluousness. Thus we are deprived of a potentially lucid, cleanly cut and definitive interpretation of a script which cries out for such interpretation.

As a result of the overall lack of cohesion on Barton's part and his obvious misunderstanding of Ionesco and his play, the acting problems are not entirely the responsibility of the performers. The cast is a young one, the designer was financially inhibited and the director just could not co-ordinate his cast or reconcile any structural elements in the overall production. So, the entire show is formless and inconsistent, even with the second act life. The occasional titter, the irregular applause is almost always due to Mr. Ionesco's dexterity as a playwrite, a but nothing more.

Perhaps a good veterinarian could prescribe some tonic, some elixir to bolster and even cure the evils that have beset this "Rhinoceros", but I cannot.

Finally, using my own personal barometer, a constant companion in critical ventures such as this one, and a mechanism some feel has replaced my heart, I can only say that last Sunday, at the Domino, it was very cloudy indeed.

"Rhinoceros" is playing Thursday through Sunday only, at 9.00 pm at the Domino Theatre, October 12 until October 15, 8 Princess Street.

Listen to Your World - records and trivia

Lorence Hud

This is like writing about the phantom as nobody seems to know very much about this guy. Granted, he was no showstopper when in town with the high - larious (weak I realize), Cheech and Chong. So it goes. The album, however, contains a few very memorable efforts and is well worth listening to.

Hud plays all of his own instruments, handles all the vocals, and wrote, arranged and produced the entire affair by himself - a fair accomplishment in itself. He sounds most at home playing country - flavored, light-hearted music; things like "Summer Rose" ("Put on Your Matching Scarlet Clothes Any you can be my Summer Rose", not bad, not bad) and "We'l Get That Good Feeling' Tonight" (need I say more?). Both are definitely good - time tunes, and he does them well. The one you may have heard on your radio - "Sign of the Gypsy Queen", is slightly heavier, but, at any rate, a potential foot - stomper. His forte is his voice (or voices) - quite melodic and easy to listen to (what do you want - "He Sings Well Together"?)

Ah, but the best for the last. The best song on the album is a classic good - timer called "Kind Hearted Woman". Get this:

"I don't need much
No,
Oh I'm easy to please,
Yea,
My Greatest Dream
Is a kind hearted woman
Makin' love to me.
Well it don't take a lot
To keep this poor boy satisfied,
All I need to make me smile
I s a kind hearted woman
Walking' by my side."

Trival? Perhaps. But who cares - you just can't beat a good time now can you?

SO . . . .it's not altogether wonderful, but for a first attempt it's not bad at all. In fact, the more I play it, the better it sounds

Just For A Chuckle

A few weeks back I caught this late movie on T.V. Some guy was having a go, at "weathering one of your proverbial storms" and came out in second place. Result - hero's boat self destructs and hero finds himself marooned on a heavenly tropical isle, uninhabited, of course, save the bananna trees and wild goats (standards in any isolated effort). As our hero munches on bananas and initiates attempts at domesticating the local goats and the movie gets progressively worse, my small mind wanders. . ."Hmmm, not a bad situation to be in," I mused, "but it's not quite perfect. What that guy needs is a woman (subtitute here as you will) with whom to enjoy this paradise isle, and some damn good music to keep him going.

Now say you've got a line on a nice little piece of real estate down in the heart of the South Sea tropics, and say you and your all - time favorite person are packing up and heading down for a year or two in the sun, and say you get to take ten of your all - time favorite records along as well.

Keeping in mind you only get ten choices, give it a shot. Not quite as simple as all that, but here's what I came up with.

1. Layla (and other assorted love songs), Derek and The Dominoes.

Well, what's to say? A classic, an epic, whatever, this is without a doubt the finest record I've ever come across, no exceptions, no omissions, no holds barred. All star lineup, all star tunes - it's a mistake to try and describe it. No tropical paradise would be complete without it.

2. Can't explain why. You's just have to take him along. Sort of be like leaving one of tour legs at home if you left ol' BOB. As for Blone on Blonde, it just happens to be my favorite. Sot here.

3. Every Picture Tells a Story - Rod Stewart

Play this and watch those goats head for the hills. It'll save you picking bananas too-they'll fall off the trees. And play it loud.

4. Chicago Transit Authority

No explanations needed, I'm sure. After all, it's got "Beginnings doesn't it? I thought you'd agree.

5. Five'll Getcha Ten-Cowboy

A pleasant slice in the history of music. Country music played with a beautiful touch. It deserves more exposure than it'll ever get. Just had to include it in the top five.

6. Alone Together -Dave Mason

Sometime when you feel put down, play "Shouldn't have took more than you gave" and sue if it doesn't give you a lift. Not an obvious choice, a personal choice.

7. The Allman Brothers Live at the Fillmore East

Excellent musicians. Another personal choice--possibly a bit more obvious. At any rate, it's a goodie, and I'd throw it in the old suitcase with no second thoughts. A tip of the bat to Duane Allman.

8. On the Threshold of a Dream - The Moody Bulues

Here we have the masters at creating the mood, in this case a bit of a dreamy one. Hmmm....- Profound. Musically, it's a very nice album--one yoy never get tired of. It satisfies that tiny ocrner of my head that cries out, for the sound of tasteful orchestration.

9. Tom Rush

Another choice that has more to do with personal history than anything outstanding about Tom Tush himself. But then again, Tom Rush has a sort of haunting voice that you can't forget--no matter how you feel about the record. I couldn't have left this one off the list, I guess. Just a whim.

10. Sail Away - Randy Newman

I offer no justification. I just happen to love his approach, respect his genuis, and agree with his point of view. "You can leave your hat on," indeed.

So there it is. Oh, by the way, if in checking your very own list you happen to find Ed Sander's "Beer cans on the Moon", take something for it, and start all over again.

Critics Forum: The Juilliard String Quartet

Editor's Note: From time to time, two people will be sent to cover the same event. Each will write articles and this will serve to present two different points of view to the reader. Hopefully, any arbitrary work of art will be presented in a truer perspective.

by Michael Hodgson

On October 5, the Juilliard String Quartet opened the Grant Hall series on concerts. The program began with the C major quartet by Johann Nepomuk Hummel, a contemporary of Beethoven and his rival in Vienna as a pianist and improviser.

In his own day, Hummel was very popular: Beethoven, Schubert, and Schumann all expressed their admiration for his compositions.And indeed, his teachers were the best: Salierei, Clementi, aydn, and Mozart!

The Juilliard Quartet played this music with great warmth and rhythmic vitality. The sound was beautifully blended and balanced. I remember especially the graceful rise and fall of the violin melody in the Adagio; but, frankly, I wonder whether this rather empty music is worthy of such a faithful performance.

Ending the first half was the second Quartet by Bela Bartok, who often confessed the debt his quartets owed to Beethoven's example.

This anguished and desolate music was played with a staggering technical facility and a wonderful devotion to the score that allowed us to ease into the darkest recesses of Bartok's very personal work.

The second half of the concert consisted of one work: the second of Beethoven's three Rasoumovsky guartets. The Juilliard Quartet has performed the complete cycle of Beethoven quartets several times in the United States: this music is very close to them, and they clearly made it the focal point of this concert.

There is no doubt that here was the finest playing of the evening, precise, filled with dynamic contrasts and rhythimic interest.

The long Adagio was beautifully shaped, its deliciously phrased violin melody absolutely unforgettable! And the incisive playing in the Presto finale set one's heart pounding and one's head whirli g!

The Juilliard String Quartet deserves its reputation. Here are four superb technicians, four great musicians.

by L. Melnych

The longing for true greatness is seldom realized; it sleeps quietly beneath the noisy subways of your life; but last Thursday night, the Juilliard String Quartet surrounded itself in triumphal mimickry, with four dainty wizards disguised as musicians, albeit grat ones.

A difficult program, so hard to please everyone these days, gives me confidence in the magic of music. Hummel, Bartok and Beethoven; to the player, such divine variance of technique and style; to the listener, only pure tonality, devoid of every formal label, stretching across the emotions and arriving at some point of critical balance.

The delicate precision of string quartet playing in numbing to every artist's hopes; the Juilliard Quartet glided over the rubble with a softness that touched upon the superb.

Such sweet sound, always desecrated by formal regulations, a thousand years of piano lessons and tea, came forth, touching the soul, each moment, with novocane needles.

The brain-children of phenomena put on the paper the piercing mystique of that which we call music. Now, "performers" with Picasso instruments, have appeared; they could have been wearing masks, these Dominican enchanters. Instead, they wore bodies.

I will say this only once, for depression erodes my gay fleece: "few artists have proved to be ultimately negligible" on so large a scale as Rachmaninoff metaphorically speaking, he shut himself up in a dark room, frightened himself to death, then translated his soulstorm into the language of music.

I look forward to the time "when people will be ashamed to listen to Scriabin, Tchaikovsky, Rachmaninoff, Death and Transfiguration, and the symphonies of Mahler."

Clap...clap...clap...Grant Hall bespeckled like a golden fish, its belly stomped with a thousand wooly legs laid sacred blessings on charisma's door, while bloodpatched curtains yawned greeting in tired delusion for neo-tabacco classicism.

Everyone applauded the great clusters of smog that hung over the tonic chords in anticipation of body's release.

Something I learned today: each piece of music has a point, a culminating funnel breathing tinsel raindrops, mountain-shaped to the dimension of perspective; Juilliard in volcalise, faint reminders of a youth's plunge, greys the hair, dedications to Etheros, symbol of the One Woman.

I saw the division of ecstacy crushed in feather weight, with solid footing snatched away, falling down splinters into the repeated process of external vision; gone was classicism, romanticism, modern, a tonal, halftonal shreds of bitter days spent isolating Gasparde de la Nuit; heavens in anger and feear, foam, let there be no more mastery.

No emotion knows better than chaos the bliss of a trophied music, crystallized in marble air, with ripples spilling over into the alter-universe.

There is a space between the formal line, that keeps the eye's colours distinct; the Quartet has fled along this slivered plateau, the close shave between goal pillars of a homogeneous mixture.

We all seek an earth to stand upon with trust and compassion; the Juilliard ripped that chord.

Tennis Gaels 2nd in OUAA Finals

The Queen's tea ran into a talent-laden U. of T. team on the week-end which proved too powerful for our squad. The U. of T. managed to gain 23 out of the possible 24 points. Queen's finished second with 15 points, and York placed third with 14 points. Other competing teams were from Carleton and Trent. In the individual championships which were decided by a play-off caused by a three-way tie, Tony Pospisill of York defeated John McFarlane of Queen's. Prior to this play-off McFarlane had defeated Pospisill, but then was upset by Steve Stegal of U. of T. Stegal in turn lost to Pospisill thus forcing the play-off. All in all, player-coach John McFarlane considered it a very successful season for the team.

The football Gaels have their backs to the wall now. After dropping Saturday's disaster to the Carleton Ravens 26-23, Queen's is faced with the unenviable prospect of having to win both their remaining games to make the play offs. They meet the Ottawa U. GeeGees tonight in an 8:00 pm. encounter at Landsdowne Park in Ottawa.

If they can come back and defeat both the Blues and Ottawa, then the Gaels will be in first place with a 4-2 record and have chance to play all their playoff games (except for the last two) at home.

If the Gaels lose one of the two games, then the playoff situation could be bleak indeed. As defensive captain Gord Squires stated Monday night, "They're all playoff games now."

The Gaels will have the services of Dave Hadden for the full game tonight, which whould help out some, and Tom Dickenson is expected to be back in the lineup after recovering from a knee injury suffered the last time Queen's invaded Ottawa.

Look for both Dickenson and Greg McNamara to play somewhre. Defensive End Greg Anderson, a strong pass rusher, will probably be back in action after sitting out three weeks with a cracked bone in his foot, but Don Smith, a tower of strength at middle guard in the first four games, will miss this one with a neck injury.

The Gaels will need a big rush to contain Don Smith and hurry his passing, but will have to be conscious of fullback Neil Lumsden. The big rooke has accumulated 354 yards on 57 carries, 9 yds more than Queen's Brian Warrender, to lead the OUAA- East in rushing, and 34 points to lead in scoring as well. Konrad Kozak is also a serious rushing threat.

The Gaels are going to need a big team effort to beat the GeeGees. They better get it.

Looking elsewhere, Rugby finally got the message and played like a team (I understand that some of the 1st XV were a little incensed over last Friday's "From the sidelines..." comments ...if 52-11 wins are the result, I'll keep you mad all year.) with obvious results. Well done, gentlemen! Soccer also appears to have found the winning path after a slow start.

Davy Robertson and company are now hitting the net with shots, and the defense has steadied down considerably since the opening swing through Toronto.

A small correction to the Golf story in Tuesday's paper; the winning team was from Waterloo, not Toronto. Holiday weekends always garble lines of communication.

The women host the OWIAA Tennis finals today and Saturday.

The remaining games of the sectional semi-finals will be played off during Friday morning, starting at 9:00 am., with action at both the Arena and West Campus courts.

If the sectionals can be completed quickly enough, competition in the final round-robin tournament will commence in the afternoon. At the present time, the standings in the Eastern Sectional are as follows: U. of T. - 16pts; Queen's -8 pts; Laurentian -6pts. In the West, McMaster leads with 16 points while Western has 14 points. Toronto, Mac, Queen's and Western look to have a good chance to qualify on the basis of these results.

The CIAU Sailing Championships at RMC succumbed to the high winds of Thanksgiving weekend with just three races on the books. At that point, Queen's is second to U. of T.

The remaining races will be sailed off in two weeks, with many of the crews competing in the Wayne State Regatta in Detroit this weekend. Queen's is the defending champion in that one.

If our sailors can win the CIAU title, they will get a trip to Texas in the spring to compete in the North American Intercollegiate Championships. That'd be a nice post-exam break.

No prediction this week, folks. I'm beginning to think I may be jinxing the Gaels.

The individual golf playoffs have now reached the quarterfinal stage. Bill White defeated Mike Clair; D. Miller defeated G. Thomson; S. Blake defeated B. Sedgewick; and T. Bainbridge defeated Ron White. Bill White will now meet Dave Miller and S. Blake will meet T. Bainbridge in the semi-finals which must be completed by October 19. The team competition was won by Commerce '73 and Commerce '74 two weeks ago.

The relay events were held last Wednesday at the West Campus and PHE atoned for their poor showing in the monsterball tournament by winning all six of the events. Law '74 was second in the meet.

The indoor softball league is well under way now with a total of 18 teams competing in 3 divisions of 6 teams each. In league A, Arts '74 and Electrical engineering are leading with 2 points each. In league B Civil and Math have 6 points and Medicine and Commerce '74 have 4 points each. In League C, Arts '73, Science '76, Chemical engineering and Law '75 all have 2 points apiece.

The first draw for the horseshoe tournament is now posted on the notice board in the locker room. Entrants should try to complete thir first round matches as soon as possible. Also posted is the draw for the first round of the singles squash tournament. The first round must be completed by October 19.

Competition in Interfaculty softball, paddleball, tennis doubles and harrier will begin on Monday.

On Tuesday evening there will be a meeting for all the unit athletic sticks. This meeting will be held in Seminar A of the Physical Education Centre beginning at 7 p.m.

Monday's harrier races should be very interesting. Bews executive director Bob Carnegie told me that the combined team of Civil and Math expect to enter about 130 members of their team in the competition. In other words, the more entries you have, the more points for your unit. Buses will leave for Glen Lawrence Golf Club Monday afternoon at 4:30. The cross country race will cover about two and a half miles.

Don't forget to keep checking the notice boards in the locker room of the Physical Education Centre for information about upcoming events. Many team entry sheets are posted there and if you are interested, please sign up. A reminder as well to all athletic sticks: all entry forms for all upcoming events must be in by the specified deadline; absolutely no entries will be accepted afterwards. Final entries for the team sports of hockey and inner-tube waterpolo are due on October 25 so get them in now.

For all Queen's students interested in the athletic programs offered by the University, there are two shows of interest to you on CFRC: College Sport Today, Thursdays at 7:15p.m., and Sunday Sports Roundup, Sunday evenings at 7:30 p.m.

Due to an unfortunate error in scheduling, the tennis tournament was not held last weekend. It will be held this weekend, Sunday October 15, from 12:00 to 6:00 p.m. We apologize to those people who shwed up last Sunday and hope you will come out agin.

Basketball and badminton continue on Tuesday and Thursday nights respectively.

A paddleball clinic will be held on Wednesday, October 18, between 9:30 and 10:30 pm. If you haven't played before, make sure you come on out and learn. Entries for the tournament close on Friday October 20, and games begin the following week.

If you wish to enter a sport or have any questions, feel free to contact your faculty representative.

Canada: Cutback in employment sends jobless rate to 7.1%

OTTAWA — A greater than usual cutback in employment has sent the underlying employment trend up sharply to 7.1 per cent for September, compared with 6.7 per cent in August of this year. This represents the highest rate of unemployment for September in eleven years.

The figure of 459,000 people unemployed or looking for employment in real terms represents 5.2 per cent of the labour force compared with 5.4 per cent in August.

The adjusted figures show more clearly the employment situation, eliminating the seasonal variations which affect it and is the best indicator of underlying slack in the economy.

The actual number of people employed dropped from 8.77 million in August to 8.38 million in September. Unemployment showed an increase in the Atlantic Provinces and British Columbia, and decline in Quebec and the Prairies and held steady in Ontario. Unemployment of women and workers between the ages of eighteen and twenty-four increased overall but decreased for men over twenty-four.

Bryce Mackasey, Minister of Manpower and Immigration stated that the figures were not alarming but that they had some very positive points. Notably, he mentioned that the hard-core unemployed, those remaining without jobs for seven months or more, reached the lowest since November 1970.

Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau stated that he was puzzled by the figures, but that he would continue policies that have produced a high rate of economic growth and a high degree of job creation.

David Lewis, speaking in Sudbury, stated that Trudeau's government is responsible for "record unhappiness of hundreds of thousands of Canadians". He claimed that giving tax concessions to large corporations in the hope that they will create jobs, has backfired.

Lewis called for tax cuts of up to eight per cent, favouring lower and middle income people and a mass injection of funds, in the form of a $500 million winter youth employment program.

Progressive Conservative Party Leader Robert Stanfield stated that the high rate of unemployment would cost taxpayers $1 billion this year. He pointed out that if this figure continues along a trend, a "terrible winter lies ahead."

LETHBRIDGE, Alta. — Robert Thompson, former federal Social Credit leader, running as a Conservative in the British Columbia riding of Surrey-Whiterock, announced that if the Progressive Conservative Party formed a minority government, they would consider a coalition with the Social Credit Party.

"Would you like to know why I don't pay taxes?"

This, he stated would depend now on the feelings of Social Credit leader Real Caouette.

TORONTO — Premier William Davis has announced the formation of an advisory task force on housing. The new body will be reassessing the role of the government in the provision of both public and private housing.

Eli Comay, a Toronto planning consultant, and professor of environmental studies at York University is to head the Ontario Advisory Task Force on Housing Policy.

The task force will also be investigating the delineation of responsibility for housing between the government and the business and private sectors of the economy.

HAMILTON — In what is believed to be a policy to avoid being called a corporate welfare bum, the Steel Company of Canada has withdrawn its applications for both federal and provincial assistance in building its Quebec steel making complex. Applications for financial aid were submitted to the two governments several weeks ago but withdrawn recently as the company decided to "go it alone".

World: Communist China gaining recognition

HONG KONG — West Germany is expected to sign a treaty shortly that would establish diplomatic relations with Communist China. Walter Scheel, West German Minister of Foreign Affairs is presently in China and is expected to issue a communique announcing recognition.

Diplomatic relations were established between Japan and Communist China recently in a communique signed by Chinese Premier Cou En-lai and Japanese Prime Minister Kakuei Tanaka. The agreement was that Japan recognize the regime of Mao Tse-tung as the sole legal government of China and that they recognize Peking's stand that Taiwan was an "inalienable part of the territory of the People's Republic of China."

The West German move would leave the United States in the position of the only major country without formal ties with China.

PARIS — The third day of renewed talks between United States and North Vietnam negotiators met with a stepped up tempo and focused on the North Vietnamese proposal for the makeup of the Saigon government after the war. This is the nineteenth session of private talks between Henry Kissinger, representing the United States and Le Duc Tho and Xuan Thuy of North Vietnam.

The Communist position on the proposed new government was firm that President Nguyen Van Thieu and his Administration would have to resign in favour of a three part coalition, representing the Saigon Administration, The National Liberation Front and those Vietnamese adhering to neither group.

Kissinger is presently making inquiries as to how the new government would work, who the Communists would accept from the Thieu Administration and how the third part of the coalition would be chosen.

ADEN — North Yemeni forces have captured the Red Sea island of Kamaran from South Yemen after extensive naval and air attacks, marking the third week of hostilities between the two powers. The North Yemeni embassy in Beirut issued a statement claiming that North Yemeni forces took control of the island at the request of the inhabitants. A South Yemeni minister stated that the South Yemen government would use all possible peaceful measures to regain the island but that if these fail force would be used.

UNITED NATIONS — The world organization has published a financial statement showing that twenty-three member countries have made no payments in 1972 toward their $213 million budget. As a result, UN officials state that they may have trouble meeting the November payrolls.

On October 1, it was estimated that almost $100 million was owed for the 1972 budget and for previous years. Of this amount $43 million is regarded as uncollectible.

LONDON — Sir John Betjeman has been appointed personal poet to Queen Elizabeth, succeeding Cecil Day who passed away last March after serving four years in the position.

As Poet Laureate, Betjeman has promised an onslaught of verse against the "modern concrete jungle", about saving what is left of England from demolition and about the protection of trees and buildings.

This marks a distinct departure from his predecessors, who from the seventeenth century were generally expected to churn out odes celebrating such royal occasions as births, marriages, and coronations.

Behind the Lines

It's about time

by Bob Mutrie

The world has ignored, for three decades, a nation of eight hundred million people, a nation with a 2.6 million man army and a 2,700 plane Air Force, a nation which has entered the nuclear age as an atomic power; and we are only now getting around to establishing formal ties.

Since its violent inception in 1949, the People's Republic of China has been a vital global source of power, throwing tremendous influence on world events, aiding other troubled nations, spreading the Communist doctrine of Mao Tse-Tung and his Little Red Book, yet it has been fighting an uphill battle to gain actual world recognition.

It took until October 1970 for forty-five of the world's nations to formally recognize the regime of Mao Tse-tung. Britain was the first European nation, having established diplomatic accord with Peking as early as January 1950. But the rest of the Western World waited for twenty years, extremely aware of the Peoples Republic of China, uneasily watching its shadow lengthen, yet refusing to formally recognize what they had for years informally recognized.

Not until October 1970, when Canada forged ties with Communist China, was the period of stagnation that was epitomizing her foreign policy finally broken through. It was then that a flurry of nations began to establish formal relations, following Canada's lead, but even today only seventy-eight countries have developed ties with the Republic of China. There are 132 members in the United Nations alone, not to mention other countries which are not members.

It is abominable that nations of people, an integral part of the global community, can so ruthlessly be ignored and alienated from that of which it is already a member. It may seem superfluous to say that a nation should be recognized as a member of the world order, but in actual fact too many countries have actually been dismissed and excommunicated by other nations.

The time has come to recognize the fact that all countries and all regimes have as much right to exist in this world as the oldest nations and that they too can be an inalienable part of the human race.

Welcome to the world, Mao!

It turned out to be a long wait for the concert on Thursday night. This crowd of students made it inside the door only to be subjected to two more delays. For details see pages 6 and 7.

Ontario students support fee strike

by Jennifer Grass

Ontario students gave strong support to the referendum held last week on the fee strike. Available results indicate that 16 out of 19 schools responded with a 90 per cent yes to OFS demands and a 6 per cent yes on a fee strike. Returns came in from all but three universities but the OFS was reluctant to release total figures.

Only Trent University turned down the strike. But they gave their support to a separate student council referendum calling for a peaceful demonstration to be held at Queen's Park at the opening of the legislature.

Queen's, the University of Toronto and the University of Western Ontario showed the biggest turnout and the strongest yes vote.

R. McNie, Minister of Colleges and Universities said in an interview in Toronto on Saturday that he was willing to talk about the student aid program but he would not budge on the tuition fee issue. "Its a fact of life," McNie commented. "But in the event of a fee strike the government would not urge any specific action on the university. We'll leave it up to the universities and students to work it out themselves," he added.

McNie also remarked that the referendum was like a "vote in front of a supermarket asking the customers if they want lower prices."

He denied that the OFS has been negotiating with the government. In response to this charge Craig Heron, co-ordinator of the OFS pointed out that it is "rather hard to meet with a constantly shifting administration."

In the past 2½ years there have been 4 ministers including the present premier Bill Davis, John White, George Kerr and R. McNie. Changes in government departments have also presented students with a moving target. Universities have been subject to the Department of Education, the Department of University Affairs and presently to the Department of Colleges and Universities.

McNie called for fuller documentation of the hardships of students as well as a nation wide review of student aid programs. Heron replied by accusing McNie of "shifting the blame to get the pressure off himself."

Wally Palmer, vice-president of the AMS was non-commital on the subsequent action to be taken now that support has been gained for a strike.

"We can't do anything in isolation and yet we aren't going to blindly follow what the OFS does either," Palmer said.

"It all depends on the government now but we may just have to accept their promises for next year," he added.

Campus centre committee wants student opinion

by Bob Mutrie

With the fast pace of change which has been occurring in the university community's needs and desires, the University Centre Users' Committee has decided to quicken the rate of development of plans for the proposed project before they are faced with obsolence.

In a meeting of intensive soul searching, the committee finally decided that the plans for the University Centre, "must be gotten off the ground", and discussed ways and means of testing student opinion on the matter.

While discussing what students really wanted the new union to be, the Users' Committee decided that this must be taken into account but that what future students will want may be totally different.

The committee expressed disappointment, however, in the little feedback that they have received from students after articles discussing the new Centre were published in the Gazette and the Journal during September.

A general meeting to explain what has been accomplished to date and to encourage some replies from the university community was announced by the committee. It was decided that the meeting would be on Thursday October 26. In addition, certain of their regular meetings involving particular aspects of the Centre will be announced. This Monday at 12:30, there will be a discussion of some of the responses that have been received by the committee.

The Users' Committee decided that it would allot a further five to six weeks to determine what spaces and what groups will be included in the new Centre.

CIC to push independence issue

E.A. Goodman, Chairman of the Committee for an Independent Canada spoke to about 50 students at Queen's on Thursday.

"It is the purpose of the C.I.C." he said, "to get a discussion going on the independence issue in this election."

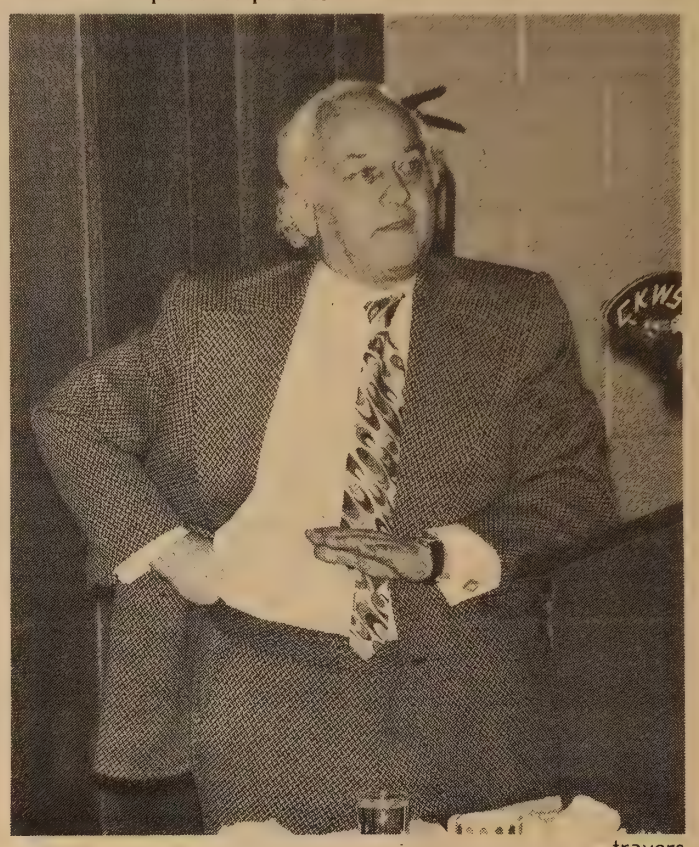
The C.I.C., with a membership of about 300,000, is not backing a political party but is supporting individual candidates in some ridings.

"The Trudeau government has given the country a non-policy on this basic problem," Mr. Goodman said. He pointed out that the government enacted no legislation to review further foreign take-overs of Canadian companies and showed itself unwilling to regulate the activities of foreign owned corporations already operating in Canada.

"The review process that the government talked about," Mr. Goodman said, "would have effected less than 15 percent of the foreign investment made in this country annually. This is an indication of the continentalist position taken by the Liberal government."

Economists have come to realize that uncontrolled foreign investment is a basic cause of this country's economic difficulties. Canada has the largest per centage of foreign investment per capita of any industrialized nation. "We have developed a distorted lobsided economy," Goodman says.

To this point in the campaign Mr. Goodman thinks that none of the party leaders has taken an acceptable position on nationalist policies.



"Mr. Trudeau can't talk about it because of his record, so he says it isn't an issue. Mr. Stanfield has expressed general support but has not come out in clear, unequivocal terms. Mr. Lewis is not prepared, for example, to take a position on independence for Canadian unions. The NDP is controlled by the unions and two thirds of Canadian unions are controlled in the U.S. To have corporations controlled in Canada and unions controlled in the U.S. would be disasterious."

However, Mr. Goodman said that there are candidates in each of the three parties who have demonstrated their support for Canadian independence polices.

"Although the Liberals have Mitchell Sharp, the chief advocate of the sell-out, they also have Mel Hurtig, co-Chairman of the C.I.C., running for them in Edmonton. The N.D.P. has Pauline Jewett. The P.C.'s have Jim Gillies and Flora MacDonald."

Mr. Goodman said he came to speak at Queen's because, "If I had one vote that would elect anyone in Canada to Parliament, I would use it in Kingston and the Islands to elect Flora MacDonald."

He said it is vital to elect people like Flora because of "the strong input they can make when the matter gets into the House."

Whitham acclaimed AMS rep

In assuming the position of ASUS rep-at-large, my primary interest will be the question of financing post-secondary institutions. I support the demands of the Ontario Federation of Students as well as withholding my tuition in January 1973 because I sincerely believe that recent government action has resulted in accessibility becoming a platitude rather than a reality. I am also concerned about the future of the university community especially in light of the Wright and the Peitchinis Reports. If the financial recommendations become policy, the ensuing tuition increases will render the university unattainable for the majority.

I compliment the students of Queen's in their overwhelming support of the OFS, however if the government is to respond to our demands we must enlist the support of the public. Only then will the provincial government consider us a credible force.

I will also direct my attention to improving relations between Kingston and the university. This ideal can be achieved by opening campus activities to the city and also, more specifically, by arranging seminars to discuss and articulate the problems. Hopefully Queen's will become an extension of the community rather than a threat to it.

Finally, I wish to emphasize that ASUS rep-at-large must serve the students. I am more interested in expressing your opinions than solely my own and for that reason I am interested in hearing from you.

Sailors a close second

Defending champions, Queen's Sailing Gaels placed a close second place at the Wayne State Invitational Regatta in Detroit this weekend. Lead by Evan Swan and John Readshaw, the sailors tied with U of T on points but lost to their Canadian counterparts on the basis of number of races won. Third place went to Notre Dame.

Eleven schools from Canada and the US midwest competed in the event racing in Flying Juniors. The sailors faced winds of 12 - 15 knots and a strong current on the Detroit River.

Thompson talks at Co-op

by Steven Winnett

Mr. Lars Thompson, NDP candidate in the forthcoming federal election, joined the students of Science '44 Co-op's Central Division for dinner last Tuesday night, where the personable, articulate 39-year-old professor of education fielded questions on a variety of election issues.

Thompson argued that NDP national leader David Lewis' attack on "corporate welfare bums" was not a dead issue, but one of continuing concern to voters. He cited later the example of local fibremill workers. The textile industries receive no tax concessions, and, hence they have been badly hurt by changes in the exchange rate. The problem is a wider one than that of a few corporations getting rich. Rather, it lies in the nature of the Canadian economy. The biggest tax concessions go to capital-intensive, raw materials industries - and not to labour-intensive industries.

Thompson was also asked to assess the personalities of the national party leaders as prime ministers. He stated of Mr. Trudeau that, although he had been at first impressed by the Prime Minister's "candour", he was bothered by the PM's "cavalier attitude" on matters of deep concern to some people, which he credited to a "spoiled-child syndrome".

As for Mr. Stanfield, Thompson stated that despite a weak public image, he was a much warmer man than Trudeau in one-to-one situations, and if elected Prime Minister, "could probably be very effective with a cabinet".

It was on this issue of personality that Thompson had high praise for the NDP leader. Mr. Lewis, he said, had made it clear that "the real issue is having the strength and courage to carry through the things you stand for. Mr. Standield doesn't strike me as having this kind of strength." Mr. Lewis was praised for his "toughness in a crunch", whereas Trudeau was blasted for having the wrong kind of toughness.

Environment problems demand interdisciplinary approach

by Raj Anand

The increasing complexity of inter-relationships between diverse fields makes it impossible to solve a real problem today without relating it to everything it can possibly affect.

With this idea in mind the Law Students' Society selected the panelists for last Thursday's Majority Rights Symposium on "the adequacy of laws as a solution to Canada's environmental dilemma." The participants included J. Carton, the director of legal services for the Department of the Environment; T. Bacon, the head of the group within the External Affairs Department dealing with environmental matters; H. Tsurumi, from the Department of Economics at Queen's; D. Severs, an active member of PACE; Ms. Marie Corbett, a lawyer with the Environmental Law Association; and Dr. R. Clark, from the Department of Chemical Engineering here.

T. Bacon opened the discussion by providing a good deal of the international background on environmental problems. He spoke primarily about the Stockholm Conference on the Human Environment and the declaration which resulted from it.

The conference, which set the stage for developments in environmental control measures, brought together 110 nations to discuss means of establishing lines of cooperation between countries, particularly in the fields of trans-national and marine pollution.

A major decision which Canada had to make was what to concentrate on in its draft of a united declaration. Bacon's group concluded that state responsibility would be the central theme. The "environmental integrity" of other nations had to be protected and respected.

This idea was embodied in Principles 21 and 22 of what eventually became the Declaration of the conference. It was an important consideration in talks on, trans-boundary pollution between Canada and the United States, which focussed on the coastal waters of the two countries. In these areas "the carriage of oil is a hazardous activity."

The same emphasis on cooperation and mutual respect was evident in the Declaration's treatment of marine pollution. What is at stake, Bacon said, is the "common heritage of manking." The next step, of course, is to make similar progress in other areas of the atmosphere.

Speaking of the conference in general, Bacon said "we have made some progress with the Declaration, in international law jurisdiction over the environment, but we have a long way to go in this respect." Law is a means of forcing environmental improvement, but progress depends more on real agreement among nations than on mere proclamations. This "real agreement," in turn, is by necessity a product of hardheaded political bargaining and even emotional attitudes. Bacon revealed the diversity and complexity of carrying this through.

J. Carton, the next speaker, explored the environmental legislation by the Canadian government. He traced pollution back to the Industrial Revolution, the World Wars, and even to "mankind as a species, (which) has always been the prime polluter." In his opinion, however, it is also the mark of mankind in a civilized society that we have laws as a means of reversing this process.

The result of such attitudes was the formation of the Department of The Environment in 1970. It brought into effect three major pieces of legislation: the Fisheries, Canada Water, and Clean Air Acts.

Carton discussed four main types of environmental legislation: prohibitive, preventive, remedial and punitive. While the last seems the most effective in light of the drastic pollution situation in some places, Carton was apprehensive about its merits. "Punitive action is no means of stopping pollution. Unless there are astronomical penalties, the punitive aspect cannot have great effect.

"In fact," he continued, "the government may find it desirable and necessary to consider using criminal law. But this will defeat our purpose in the same way Prohibition did."

It is significant that the remaining types of solutions through laws are, once again, ones involving cooperation. Without stiff penalties, compromise is necessary. Everybody wants a solution to the environmental problem, but each group has a different solution. Here it became obvious that while laws are important in tackling the problem, there are so many forces interacting that laws alone are insufficient.

This conclusion was formally stated by D. Severs, a representative of the Petroleum Association for the Conservation of the Environment (PACE), which strives for environmental control within the oil industry. "There is no shortage of laws," he commented. "Laws are a major means of environmental protection, but not the only one."

To illustrate his attitude toward laws as a solution, severs summarized how his group looks at possible legislation. There are two major questions to be asked: is the law applicable, and is it practical? To be practical, it must be enforceable; the timing must be correct; the benefits must be greater than the cost. Only through a thorough understanding of exactly what the problem is can its many manifestations be seen. There are political and social consequences, for example, when a factory is closed down.

In this context, Severs rejected the idea of shrinking the economic output as a means of stopping pollution. Expansion in the power industry is necessary if sewage and sulphur recovery plants are to be built. Furthermore, unemployment is already serious and production cuts would only aggravate it.

The three most important needs beyond laws, he argued, are incentives to stop pollution, education, and publicity. Although he felt the environment could be saved, his solutions represented a more comprehensive and far-reaching effort than "mere" law-making.

A more pessimistic view of the ability of our society to clean up the environment was taken by Mr. Tsurumi, an econometrist. Our capitalist system, he argued, is geared more to disposable, non-biodegradable, unfiltered, and efficient commodities than those suited to reducing pollution. He cited plastic milk containers and automobile emission control devices as examples. Is the solution a change in our economic way of life? H. Tsurumi said that this is not the answer. The Russian Communist system, for example, is no alternative because of its insistence on high production levels. No solution was offered.

Ms. Corbett spoke about yet another aspect of the idea of laws as a means of improving the environment: environmental activism. What channels are available to the citizen to voice his concern?

Basically, there is the option of acting inside or outside the system: running for office, or forming a private group such as the Environmental Law Association (E.L.A.), of which Ms Corbett is a member.

A citizen may present a grievance to the government or to a group such as the E.L.A., which is simply a private collection of individuals with more resources than the average individual to fight an environmental suit. "On the whole, as a citizen you cannot undertake any major litigation. I submit that you can be very effective, but you would be most effective in a group."

The final speaker was Prof. Clark. "In view of exponential growth and industrial expansion," he asked rhetorically, "can our environmental problems be solved by law-making?"

"I believe the answer is yes."

In justifying this conclusion, Dr. Clark's major point was simply "Everything in this world is related to everything else." In placing pollution-reducing gadgets on cars, we are not curing the problem at its roots. "Pollution is a symptom of a global disease," Dr. Clark stated. What we must deal with is not a multitude of local problems, but a "Hydra-headed monster."

Legislation to protect the environment must be made by Canada no matter how immediately unpalatable it may seem to Canadians. Legislation must be enacted to decrease population growth and use of resources. Finally, any effort made to improve our environment must be comprehensive. We must overcome the tendency of our governments and universities to neatly compartmentalize the problem into subjects: Manpower or Environment, law or engineering, and so on.

And here we return to perhaps the only common theme of the diverse group of solutions given: what is needed at all costs to protect the environment is interdiscipinary cooperation; no one field, including law, can cover the environmental problem by itself, just as no one subject can remain entirely isolated in today's complex society. This central idea was probably stated most concisely to the law students in attendance by Dr. Carton when he said:

"Laws are not made in a vacuum."

Chancellor's Lectures

Dr. Wilfred Cantwell Smith of Harvard University will deliver the annual Chancellor's Lectures October 17-19 on the theme, "Faith, Christian and Other."

Dr. Smith, a Canadian, is Professor of World Relations and Director of the Centre for the Study of World Religions at Harvard. He will deliver the Chancellor's Lectures, the university's oldest lecture series in Convocation Hall.

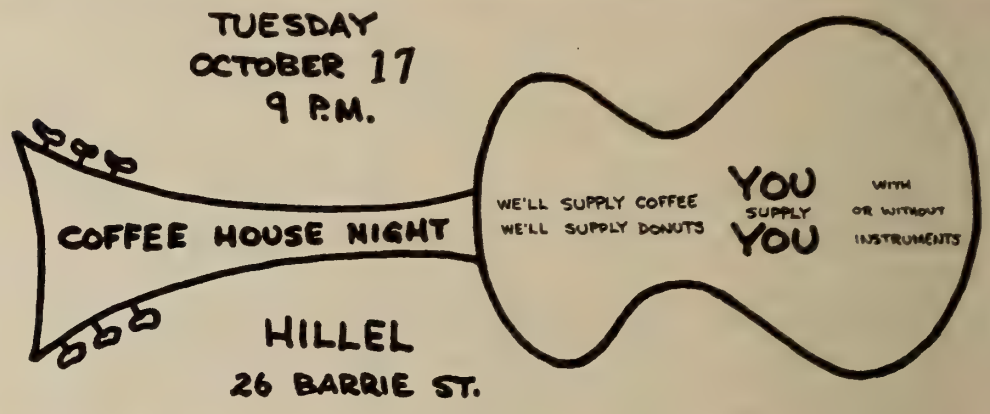
Dr. Smith graduated from the University of Toronto (B.A.) in 1938 and studied theology at Westminister College Cambridge for two years before becoming a representative among Muslims of the Canadian Overseas Mission Council in Lahore, India (now Pakistan). From 1941 to 1945, he was also a lecturer in Indian and Islamic History at Norman Christian College in Lahore.

In 1947 he went to Princeton University to study Oriental languages, graduating with an M.A. in 1947 and a Ph.D. in 1948.

McGill University appointed him Birks Professor of Comparative Religion in 1949 and Director of its Institute of Islamic Studies in 1951, positions which he held until his appointment at Harvard in 1964.

Dr. Smith is a fellow of the Royal Society of Canada, a fellow of the American Academy of Arts and Science, and an honorary graduate (D.D. 1966) of United Theological College in Montreal. He also served as president of the American Society for the Study of Religion from 1966 to 1969.

THE BEAUTY OF OUR LAND



In June 1971, the Trudeau Government created the Department of the Environment -- one of the first such departments in the world. What has been done since then to protect our land from the encroaches of industrial society?

1.) A Canadian-American agreement has been signed, providing for the massive clean-up of the Great Lakes.
2.) Ten new national parks have been established. This equals the total number created in the previous fifty years.
3.) The Arctic Waters Pollution Act has extended Canada's pollution control to 100 miles from the northern mainland.
4.) Strict controls are now in effect to stop air pollution by industry; and the work continues to cut down motor vehicle exhaust emissions.

We have a beautiful land. The Trudeau Government wants to keep it that way.

Women's lib and student power threaten order

by Sandra Bernstein

The Majority Rights Symposium met on Thursday evening, in McLaughlin Hall, for a banquet and a discussion Marriage and Divorce Laws in Canada. The guest speaker was Chief Justice Andrews of the Ontario Family Court, a position he has held for last ten years.

The judge began by explaining that he did not know where to begin, since he realized that the small audience included "wives whose interest in law extends as far as their husbands." Probably for this reason, Judge Andrews decided to abandon his speech on marriage and divorce laws, to concentrate instead on a lighter speech composed of many humourous anecdotes and one or two sentence personal comments on legal and world problems.

The judge began by saying that the law must follow public inclination, not force it. Laws, he maintained, are not to protect and preserve established power structures, but should be an instrument of social development: progress and control. He did, however, list a number of new movements which he felt posed a threat to legal order, including student dissent, which "shakes established values." Judge Andrews urged students to compromise in their search for reforms, "to prevent a plice state."

The chief justice included "women's lib" in those movements described above, although he admitted that he "still wasn't sure what women's lib is".

He went on to state that "do your own thing is an infinitely selfish belief."

Judge Andrews briefly compared the American and Canadian constitutions, before moving on to the field of criminal law.

In this portion of the speech, he stated that lobotomies were no solution because they just made for "happier thieves."

It is Judge Andrews' stated view that the law must be the friend, not the enemy of the people. From this thought he moved on to his concluding advice to the aspiring lawyers in the audience.

Crossroads International

Crossroaders work and learn on local projects in the West Indies, Africa and Asia over a period varying from three to six months.

Not only do the students in "Crossroads" projects work without pay, they must contribute $200.00 to $500.00 towards the cost.

The number of Queen's students chosen for Crossroads service since 1962 is 37 and many of them have later joined CUSO.

Canadian Crossroads International was formerly known as Operation Crossroads Africa, and had its beginnings as a non-demoninational project sponsored by Canadian church groups. To-day it receives financial support from a number of sources including Miles for Millions.

Deadline for applications is November 9th. For information and application forms see Padre Laverty in the Gymnasium Complex.

Candidates forum in Morris

by Pat Spence

Thursday night the residents of Morris Hall were entertained by Miss Flora MacDonald, Dr. John Hazlett and Mr. Lars Thompson in a meet the candidates evening.

Each candidate had five minutes to talk of his ideals, his promises and his reasons for running. Miss MacDonald spoke of a growing disillusionment with Ottawa and it's lack of concern for the little man. Dr. Hazlett said that he felt as a doctor practicing 'social medicine' he was in a good position to represent us in Parliament. Mr. Thompson startled us all by beginning with a skit exemplifying he explained, the contradiction found in so many politicians. "It's not what a man says that counts, he warned "but what he does."

There were a lot of questions ranging from election expenses to pollution. Dr. Hazlett supported the present liberal stand on such issues as the Pickering Airport, the Wage-Price and Profit freeze and the American Take-over. Miss MacDonald felt that the present Toronto Airport would be satisfactory after the addition of a few more terminals: that a wage, price and profit freeze was very much in need and that everything should be done to prevent the Americans from gaining access to any more of Canada's resources. When asked what she would do it, after elected, the conservative party lacked the courage of her convictions. Miss MacDonald replied "I have great faith in our democratic system where each member is a single vote.

Mr. Thompson explained that the election was a learning process for him and that he didn't have specific answers to the issues of today. "It must be realized that the NDP party because it is not committed can have the imagination to be concerned with a vision." he said.

At one point John Hazlett claimed that the Liberal government was the only government under which social legislation was passed. When asked to defend this statement he first said that the question was in the definition of social legislation but then he apologized for an obvious error in the statement. A member in the audience challenged him by commenting "If you can tell me what the Liberal government has done in the last four years I'll eat your hat." Dr. Hazlett declined the challenge.

Tumblewood must close

Since it opened one year ago, Tumblewood, the student run craft shop formerly called Heffalump has had a perilous existence. The store's future again lies in limbo. At the AMS meeting on Wednesday night student manager, David Morel and his assistant Holly Clark will no doubt muster all their defences in the hope of keeping the store open.

Traditional arguments for Tumblewood centre on its original purpose. It was designed to provide a service to students who wished to sell their crafts. But at any one time Tumblewood has had at most 100 contributors, not all students, whose crafts amounted to one-third of the total inventory. The remaining stock is made up of commercial goods.

Can we justify a service for a mere 1-80 of the student population which has lost a great deal of AMS money? Loans of $12,000 have already been sunk into the store and even more student money would be required to keep it open for a few more months as Tumblewood is $2500 in overdraft and accounts payable. If the AMS receives so much money from the student activity fee that they can afford to keep a sinking ship barely afloat, then perhaps it is time that this fee be reduced. However, this is not the case. The AMS has neither the funds nor the experience to make this venture feasible.

There are those who argue that Tumblewood should be given yet another chance because sales have improved over the past summer. They also point out that a business takes more than a year to get off the ground. In spite of these arguments we find it questionable that a student government should be involved in commercial enterprise of this nature at all. Business administrators and auditors alike recommended long ago that the AMS throw in the towel for Tumblewood. Surely we will not continue to turn a deaf ear to the pleas of professionals and our pockets.

Committee botches concert

Several years ago after a number of not very inspiring concerts, it was suggested that a concert fee be included in the student activity fee. This would create a fund to subsidize better concerts. The fee was approved in a referendum and was first charged last year. To administer the fee and to ensure that the resulting concerts were well run, a special committee was then set up. It met with reasonable success last year, and a referendum in the spring approved the continuation of the fee, presumably in the expectation that things could only get better this year.

The concert last Thursday night indicated how wrong this assumption was. Apparently believing that smaller, poorly known groups often give good concerts, the committee chose two little known groups for the concert. This might have shown promise except that one group had to cancel out when their lead guitarist was injured in an accident. The committee can not be blamed for this misfortune but their frantic scurrying to find another group did nothing to help their credibility as they announced and cancelled at least one other group before finally getting a series of bands lined up.

As the concert approached, the flaw in the reasoning to headline a poorly known group became painfully obvious - only 300 tickets were sold. In hopes of getting a better showing, the committee decided to make the concert free.

Having botched up the selection of groups and promotion of the concert, the committee demonstrated that they were masters at fouling up the running of the show as well. Scheduled to start 8:30 the show didn't start until 9. A delay of about ½ hour is not too unusual at Queen's, but last year the committee had the delay down to only 10 or 15 minutes.

The first group appeared and played for about 45 minutes - reasonable for a warm-up act and then took a break to change the equipment for the next act. These breaks are typical, necessary and normally take 15 - 20 minutes. Last Thursday's break however, was an hour and 45 minutes, as it was apparently necessary to design and build an entire sound system. About an hour into the intermission we were assured that it would only be another few minutes. They also claimed that once they got everything working it would only take 5 or 10 minutes for the second intermission. Finally at 11:30 the second short intermission lasted an hour. At 1:00 am (four and a half hours after the start of the concert!!) the feature group appeared and played for an hour.

Thus we were treated to a five and a half hour concert, featuring a full 2¼ hours of music (we are not in a position to pass judgement on the musical attributes of the concert). And this at a cost of probably about $6000 - almost a quarter of the total concert fund. If the committee cannot do better than this they might as well pack it in for good.

We exist

Dear Editor

It is about time main campus ralized that there is more to Queen's than the buildings from Brockington to Earl Hall. West Campus and McArthur College in general seems to be left out of all main campus activities because it is isolated by the lack of advertsiing by any main campus activity convenors. According to the information that has been offered out here all Queen's is interested in is voting yes and travelling by Kingston bus. We hear nothing of Dunning Hall flicks of the main campus pub, of the AMS bus to Toronto and Ottawa and of when you want money and our vote.

One of the Leblance - Palmer promises last spring was to involve West Campus more in main campus activities. There is very little they can do. The impetus must come from main campus students themselves. If you can't make the effort, then give us our AMS money back and let us form our own student body and our own "college." If you want us, inform us. If not, leave us alone.

Dear Editor

The candlelighting tradition is primarily a welcoming ceremony for all new Queen's women. In the spirit of friendship, the bonds of knowledge and understanding are extended to these new members of our community. This year the essence of the ceremony was emphasized and I sincerely hope that all who participated enjoyed themselves and felt welcome.

The apparent success of Candelighting 1972 was due to the constant and enthusiastic support of many people and I would like to take this opportunity to thank everyone who was involved. Pat Rae, Mary Barber, Robin McQuay and Carol Tustin deserve special thanks as do the faculty representatives who helped on stage and Ginny Sutherland whose beautiful bagpiping added so much to the ceremoney. The assistance of all upperclass women was very much appreciated.

I would be grateful for any comments or suggestions regarding the Candelighting ceremony. Please send them to me at Adelaide Hall. Thanks again.

Union coffee

Dear Editor:

Last week when I went to the Coffee Shop to get some coffee, the pot was cold. The next day, it had been burned. Then it was empty. Another day there were no cups.

This week, when I tried, the same thing happened, but in a different order. Perhaps the Union should invest in a coffee machine, at least you know what to expect for your dime.

An apology

To the students of Queen's

We, the Concert Committee humbly apologize for the recent delays at the Malo concert. The delays between the shows and at the door were completely out of our control due to technical problems. Effectively, this will never happen again.

Running a concert is physically a very large problem for students as well as promoters. Cancellations, equipment failures, and an artist's failure to arrive on time can never be predicted.

We hope that you will accept this apology and that we can expect to see you at the upcoming Stevie Wonder concert this Sunday. It will be a good one!

Yours very truly,
AMS CONCERT COMMITTEE

Couldn't vote

Dear Editor:

When my friends and I went to vote in the referendum on Thursday, we found the polls closed at 2 pm. Now, we don't read the crud in your paper, so we didn't know that the polls closed early; but it seems to me that if the AMS and the OFS wanted a big turnout, they should have kept the polls open longer. The Queen's would have had 75 percent voting rather than 60 percent.

On the subject of the fee strike, why has the OFS not made any statements since Friday regarding the turnout and results of the vote. Some people might like to know.

Disenfranchised

Photo fan

Dear Editor:

A few weeks ago, you ran a letter regarding the host of photographers on the field taking pictures of the Queen's band during a half-time show. The next game, they took it to heart and left the band alone.

Thursday night the photographers took after the group Malo, flashing their flashes in the face of the drummers (even when they had two carbon-arc spots trained on them). This may or may not have bothered the performers, but the audience certainly noticed the flashes. Too bad for them I guess.

A non-concert

Dear Editor,

During the six years which I have attended university, I have witnessed many rock concerts. However, I have never seen such an abysmal effort as the attempt by the Concert Committee last Thursday. The patent lack of organization of the sound crew and the ridiculous oversight of the Concert Committee in not designating someone to introduce the groups and later comment on the sound system troubles give me sufficient grounds to suggest that Thursday's attempt at a concert by the Committee amounted to nothing more than a degenerated production of what Queen's students might call "our first non-concert".

There is no denying the obvious fact that the three groups invited to play were capable of playing very good music. Unfortunately, the key to a successful concert lies in the receptivity of the audience to the music played for them rather than in the quality of the music itself. On Thursday, the antics of the stage organizers, who should more appropriately be called non-organizers, ruined a potentially fantastic concert.

The audience expecting a good concert to begin at 8:30 felt their happy anticipation ooze out of them before 9:10 when Fludd finally inundated the stage. As a result of the long wait, it took the group its full one hour to wash away the patient inhibitions of the Queen's students. Yet, if Dr. Music had appeared at 10:10, we might have got a good thing going. Unfortunately, the mood which Fludd had created, ebbed. The audience became listless, impatient and unhappy as the sound people scurried about the stage, apparently trying to discover how long the audience would wait before leaving the arena for home. Many people did leave, although others did stay and these people must be commended for their extreme and bountiful patience.

However, at 12:20, when Malo finally appeared, there was obviously no mood left in their souls, tired from waiting offstage for so long, and certainly there was no mood left in the audience. Patience had exorcised any other feeling. Malo could just as easily have been performing on a television screen. The situation was sad. On the stage, a good band; in the audience, a good crowd, but the hours of waiting which the disorganization of the sound crew had caused had severed any lines of mood communication by which the band could have tied itself to the crowd. We were cut off. We were denied a good concert by inefficient organization. Surely all the sound problems could and should have been explored and discovered before the concert.

Ms. Editor, I realize I am not cognizant of all the facts in this matter. I do not blame the sound crew because I am sure they worked as effectively as they could. However, I do blame the concert organizers. The concert demonstrates that they had no foresight. I charge them with gross mismanagement.

Fully realizing that this charge may be shown to be unfounded on the basis of facts not at the hands of the audience, I request that the concert organizers respond to this charge by addressing a letter of explanation of their apparent inadequacies to this paper. Hopefully, this anticipated response can be printed in the Journal for all of us to read so that we may more fully understand the tribulations of the Concert Committee.

Yours very truly,
R. Ross Dunsmore

Belly of a fish

Dear Editor,

(This is a reply to L. Melinyk's review of the Julliard string quartet concert which appeared in Friday's Journal)

Since archeozoic times, never has one expressed such concupiscence, albeit in an ostensibly grandiloquent manner in the pretext of wiriting a review of a musical event.

Melnyk's interlocutory usage of such balbriggen (also quite humorous and perhaps unnecessarily so but we dan't overlook good intentions) apothegms as "the Juilliard ripped that chord" lead one to believe that recent disertations of apocalypse strike a much greater propinquity than previously cogitated.

The speculative decalomania inculcated upon the dainty wizards (disguised as reviewers of music) leaves much to be desired.

Although I am not ashamed to listen to Mahler, I can still appreciate the propensities of bespectacled golden fish such as Gasparde de la Nuit to overexaggerate emotional response to a musical event and produce a very unclear and overly schmultzy account of what went on. By the way, I was there and I didn't see any golden fish with a thousand wooly legs stomping on its belly but I did hear some good music.

Andrew Mason

Dainty wizards

Dear Editor,

"The longing for true greatness is seldom realized": no truer words were ever spoken. Consider first the vicarious boards of criticism. With what ecstasy of bittersweet hilarity did we absorb L. Melnyk's impressions of the Juilliard string quartet. Who but your correspondent could have captured the essential dignity of these four men? Indeed, encased as we were by the malodorous belly speckles of the fish that is Grant Hall, and distracted as we were by our ponderings as to whom your correspondent had murdered to so bespatch the curtains with blood (for is it not written that the blood of the English language is invisible to those who spill it?) it did strike us, as I'm sure it struck each and every person in that giant aquarium that night, that the players looked more like "dainty wizards" than like four men in business suits carrying violins or whatever. Far be it from me to suggest that the "pure tonality, devoid of every formal label", of the performers, was equalled only by the pure banality, devoid of every sparkle of good taste, exhibited by your reporter.

"Gliding over the rubble", however, I should like to comment on the desecration of sweet sounds by the deadening, numbing novocaine needles of pretension and sententiousness. For, as your reporter alludes to Picasso, I similarly was transported to the Daliesque world of distorted time as I read this alleged review. Indeed, I felt my watch itself droop over my limpid wrist as I imbibed this truly fresh new approach to criticism. Surely it was three hours I spent over this, not a few minutes! For is it not true that time squandered on the "ultimately negligable" expands to the interminable? However, one may always sustain interest in something incredible, however much talent may be lacking.

I should be honoured to meet your young reporter, to see for myself his or her wooly legs. indeed, to see (nyuk nyuk) whether or not he or she decides to wear a body to our first meeting. I should like to personally laud this artist's great clusters of mental sog.

Ah, yes, Mr. or Ms. Melnyk, gone are the days of classicism (regular or neo-tobaccic, filter or non filter), of Romanticism. modernism, and now, it appears, of literacy. Gone, alack, yes gone forever. I see in the Journal "shreds of bitter days" spent in the throes of creation, some worthwhile (Mr. Hodgson's work springs to mind), some, shall we say, "foamier".

Says Melnyk: "no emotion knows better than chaos the bliss of trophied music." This, to use an exercrable simile which he or she would probably like, is a generalized bit of trivial poop that sticks to the roof of ones mouth like stale peanut butter. Meaningless and glib, it could perhaps be his "journal" epitaph, should your reporter meet an early demise one day while shaving just too "close between the goal posts" of the pretentious can of worms that is his work.

Yours fed up to the teeth,
Sandra Bernstein (Arts 76)

Education of the Senses

As early as 1946 Laszlo Moholy-Nagy's VISION IN MOTION argued for an integrated organic approach towards all the arts. His Bauhaus inspired approach towards the problems of education made design the basis of a contemporary liberal education, including the obvious visual and graphic arts, and film, music, the dance and literature. As he observed:

> Visualization, verbalization, music and dance are tools we have to express a concept and to master the new conditions in and around us. Visualization is the task of the visual artist. Verbalization is the domain of the writer and the poet. But (as Louis Sullivan in KINDERGARTEN CHATS says) 'You cannot express unless you have a system of expression; and you cannot have a system of expression unless you have a prior system of thinking and feeling; and you cannot have a system of thinking and feeling unless you have a basic system of living.'

Moholy-Nagy clearly indicates both the importance of verbalization and of proper sensory training to provide a system of thinking and feeling. The arts are always rooted in the individual and he perceives them through his eyes, ears tactile kinesthetic, proprioceptive of other senses or combinations of them. To achieve proper receptivity and proper freedom in creativity, the body and nervous system must be trained as successful methods of basic education, as Maria Montessori's or the Orff musical methods recognize. Yet in the process a proper respect for the purely sensory arts of vision or sound must be balanced with a respect for verbalization and poetry.

If it is sometimes fashionable today to suggest that the visual artist weilds the power of the most influential medium, one forgets that all the arts are languages analagous to the communicative system 'par excellence', human speech, and that the health of each of these languages is interdependent on the others. Poetics, as Paul Valery treated the subject, has to do with the making of things of the mind, providing the mind is viewed as the total functioning of the neurophysiological system of an entire body in an enccounter with the physical universe. 'Poetry', in this sense, as conceived by Aristotle and developed in works of theorists such as Coleridge, is the spirit that informs all of the arts; the spirit of the making process itself. Consequently Degas' remark to Mallarme that he should have been a poet or this entry from Paul Klee's diary is not surprising:

> I should have written many poems in order to give form to my new creative energy. Of course, though, this did not happen, for to be a poet and to write poetry are two different things.

Paul Klee's titles, which are themselves highly poetic, filled with wit and metaphorical suggestivity, titles, such as "Two Men Meet, Each assuming the Other to Hold a Higher Position", or "A Spirit Mother Anxiously Watches a Spirit Child's First Departure", frequently form an intrinsic part of the total effect of a picture -- a not uncommon phenomenon in the 20th century where such works as Calder's THE ONLY ONLY BIRD would not have quite the same effect with a different title. In fact, in Klee's awareness of the poetics of painting, or Valery's awareness that poetics is a study uniting all of the arts, lies the key for an integrated and organic training in the arts, in ALL THEIR FORMS, which is the only basis of a CONTINUING LIBERAL EDUCATION.

As W. J. J. Gibson of Synectics Incorporated has so forcefully demonstrated in his writings, in the metaphorical thinking of the arts resides not only the source of artistic creativity, but a substantial part of human creativity in all areas. The marrying through metaphor of nature and art, wit and judgment, had always been at the root of artistic theory. The random chance of nature is transformed through the senses of the painter or poet into the work of art, creating a new nature, a theme which Polixenes applies to gardening in Shakespeare's THE WINTER'S TALE:

> Yet nature is made better by no mean
> But nature makes the mean: so, over the art,
> Which you say adds to nature, is an art
> That nature makes. You see, sweet maid, we marry
> A gentler scion to the wildest stock,
> And make conceive a bark of baser kind
> By bud of nobler race: this is an art
> Which does mend nature, change it rather, but
> The art itself is nature. (IV, iv, 88ff.)

Klee's artist, who is "so well oriented that he can put order into the flux or phenonenon of experiences" depends upon a close examination of the structure of nature and the rhythm it reveals, as well as the strategies for converting it as it is transmitted through this nervous system.

Klee's PEDAGOGICAL SKETCHBOOK and his workshop notes published in the THINKING EYE represent such an analysis of structural components which affect the perceptual processes rising out of the envelopment of man in nature. Recently, Kepes' VISION AND VALUE series has investigated how the comparison of structure in art and science can be utilized as the basis for a general liberal education.

Unfortunately, the first three volumes have not stressed the integration of verbalization with the visual arts and the arts of motion. Similar analyses, however, can be carried out for poetry so that sutdents can be taught to play with words and to relate words to their basic senses and experiences, just as is done with plastic materials, moving images, or the human body. Perls, Hefferline and Goodman's GESTALT THERAPY, which is a kind of practical notebook for the education of human persons in their own sensory awareness, stresses the central importance of verbalization and poetry. The authors would bring about this awareness by disciplining the student to think continually about the nature and structure of his own process of experiencing and feeling and the way that he structures these in different modes of communication. This is part of the educative function stressed in the modern dance; but it is, after all, rather an ancient way of looking at education. In the HISTORY OF EDUCATION IN ANTIQUITY, H.I. Marrou observes that:

> . . . .Plato says bluntly, "Anyone who cannot take his place in a choir (i.e. both as singer and dancer) is not truly educated."

The classical rhetorician taught the use of language, of paralanguage and gestures (kinetics) as well as delivery in imparting a liberal education. Reintegration of education about all of the arts and about the structure which informs them would be reintegration of the human person with the universe, a process which Francis Bacon foresees in some of his more penetrating insights into the relation between the organic growth of human discovery and the creative process.

Recently, Michael Polanyi in his study, PERSONAL KNOWLEDGE, has stressed the importance of this type of postlogical thinking to the contemporary epistemology of the sciences, so that the training of young M.I.T. engineers in visual design has intrinsic values to their future creativity. Youthful artists or scientists or writers or future business men would receive a truly liberal education if they could combine the examining of forms like the biological and physical structure of the natural world, such as that investigated by D'Arcy Wentworth Thompson in ON GROWTH AND FORM, or the sturcutre of language as revealed by linguistics and its allied disciplines which can analyze gestures, and vocal tones, and semantic differences as well as the microsturcture of speech, with synthetic experiments in putting together words poetically as suggested by Ezra Pound in the ABC OF READING or visual materials as in the Bauhaus elementary course, of the motions of his own body in the dance, the mime of the drama or recombinations of feelings and thought of his experiential world. Such an education would be truly liberal because it would be truly liberating. It would also allow the student to understand the advertising, film and television of his world by examining the way it is put together.

Queen's drama class in a workshop production

New Experimental Theatre at Queen's

by Di Eastham

Last spring, the Drama Department, always in search of extra space for its ever expanding enrollment, acquired the use of a geography lab, Room 103, in the basement of Ontario Hall.

The plan was to convert this room into a studio theatre. One of the first decisions that had to be made was which class should be given the use of the room. It was decided that all first year students should remain within the department in Theology Hall in order to ensure maximum exposure to department events. It was felt that the third year Experimental Theatre course (Drama 330) would adapt most easily to the new location, as its students were already familiar with the workings of the department.

Preliminary preparation was begun in the summer by the design course students. They covered the sinks and counters with sheets of plywood and boarded up the windows, so that the room could be darkened for proper theatre lighting.

It was decided that the actual construction of the theatre would be the first project assigned to the 330 students in September. The theatre was to be built and operated completely by the students under the supervision of Mr. Gary Wagner, the course instructor. As a learning experience, this was a rare opportunity for Queen's drama students. It meant coming face to face with the problems which professional theatre builders run into and solving them through imagination and resourcefulness, on a limited budget.

Some of the first problems encountered were colour selection and sound proofing the walls of the lab which were a glossy off white. They had to be darkened and the finish had to be dulled so that light would be properly absorbed rather than reflected in a destracting manner. Another problem was that of camouflaging the multitude of gas and water pipes. They became a trim and were painted beige to offset the dark brown walls. The colour of the walls in the existing studio 102 Theology Hall is a dark grey, but it was felt that brown wuld be a warmer colour. As the room is very large, it needed to be done in a colour that would draw the walls in as much as possible. The choice of beige for the trim was based on practicality. Light colours will not show the dust which settles on pipes and radiators as much as dark colours will.

A crew of about ten students then spent the evenings of the first couple of weeks of classes painting the walls, pipes and sometimes even themselves. At the same time, other students had to work out a way of either removing or disguising gas and water jets running along the counters on three of four walls. They managed to obtain the cooperation of the physical plant employees, and the taps were removed.

The next problem to be solved was posed by the way in which sound tended to bounce off walls, ceiling and floors creating an echo effect to every word uttered in the room. As sound needs to be very clear in a theatre, this was one of the more important difficulties to overcome. The Drama department provided dark gray carpeting to cover most of the floor surface. One the painting was completed, it was possible for another crew of students to set about laying the carpeting. This carpeting, as well as solving the noise problem, will provide a good working surface for the studio.

The next major step to be taken will be the setting up of lighting for the studio. Students who have already had some experience working on lighting within the department have been assigned the task of designing a lighting pattern and setting up the equipment involved. This will be quite experimental as the lighting requirements for this room are different than those in the existing studio in Theology Hall. Once the lighting has been established, the studio should be near completion.

The future of this studio is very indefinite as the future reconstruction plans for Ontario Hall call for the complete gutting of the inside in a few years. When this happens, space will be rearranged and it is not known whether the studio will be kept or not. Hopefully, the new Medical building will be finished before this happens so that the Drama Department will be able to expand into what is now the Medical Science Library.

Mr. Wagner commented that the prospect of working in this new studio is a very exciting one. It offers opportunities to do things that cannot be done in the present studio (102 Theology Hall) due to overcrowding. He also said that he feels the new studio will be much more flexible and will allow much more experimentation then the existing studio, simply because it is much less finished. It will be much easier to make changes in the new studio than it would be to do so in the old studio.

As the purpose of the course is to examine in a practical way, current trends in modern theatre, this flexibility will be a great asset. During the course of the year, students will be examining the works and influence of such people as Artaud (Theatre of Cruelty) and Brecht. The theories of Peter Brook will also be examined. Students will be presenting projects based on the exploration of various types of theatre. Documentary theatre, for example is a type of theatre based on historical and contemporary events with the political relevance of today. Charles Marowitz's collages will be explored. A collage is made by rearranging elements from the classical plays to create a new or different interpretation which throws light on the conventional interpretation.

Another aspect of theatre to be explored is the relationship between primitive ritual and performance. These projects will all be rehearsed and presented in the studio. They will be presented to students in the department eexcept on special occasions when a performance may be opened to the public at the invitation of the 330 students.

Critic's Forum: Fritz The Cat

Wholesale Family Entertainment

by T. I. McLeod

"Sick." "Disgusting." "Ridiculous."

Aside from a few such confused mutterings, we were slack-jawed and silent as we swirled out into the street, out into the real world of atrional behaviour and cosy predictability . . . Mr. Crumb's little cartoon had not been exactly what we expected.

Robert Crumb is the founder and most eminent figure of the American "head comix" movement which rose to prominence in 1967 alongside such superstars as the Jefferson Airplane, Jerry Rubin and LSD. Circulated through underground papers like the L.A. Free Press and the Georgia Straight, and in comic books (Zap and Snatch, formerly available at your local head shop or smut vendor's), Crumb's comics are a satirical rejection of almost every aspect of American life. A plump businessman suffering death-wish hallucinations after getting his hamburger fix, a vaudeville chorusline of hairy freeks singing the virtues of dope, sudden, obscene sexual acrobatics- images that combine super- real exaggeration in style and characterization with wildly improbable situations. They amaze, amuse, or infuriate, depending on your devotion to the values they ridicule.

"Fritz the Cat" is Crum's first animated cartoon. Fritz himself is insincere, neurotic, a middle-class college kid sporadically alternating between idealism and opportunism; Fritz is one of us. He is also a symbol of the entire "youth revolution" of the '60's. He does the far-out things, believes in all the far-out things when it's conveneint- but he always seems behind the times because someone else is having all the good ideas and he's just acting them out. So he appears as a vehicle for cliches and nothing else, a stereotype, a non character.

Fritz stumbles through the '60's and learns absolutely nothing. We are immersed in his cartoon world both by our visual fascination and through the satirist's eye for the gestures, poses and styles of American living. The conversations take on a dcoumentary realism.

But this is a cartoon, after all, and when a situation becomes absurd it becomes funny and then we can laugh and forget the wretched realities of everyday living. Right? One pig beats another pig over the head, and his eyeballs roll in opposite directions. But the film slowly evolves, becomes sordid and depressing and realistic. The Air Force bombs the ghetto while Donald Duck waves a flag on a suburban hillside. A little fantastic, yes? How about a beating with chains? You shrink into your seat and hope for a swift, painless ending.

After the "youth revolution"? Back to square one. Wake up, kids, we're gonna go get us some pizza.

(By the way, I liked the film!)

P.S. - The film program preceeding the cartoon is absolute dogshit - three silly shorts climaxing in an unbelievably boring and badly -made travelogue entitled "The Spell of the Tyrrhenian Sea", starring fat tourists in bathing suits. The three films are over 45 minutes long together and are worth missing.

Highlights Degenerate Society

by David N. Fanstone

". . .so these three leathernicks are sittin' on this girder, right? And the one is talking about how he gave his daughter everything and she's out screwing behind his back, instead of saving it and then, you've got to see this. The dude stands up on the end, pulls his dong out and pisses off the girder and this freak, who's walking past catches it right on the head. . ."

If you have copious amounts of money and a penchant for wasting it on dogs, turkeys and other forms of woodland fauna, then I highly recommend Fritz the Cat.

Not in all the years I've been disappointed in the offerings of so called movie houses have I seen such a bigoted, exploitative, distorted view of humanity, not the U.S.A. specifically, but anywhere you choose to set it.

According to the flick, all cops are degenerate pigs, all whites are mono-dimensional morons concerned about a cause they cannot find, all blacks are animals copulating in public bars and getting along on horse, grass and natural rhythm.

If that isn't enough to make you sick, there is a sequence on L.A. revolutionaries that will send you to the nearest washroom unless you are especially fond of sadism as a sexual stimulant.

But the film does serve a purpose. It highlights the degenerate and failing society that could produce a film like this about it's own people, even in jest. It seems the American film industry, in an attempt to win the youth market, is reinforcing the image of bestial cops, stupid and usually misdirected whites, and super stud blacks, that distorts any

Restrictly For Adults

by L. Melyyk

It's RESTRICTED . . . so it's got to be good. Lots of sex, lots of alien touching, and lots of that funky up-topdate stuff about drugs and everything. Keep your children at home; this is restrictly for adults, mature enough to take it, 'cause this one tells it like it is, just like in dad's playboy pin-ups.

Fritz the Cat is a wonderful time consumer for the sexually impotent brain nodules in Kingston; it's superb digestion for the cute dribblets that like to laugh when the blank in the next seat is choking on its popcorn badge; and it's an important excursion into the floppy cheatness of this era's fake art, the crumbling fireworks that get pushbutton attention from any lazy bozo.

Not only is the artwork equal to Pink Panther's closet, but the stories get a rave review at the Fairy Godfather's Club for Male Nationalists, where a clumsy, grotesque and stupid Female is the dartboard.

Amid the heaps of cliches, obvious gimmicks for the easily impressed, once in a while, I got hit by an old hat, something unusual, an angle, anything interesting to relieve the monotony of Road-Runner graphics. The producers knew how to make it sell: throw in some neoprismatic colours, along with swinging motion. It takes so little to turn you on when you're at a RESTRICTED movie.

Sure Fritz is heavy; lots of social relevance, blood, bullets and bare pig's ass to toast the gravy on your wasted eye-balls. Pointlessly exaggerated characters, moving in empty delirium betray the paltry effort of their artists, the gushing idiocy of someone's acidic gas. What could have been great and exciting; with so much potentially explosive material, turned out lifeless and without a spark of imagination. It was all so heavy, like a mile-long pendulum draining vacuums in the wind; stolid and inert, the film sludges along in its black starkness, with not even a Cupid's voice to exhale the stale air.

The film may prove noteworthy in one respect: it is a product of the same age it pretends to vilify, and in its costumed weakness, it hangs up the spectre of madness and devastation before its dripping gums, like a mutated child staring around the criss-cross smudge of its father's portrait, "The Moment of his Cancer".

It was fitting that Fritz was shown along with three of the world's 50 worst snid-bits ever put on film. Where does the Hyland dig up these slobbery bones with maggots in every pore? There's no excuse for bad "shorts" when there's ample opportunity to screen good N.F.B. films, since "Experimental" stuff isn't acceptable to brain tumors. Perhaps a boycott of that theatre might help. Until the manager has enough taste to show some decent Canadian films in place of American cocktail spit.

There is a suspicion that Fritz was made by real drug users who really did experience many of the events of the film in their imagination, events such as dark coitus in a hastily crayoned garbage can, and even perhaps masturbation. And that's far out, so of course, everyone will go to see these daring non-scenes, . . .'cause they're RESTRICTED.

Defense, passing, do in Ottawa U.

by Chris Boon

A good defense is like a rubber band; it can stretch when things don't matter much, then snap back hard whey they do. Friday night, Queen's proved it has a very good defense edging Ottawa U. 18-17 at Lansdowne Park. Working out of a basic 4-5 alignment devised by defensive line coach Jim Sherritt, the Gaels were able to shut off Ottawa U.'s passing game completely, and held the GeeGees to rushing yards between the twenty yard lines. When Ottawa got close, Queen's gave up almost nothing. Both Ottawa touchdowns were set up by offensive mistakes, the first when a quick-kick attempt from the Gaels' end zone went about five yards, and the second by a fumble recovery after Tom Taylor was blindsided while attempting to pass mid-way through the fourth quarter.

In spite of these turnovers, Queen's offence was much improved. Taylor mixed up his play-calls well, and threw better than he has since his rookie season, completing 13 of 29 passes for 188 yards. He also picked up his secondary receivers well, laying the ball off to the short men when Lang and Hollingsworth were covered deep, and throwing strikes over the middle to Hamlin, Melvin, Waddell and Hollingsworth when the GeeGees blitzed their linebackers. Taylor had no passes intercepted.

The running game, which had been in failing health against T.O. and Carleton, came alive with the advent of a passing threat, with Dave Hadden, operating out of a halfback slot to accommodate Geoff Hamlin at fullback, picking up 75 yards to lead the Gaels. Warrender and Hamlin added 25 and 23 yards respectively as Queen's rolled up 311 yards total offense. Hadden's hard running brought Queen's a TD in the fourth quarter, when the big back broke free at the line of scrimmage, picked up a good downfield block, then cut back against the flow for a 26-yard score.

Queen's looked like it was going to blow Ottawa out of the park in the first quarter, with two interceptions by Alex Morris and a good punt return by Stu Lang giving Doug Cozac a chance at three field goals; all were good. However, if Queen's had been able to pick up a major in the early going, things would have been a lot easier. Against T.O., three points at a time is not going to be enough.

LB John Tovee (51) just misses QB Dan Smith as Hagarty (72), Devonshire (68), and Anderson (78) close in. .

The Gaels seemed to lose momentum shortly before the end of the first quarter. Hadden fumbled at the OU 50, when his arm was hooked from behind, and the Gee Gees recovered. Repeated exchanges of punts forced the Gaels into their own end, and Ottawa U., given good field position, started a march on the ground, with backs Coleman, Kozak and Lumsden doing the damage, mostly on off-tackle plays and inside delays. The Gaels finally held three times inside the eight, and took over the ball, on the two. Hadden carried out to the four, setting the stage for the ill-fated quick kick. It was a coaches' call, and, if it had worked, a good one. Unfortunately, no one in the Gaels' backfield is what you could call an accomplished quick-kicker (Skip Eaman, where are you?) The resulting pop-up was taken by OU defensive tackle Paul Kilger who loped into the end zone for the major. Lumsden's convert made it 9-7 Queen's.

After this, the Gaels appeared to go into a shell on offense, with Taylor abandoning his productive passing attack in favour of a ground game. It didn't work, and after three punting exchanges, the GeeGees got the ball on Queen's 28 yard line. A facemasking penalty to Morris and a run by Lumsden put the ball on the Queen's 10, but the defence held (again) and OU was forced to take a field goal. This gave Ottawa a 10-9 lead, which they held to the end of the half. Queen's had a possible scoring drive late in the half blunted by a holding penalty; Taylor had hit Brian Warrender with a 34-yard pass to move Queen's down to the OU33, but the penalty moved the Gaels back to the 43, out of field goal range. Campbell's punt was short of the end zone, and the half ended 10-9 for O.U.

The second half was a lot like the first quarter. The Gaels came out throwing, mixing in a fine screen pass early in the third quarter and some power running by Hadden, Hamlin and Warrender. The Gaels drove to the OU26, from where Hadden broke into the end zone. The Gaels went for a two point convert, but a pass into the end zone was picked off. Queen's led, 15-10. Cozac booted a single when his field goal attempt at the end of the third quarter just missed (actually, I would love to see an end-zone shot of that attempt - from the press box, it looked very, very good) and Dave Campbell hoisted a 60-yard boot through the end zone for another single point to make the score 17-10 for the Gaels early in the fourth quarter. From that point on, the game looked like a grade-D movie script. The GeeGees recovered Taylor's fumble at midfield, and marched in for a touchdown with Dan Smith taking the ball in on an option run from six yards out. Lumsden tied the game up with his convert, and the Gaels had 3:10 left to work with.

John Booth got the ball rolling with a 29-yard kickoff return, up to the Queen's 51. From there, some great power running by Hadden, Hamlin and Warrender gave Queen's three first downs and the chance to win it all. With less than a minute to go, punter Dave Campbell booted the ball deep into the Ottawa end zone, and a wave of Gaels smothered return man Conrad Kozak for the winning single.

The GeeGees tried to get in range for a tying single, but the Gaels' defense came up with some big efforts, and the clock ran out.

So, Queen's, Ottawa and Toronto all have 3-2 records. Queen's and T.O. meet this Saturday in the annual homecoming classic, and the winner will be in good shape for the playoffs. If the Gaels can disarm the shotgun, Queen's will be in first place. If T.O. wins, then the Gaels will need a Raven victory over Ottawa U. to finish in second and make the playoffs.

Dunkley and company are in for some surprises on Saturday. The Gaels can throw now, and the addition of Tom Dickenson appears to have restored some life to the offensive line. However, the biggest differences will come on defence. Rookies Norm Hagarty and Greg Anderson at defensive end give Queens the fastest and best outside pass rush since the days of Larry Ferguson, and John Tovee looks good as a linebacker. Of course, Don Smith will probably be back, so look for a real big rush on Dunkley. It'll be a hell of a ball game!

Last-second goal beats Blues

Last weekend Queen's journeyed to Toronto for the first scheduled OUAA league games. Once again, the Queen's team had an unbeaten record downing Ottawa U. 18 - 1, and the U of T Blues 9-8. Other scores were Toronto 12-9 over York, and York 12-9 over Ottawa.

In the first game, Queen's outswam Ottawa, using a fresh forward line each quarter, Goal scorers were Archie Nesbitt, 5; Dave Howard, 4; Chris Wately, 3; Jack Muir and Steve Patterson, 2 each; and Rich Zajchowski and George Craig, one each. Ottawa's lone goal was the result of a deflection off a Queen's player.

Queen's second game saw them pitted against last year's OUAA champions, U of T. Toronto took a 4-1 lead at the end of the first quarter, but with the score at 5-3 in Toronto's favour, a wild melee broke out in front of the Queen's goal. It started when a Toronto forward took a swing at Queen's goalie John Earle. With the referee watching play at the other end of the pool, the forward continued to pubbel Earle. Queen's coach Simon Beitler intervened on his goalie's behalf and it was some time before order was restored.

A goal by Chris Whately and two by Archie Nesbitt tied the score at 6-all at the start of the fourth quarter. The lead see-sawed but with one minute left, Jack Muir scored to give Queen's an 8-7 lead. Then with sixteen seconds left, Muir, attempting to keep possession of the ball, passed across the Queen's net, only to have the pass intercepted by a Toronto forward, with goalie Earle having no chance. On the face-off, Nesbitt's long shot was stopped, but the Toronto's goalie's clearing pass was intercepted by Dave Howard, who broke downfield and passed to the unmarked Jack Muir. His left-handed shot made the score 9-8

Defencemen Tom Kasprzyk, Rich Zajchowski, and Chris Whately, as well as goalie John Earle, played outstanding games for Queen's. Goalscorers for the Gaels were Jack Muir, 3; Archie Nesbitt, 3; Chris Whately, 2; and Rich Zajchowski, 1.

The unbeaten Queen's team is now in sole possession of first place in their league, and willhost the OUAA games here next weekend.

Queen's archers 2nd in OWIAA

Archery coach Keith Kiell had good reason to be pleased with his charges on Saturday night. The Gals placed second in the OWIAA outdoor archery campionships held this past weekend in Guelph. After leading the tournament on Friday, U of T dashed all hopes of a Queen's victory Saturday with a strong surge to place them first with 3953 points, 115 ahead of Queen's. Western, McMaster and Guelph placed 3rd, 4th, and 5th respectively.

Anne Chalmers from Varsity, led the way to first place by scoring 1106 points, a mere 44 points ahead of Queen's veteran Janet Spence. Margaret Morden tallied 1042 points for Western.

The future looks promising for the Queen's archery Gals who have improved greatly over the last year. With more practice they could very well surpass Varsity and capture top honours at the indoor championships here in late January.

Robertson's hat-trick leads soccer Gaels to 4-1 win over Ravens

by Dave Cottee

After an indifferent first half and a bad break at the start of the second, the Queen's soccer Gaels fought back to come away with a convincing 4-1 win over the Carleton Ravens. Leading the Gaels' attack was Davy Robertson whose three goal performance broke the game wide open.

The first half lacked excitement as both teams, and particularly Queen's, appeared uncertain in their play. Carleton seemed to fall more naturally into this defensive posture, being content to kick the ball into Gaels' territory and wait for Queen's to make mistakes. When the Ravens did threaten, Gord Taylor came up with some fine defensive plays. The Gaels had one scoring opportunity near the end of the first half but Gerry Birks' hard kick went just wide of the net.

The Gaels came out running to start the second half and immediately got a good chance which they wasted with a weak off-target kick. Soon after, the Ravens scored when a high pass was headed past goalie Peter Dickie, who had come out to intercept the ball. The ball hit the goal post and bounced out, but was put into the goal by a nameless Queen's defender who was attempting to beat a Raver to the ball.

However, the Gaels continued to take the offensive, and the sequence that got them back on even terms was initiated by a lead pass from Gordon Howard to Davy Robertson. Robertson could not get a direct chance, but the ball was directed toward the corner where Don Baragar retrieved it, and sent a superb centering pass which Robertson headed into the goal, just inside the near post.

From then on Queen's was in almost complete command. Once again, Baragar got the ball near the corner, and once more he sent in a hard, head-high kick. This time, the Ravens' goalkeeper managed to get his hands on the ball but could not hold it, and ever-alert Robertson scored from close in.

A little later the Gaels came close on a similar play. A kick by Baragar was too hot for the Carleton goaltender, and Robertson just failed to beat a Raven to the loose ball with the goalkeeper out of position.

The third score gave Davy Robertson a true hat-trick (three consecutive goals). The Gaels sent a routine high kick into the Ravens' goal area, but sloppy defensive play gave the ball to Robertson who once again displayed his scoring talent to put Queen's into a 3-1 lead.

The Gaels kept the ball in Carleton's end of the field for most of the half but on occasions when the Ravens, applied pressure, Dickie showed excellent range in goal, coming out to intercept several high passes from the Ravens. In addition, on a number of occasions, Gord Taylor brought the ball out of danger with his clever footwork.

On offense, Queen's had several good opportunities to add to the score, coming particularly close on two occasions, both times hitting the cross-bar, once by Howard, and once by Robertson.

Finally Gerry Birks, who broke up many Carleton attacks at midfield, scored the last Gaels' goal with the finest kick of the afternoon, one from well out that beat the Ravens' goalkeeper cleanly.

One last chance by Robertson came when he stole the ball and put himself completely in the clear, but just failed to score as his attempt curled past the post.

Next week, the Gaels will try to extend their win streak as they play at Trent University.

Track Gaels hot in Western tuneup

Queen's track Gaels were red-hot Friday, sweeping first place in the University of Western Ontario Invitational Meet, and serving notice that they will be a force to be reckoned with at the OUAA-Outdoor Finals this coming weekend. Queen's got top performances from team captain Dave Jarvis and supersoph Hugh Fraser and strong efforts from many others in rolling up 122 points, well ahead of Western and Toronto. The Gaels accumulated 6 firsts and 5 seconds, a good sign for the future.

Jarvis had his best personal meet to date, winning the 120-yd high hurdles in a meet record time of 14.6 seconds, setting another meet record in the 440 with a 54 flat clocking, and running great legs on both the 110 x 4 and 440 x 4 relay squads, both of which won.

Fraser, meanwhile, was up to his own tricks, setting a new meet record with a 9.7 time in the 100 yd dash(incidentally, it was his first competitive hundred since last spring), and tying the 220 meet mark with a 21.5; good for another first. Fraser also ran legs on the aforementioned relay squads.

Don Price also had a big day for Queen's, picking up a second in the 120-yard hurdles, a third in triple jump, and a second-place finish in the high jump. His leap of 6' established a new Queen's record.

Weight man John Ongarato had a productive afternoon, picking up seconds in both shot and discus. His nemesis in both competions was Harvey Barkauskas of Western. Ongarato has improved greatly over last year, so the Gaels should fare a little better in the field events. Axel Becke just missed his first win of the year in long jump, when Brian Anderson of Western edged him out on his last jump. Becke's leap of 21'9" was good for another 2nd for the Gaels.

Meanwhile, back at the track, Brian Aiken and Toronto's George Veeny staged a see-saw battle for first in the 660-yd run. Both men held the lead at times over the last 200 yards, but Veeny slipped past Brian at the wire to win in meet-record time of 1:19.3. Aiken's time of 1:19.5 also broke the old record.

Jim Van Meer contributed a third in the 400-m, with a personal-best time of 51.9 seconds.

Finally, the relays: Van Meer and Archer Guy joined Fraser and Jarvis to set a team best of 43.2 seconds in the 4 x 110 relay, a full .8 seconds under their old mark, permitting Queen's to edge out Western and Toronto. The 4 x 440 event was the real upset of the afternoon, with Jarvis running a blistering 48.9 anchor leg to beat out favoured U. of T. by almost ten yards. Van Meer, Fraser, and Brian Aiken ran the other legs.

The Gaels move on to Windsor next weekend for the OUAA championships. If they get a big day from the field men, Queen's could have its first track title in years (and a few new OUAA records to boot.)

X-C 4th at York

Queen's cross-country team placed 4th behind Varsity, Waterloo, and Guelph on Saturday, in an invitational meet held at York University. Bruce Elliot and Steve Dillabough led Queen's with 15th and 16th place finishes (they had a sprint to the finish line) with the remaining team members between 17th and 26th. Ken Hamilton of York came first in the cross-country race itself.

Track Gals Improve

After getting off to a slow start in the first invitational meet two weeks ago at Waterloo, Queen's girls put on a much stronger performance at the University of Western Ontario on Saturday. Barb Beech won the long jump with a leap of 15 feet 10-¾ inches, and placed third in the high jump with a leap of 4 feet 11 inches. Irene Harris, in her first start of the year, finished second in the 100 yard dash with a time of 12.02 seconds. Aileen Kirby finished second in the 440-yard dash and newcomer Lynne Andrews placed second in the 880. Diane Jameson finished third in the 100- yard hurdles; Kathy Wynne came fourth in the 440 yard run; and Janey O'Rourke finished fourth in the 200 yard dash. Aileen Kirby, Irene Harris, Kathy Wynne and Lynne Andrews who ran in the 4 x 440 relay finished a strong second in a time of 4 minutes 26.4 seconds. The team came fourth in the 4 x 100 yard relay.

On the whole, the team did well in the meet, and prospects are very good for a strong showing next week-end at the OWIAA Track and Field Championships at the University of Windsor.

Canada: September cost of living rise first in four years

OTTAWA — Statistics Canada has announced that food prices for September increased sharply and that the overall cost of living index increased by one-half point. The index is now 9.7 per cent higher than a year ago. What could be bought in September 1961 for seventy-one cents now costs one dollar. It is the first September in four years that the index did not drop.

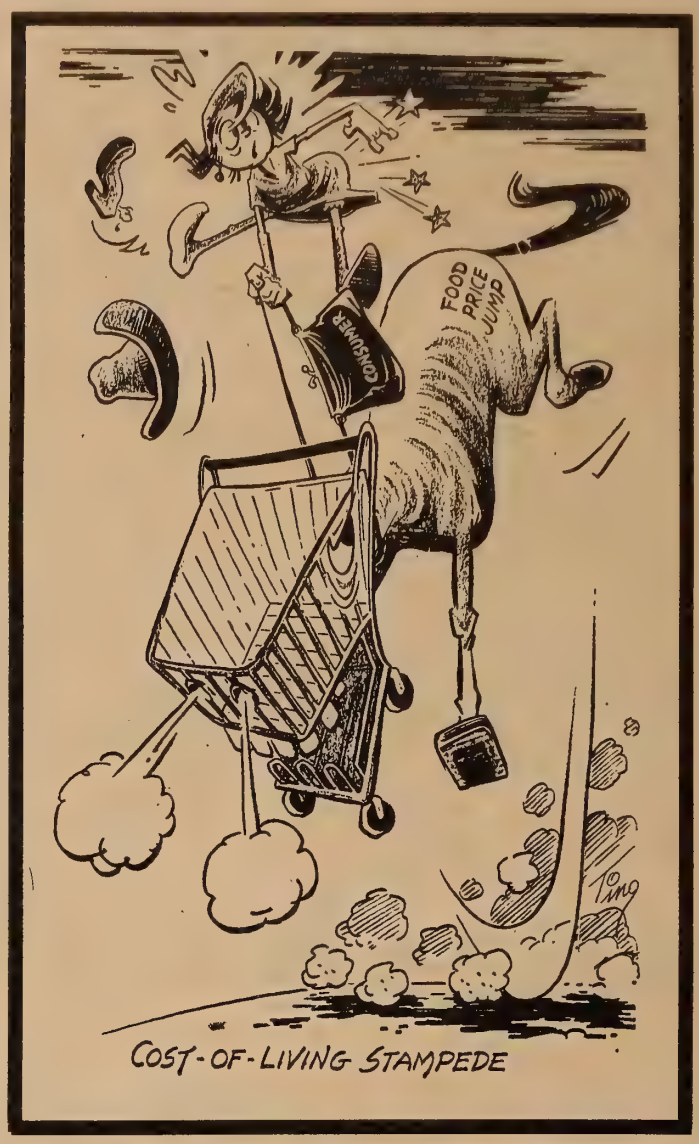
Opposition leader Robert Stanfield declaimed the eroding of Canadians' savings and incomes. He called for an increase in old age pensions to meet the higher cost of living.

New Democratic Party leader David Lewis claimed that Canada's poorer families are being forced into malnutrition by soaring food prices. He demanded an immediate public inquiry and measures to curb the price rises. He suggested that the government should take over the control of food prices.

TORONTO — York University has been faced with a second two million dollar cutback in their budget. York president David Slater stated that the university is in a state of crisis.

York is expected to fall short of their projected enrolment of 23,662 by an estimated 2,347. Slater stated that he would make exceptional efforts to hold all the regular staff and faculty.

York is the latest of a large number of Canadian campuses to face major budget squeezes due to falling enrolment Although Slater did not mention exactly what areas he would cut back, it is expected that he would not be renewing limited contracts and that part-time staff would not be hired where possible.



MONTREAL — The provincial Liberal Party won two Quebec by-elections last week in the ridings of Duplessis and Gatineau. It has been hailed as a major victory for the party. The Parti Quebecois ran candidates in both ridings but they held little support.

OTTAWA — The New Democratic Party has published a book naming 115 companies which it terms to be corporate welfare bums. These companies, it claims, received unnecessary grants or tax concessions. The book uses government statistics and company reports in its critique. Big corporatins, it claimed, command an unfair share of government money and power.

KINGSTON — There have been indications that Mayor Valerie Swain will not be contesting the upcoming municipal election on December 4. According to unidentified city aldermen, Mayor Swain may be leaving the position which he has held since 1968. Possible contenders for the office on December 4 are Aldermen George Speal, Kenneth Keyes, and George Webb, who was defeated in 1968. Equally possible are former mayors Robert Fray and William Mills.

VICTORIA — Premier David Barrett of British Columbia stated that his New Democratic Party government may be taking over the B.C. Telephone Company. B.C. Telephone which holds a monopoly on telephone service in the province, is controlled by General Telephone and Electronics of New York.

World: Embassy bombed

SAIGON — The United States has imposed extensive restrictions on the bombing of North Vietnam, after three American planes were sighted bombing the diplomatic quarter in Hanoi.

The French Diplomatic mission in Hanoi was seriously damaged and its top diplomat, Pierre Susini, seriously injured during a U.S. raid on the capital last week.

American sources claimed that planes attacked military targets north-east of the French compound, and implied that damage to diplomatic missions may have been caused by falling North Vietnamese surface-to-air missiles which were being fired at U.S. aircraft. They claimed that these missiles could have impacted on the ground after missing the target.

However, a CTV newsman who witnessed the attack stated that at least three American jets swept down over the heart of Hanoi, attacking low over the centre of the capital, which houses the diplomatic quarter and that no Vietnamese ministries of factories are anywhere near the area.

American Secretary of Defence Melvin Laird admitted that U.S. bombs may have struck the mission, but that he could not be sure. Ground to air missiles he stated are usually self-destructed by ground trigger if they miss their target, but they sometimes go out of control he added.

In response to mounting world criticism for the bombing, the United States has declared a buffer zone around Hanoi and all future sorties into that area are to be approved by the Nixon administration.

In the raid, the roof was also blown off the Algerian mission and there was minor damage done to the Indian Embassy.

In Paris, the talks between presidential advisor Henry Kissinger and North Vietnamese diplomats have shown major concessions from both sides on the makeup of the post was Saigon government. Although the North Vietnamese were insistant about the removal of President Nguyen van Thieu, they conceeded that it was not necessary that it be made up of three well-defined segments. The Americans have expressed an interest in seeing an integrated administration which would contain all the South Vietnamese interests.

SANTIAGO, CHILE — President Salvador Allende has declared a state of national emergency in Santiago and the central regions of Chile, in response to a nation wide trucking strike and supporting walkouts.

An indefinite strike has begun among small businesses, retail shops, the construction industry and private farmers in sympathy with the trucking strike.

The strike is mainly a protest to marxist president Allende's socialist policies. Jorge Fontaine, president of the Confederation of Production and Commerce, said that the Confederation's members are being threatened by Allende's plans to convert Chile to socialism. "There have been repeated attacks against freedom to work, and freedom of expression," he claimed.

PEKING — The establishment of diplomatic relations between West Germany and Communist China was culminated last week, when West German Foreign Affairs Minister Walter Scheel signed a communique announcing that agreement had been reached. No reference was made to Taiwan, as Bonn had never recognized the nationalist regime of Chiang Kai-sheck.

At a banquet celebrating the event, Scheel stated that West Germany, is establishing diplomatic relations with the Peoples' Republic of China, was answering "the demand of reality and reason."

Looking About

by Peter Jensen

The Labour Party, as if before a mirror, has been admiring its' new, radical-left character. Resolutions passed at their annual Blackpool convention mean to readjust society in favour of the working class. Just as the N.D.P. drums on about welfare and jobs, so Labour milled round managerial rights, hours of work and taxation. In these propositions of form, where do socialists differ from the Tory and Liberal?

If one stops and thinks, one will clearly perceive this sort of thing not to be an integral part of Socialist doctrine. All that is needed is to hammer two facts home in the public consciousness. "One, that the interests of the exploited are the same, and two, that Socialism is compatible with common decency." Form, yes-but form with a human face. (the quote is taken from George Orwell's The Road to Wigan Pier).

The revolving door

As it Happens, as evening CBC radio programme, reports an agent of the F.B.I., investigating the Watergate affair, said 'trying to interview the middle and lower echelons of the White House staff is like trying to talk with the Black Panthers.' The Watergate affair involves the alledged 'bugging' by the Republicans of Democratic headquarters earlier this year.

Oliver Guicahard, France's Minister of Development, has brought a charge of slander against former employee Gabriel Aranda; M. Aranda, who pinched state files indicating massive coruption in the civil service and U.D.R., the ruling party, has alleged scandal after scandal in the leading Parisian papers, notably Le Monde. As the onus is on M. Guichard to prove their invalidity, this case ought to prove most informative and of little comfort to President Pompidou, as his government is to fight an election this Spring.

Thirty-eight hundred students didn't vote in last weeks referendum. To those who comprise this total-look in a mirror: you will find the face of a mental eunuch, and if you have yet a rag of honesty, you will agree you have a discerning eye as keen as the eye of a potatoe.

Dear Pierre,

A certain Thracian, renowned for his obstinacy, was warned by his physician that if he drank a flagon of wine it would kill mim. The Thracian thereupon drank a flagon of wine and immediately jumped off the house-top and perished. 'For', said he, 'in this way I shall prove that the wine did not kill me.'-- an old story, well known. Ought not Mr. Trudeau consider it before he next proves the success of his government in creating jobs?

Lump dumped

by Jennifer Grass

Tumblewood will be closed at the soonest possible date as a result of a decision made at the AMS outer council meeting on Wednesday night.

A motion to this effect was first raised in the spring and has been the subject of lively discussion at three meetings since then.

For 45 minutes council members delivered varied statements on the reasons for closing the store. No comment was made in its defence.

Figures were again presented to show the financial status of the store. These were compiled by David Merrick, unofficial director of Queen's Student Agencies in conjunction with David Morel, the store manager.

Total sales for the last twelve months were $28,671.55. The value of goods taken on consignment amounted to $6,955.91 while other stock cost $13,678.61. Other miscellaneous expenses including wages, travel, rent and utilities came to $7,933.56. The average monthly loss was estimated at $976.34.

There was general agreement that the store was not doing the kind of things that it was desinged to do.

Ted Cape, ASUS president acknowledged that "it was a good idea but we must get out of the pile of molasses which we are in."

Discussion ended with a plea from Education Commissioner Ross Dunsmore that it's time to "dump the lump."

Greg LeBlanc, AMS president mentioned that the idea of selling the store would be considered and that the possibility of opening an outlet for crafts on campus would be looked into.

After the vote, LeBlanc received the keys to Tumblewood and a letter of resignation from Morel and his assistant, Holly Clark.

The letter said, "we have decided that we are not morticians, find someone else to bury the store."

In response to a question concerning his silence at the meeting, Morel told the Journal that "there was no sense wasting words as council members had already made up their minds before they came to the meeting."

Other business at the meeting included the rectorship, the OFS, bulletin boards and a new secretary for the AMS.

The council passed a motion that the nominations for rector read as follows, "we the undersigned nominate --- for the position of rector for a term of two years." The royal charter of the university lists the rector's term as three years. The present rector Alan Broadbent pointed out that the University does not wish to ask the federal government to change the charter in the fear that they would be given a provincial one. By allowing students to take on the job for only two years if they wish it will make the job more attractive. "There are many students who don't wish to make a three year commitment," he said. Several council members were uncertain as to the legality of this motion

Lyn Whitham, the new External Affairs Commissioner asked the AMS what stand they would like Queen's to put forward at the OFS meeting at Waterloo this weekend. All agreed that the subject of accessibility to university should be a major area discussed. In addition Andy Pipe suggested that the OFS push towards getting students

Grad res complains of noise

"The pub will discontinue live entertainment once the present contractial arrangements expire," Wally Palmer, AMS vice-president told the Journal.

This move comes in response to complaints from students in the Graduates Residence in the Union.

In a lively meeting on Monday afternoon with Reg. Rickaby, pub manager, Wally Palmer, and G. McGrath, Director of Residences, graduate students pointed out that the deafening noise from the pub makes it impossible to work or sleep particularly in the rooms in the well directly opposite the pub. They also expressed concern that people attending the pub were using the graduate residence bathroom facilities.

"This additional traffic adds noise," Bob Eaton, a graduate resident commented. "The pub assured us last month that they would keep ajoining doors locked but they haven't as yet," he added.

A questionaire is being circulated throughout the residence to determine if the grads are upset about the noise.

"We're not opposed to the pub but it is presently inhibiting the peace and quiet of the residence," Fritz Pannekock, a graduate student commented. "In many cases the canned music is turned up too loud as well," he added.

"If the grad residents are not satisifed within the next 3-6 weeks with noise conditions," a recommendation will be made to the Residence Board for the total elimination of sound," Pannekock said.

Vic Hall ousts AMS

The AMS outer council meeting was unable to hold its published meeting in lower Vic common room on Wednesday night.

The meeting was booked with Mrs. E. L. Trumper, business manager of women's residence but was later rejected by the four block chairmen in Victoria Hall.

Brenda Prosenyak, a block chairman, told the Journal that it is house council policy to hold only events which concern our residents in the common room.

Miss Prosenyak said, "We don't feel the AMS concerns women in residence. It is not a function or benefit to them", she added.

With his illusions shattered, AMS vice president, Wally Palmer, commented "I thought the AMS concerned all Queen's residents."

Kiloran German, WRC President tried to assure Palmer that it was a case of "breakdown in communication, as events booked in the common room must be referred to the WRC for approval."

"Fifty years in the saddle is a long time"

by Andrew Marshall

The title of this article is not meant to suggest CFRC's pre-eminence as a country music station so much as to quote a line from a birthday greeting by Queen's alumnus and Bonanza star Lorne Greene. Actually we haven't played any country music since the days when Hank Snow's "When the Iceworms Nest Again" was the station song. But last year when he was at Queen's to receive an honorary degree, Lorne Greene did a series of messages for CFRC's Golden Anniversary. The whole text of the above is, "This is Lorne Greene. Fifty years in the saddle is a long time, but CFRC has sure done it! Happy Anniversary CFRC." Another reads, "Out here on the Ponderosa range we're a little out of range of CFRC, but in a half-century of service a radio station's reputation sure gets around. Happy anniversary CFRC."

In a half-century CFRC has grown from an experiment in electrical engineering in 1922 to a service to students, faculty and the community at large in 1972. The first broadcast is reputed to have been a cornet solo by an engineering student. At that time the station was licensed under the call letters 9BT. In 1923 it became CFRC and one of the year's most exciting broadcasts was a play-by-play account of a Queen's-McGill football game. The Golden Gaels of Queen's won the Grey Cup that year and were Canadian Champs. Some wags suggested that CFRC stood for "Canada's Famous Rugby Champions". At any rate CFRC still broadcasts Golden Gael football (as well as hockey and basketball) and has twice followed the team to Winnipeg for a live broadcast as they sought Canadian championships in 1968 and 1970. Perhaps it's not much of an exercise in an age of live hockey from Russia, but still not a small accomplishment for a student-staffed radio station.

CFRC actually has only two full-time paid employees, the Station Manager and his Assistant, a "Girl Friday" who types scripts, prepares logs and supervises the record library, among other things. Technical service and design work are supplied by the Electronics Service Shop of the university, whose headquarters are nearby the station in the same building. All other services for CFRC, including program direction and general operations are handled by students of the CFRC Student Radio Club under the leadership of the Station Manager. The Student Club Executive consists of AM Program Director, FM Program Director, Chief Announcer, Chief Operator, Chief Transmitter Engineer, Secretary, Treasurer and Librarian. These people organize Club affairs and do the manifold tasks required to operate the AM and FM Stations.

Chief Operator Rob Wilson checks out the FM Control Room

Queen's Radio hasn't always had this sort of structure, however. The years between 1922 and 1972 have seen many phases, including one where CFRC was a commercial station -- but more on that later. Between 1922 and 1936 the station was used to broadcast special lectures and interesting events at Queen's, as well as to supply a working exercise in the developing technology of broadcasting. As an illustration of this, I might note that no less than six different transmitters were constructed by students and staff in the years from 1922 to 1939. Instrumental in the early technical development were such people as Dr. Harold H. Stewart, now a Professor of Electrical Engineering and CFRC's Technical Director, and Dr. D.M. Jemmett.

Programming tended to vary in quality and frequency in those years, and since CFRC was Kingston's ear to the world it was thought, especially with the founding of the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Commission (the forerunner of the CBC) that CFRC should expand its service. So, by arrangement with the Kingston Whig-Standard newspaper CFRC began in June of 1936 to broadcast a full schedule of daily programs with network service from the CRBC. The Whig-Standard handled the advertising end of things, while the University supplied on-air and technical personnel. Major James Annand was the Station Manager and Prof. Harold H. Stewart began his long tenure as Technical Director. Until 1942 this arrangement operated with good results. But the desire to "run their own show" on the part of the Whig Standard, combined with the University's feeling that it no longer wished to be associated with some advertising precipitated the newspaper's setting up of CKWS radio in 1942. The Queen's Medical Faculty had been particularly upset at patent medicine advertising on CFRC.

So Queen's Radio reverted to non-commercial programming once again. Between 1942 and 1945 programming was sporadic. In the summer of 1945 things were enlivened by the first of the Summer Radio Institutes held cooperatively with the CBC. At these seminars many broadcasters were trained by the best of CBC's personnel. Radio workshops continued until 1949.

The fifties saw the birth of an organized CFRC Student Radio Club, and because of limited historical records having been kept by the club, we know relatively little about its early growth except that it emerged as a splinter of the Drama Guild, which put on weekly dramatic productions over CFRC. Eventually some of these people became more interested in radio than drama and CFRC's programming expanded. In 1954 an FM transmitter was added to the facilities. By 1959 it had grown to the extent that the University saw fit to appoint a full-time Director of Radio, Margaret Angus. As wife of Dr. William Angus, head of Drama, she had been actively involved in the Radio Workshops of the forties and had become a successful professional scriptwriter for radio. As a result of her full-time appointment, the station began to let listeners know when it was on the air and to publish program schedules. Mrs. Angus did much to ensure that CFRC grew with the sixties and gave a vital alternative service to Kingston AM and FM listeners.

Upon her retirement in 1968 this writer was appointed to succeed her, with the title of the office being changed to Station Manager. In recent years CFRC and CFRC-FM have begun separate programming during part of their broadcast hours, in order to present more Fine Arts programs; Stereo FM and greater broadcast hours are being planned for the future.

AM Program Director Derek Redmond A-O's in Master Control.

At present the Student Radio Club has a membership of close to 100 students and does an excellent job of entertaining and informing the Kingston public. CFRC's present AM station broadcasts at 1490 on the dial with a power of 100 watts and CFRC-FM is at 91.9 on the FM dial with 1270 watts power. The stations present some international and exchange programs as well as locally originated ones. One of the most popular these days is the old BBC favourite, "The Goon Show". As well CFRC carries all Queen's football games and programs of rock, folk and jazz and classical music. CFRC-FM concentrates more on classics, presenting both local programs and carefully selected international ones. Included in the latter category are concerts from Europe's Salzburg, Bayreuth and Queen Elizabeth festivals, and weekly concerts by the Cleveland Orchestra. CFRC and CFRC-FM's most popular classics program is "Classics By Request" in which we spend four hours on Sunday afternoons accepting phone requests for favourites. Our most popular evening program is the free-form rock show "Nocturne".

Queen's Radio enters the seventies with a totally modern radio format which also attempts to maintain traditional program values that are often unavailable in today's "block" formats. And we hope that the next fifty years will see as much development in program practice with an accompanying maintenance of good broadcasting philosophy.

This weekend, October 21st and 22nd, Queen's Radio Station CFRC is celebrating its 50th Anniversary. Special broadcasts are planned for the Anniversary weekend, including a documentary covering Fifty Years of Queen's Radio". This program is scheduled for 7:00 p.m. Saturday evening on both CFRC and CFRC-FM. In addition CFRC will be holding an Open House in the studios in Carruthers Hall on the Queen's Campus on both Saturday and Sunday afternoons from 2:00 to 5:00 p.m. Student guides will be on hand to show visitors around. So tune in CFRC or CFRC-FM, and drop by our studios in Carruthers Hall to help us celebrate our 50th Anniversary.

Kingston candidates clash over Canadian concerns

by Sandra Bernstein

An opportunity to hear the three federal candidates for Kingston and the Islands was afforded to Queen's students on Tuesday, Oct. 17, in MacDonald Hall D and E. Students filled the seats and aisles to capacity to see John Hazlett (L), Flora MacDonald (PC), and Lars Thompson (NDP).

The format of the meeting was such that each candidate spoke for ten minutes, following which the audience was given the opportunity to address questions to the particular candidates.

The first candidate to speak was Miss MacDonald, who concentrated her address on the problem of Canada's environment. She criticized the present government's "mindless committment to and obsession with the growth of the GNP without regard for its distribution or for the quality of life." Calling for a revamping of the conservation policy and restriction of population growth through social, tax, scientific and immigration policies, Miss MacDonald told the government to abondon its "pioneer mentality".

Miss MacDonald suggested that we must give government support to the development of science and technology so that we remain competitive, but "without encouraging excessive consumption." She called for an environmental bill of rights which allows for individual rights, for an end to tax incentives on extractive industries when the products are processed outside of Canada, for an end to capital gains taxes on Canadian shares, for a crown corporation which would finance projects to improve the environment, and for research grants to Canadian companies, the patents issued thereby automatically reverting to the govenrment in case of foreign takeover.

Dr. Hazlett began his speech by saying that the large turnout was indicative of the concern of first-time voters at Queen's.

He then listed a number of statistics concerning health care in Canada. Citing selected programs of the present government, such as the LIP program and the Bail Reform Bill, he argued that the Liberals had instituted many programs of great value to the country. Dr. Hazlett did not discuss his party's platform for the next term at that time.

Prof. Thompson then delivered an impassioned speech which concentrated largely on environmental and foreign ownership questions.

Referring to Mr. Trudeau throughout the meeting as "the hero", he quoted the prime minister as saying "Why can't we sell (our natural resources) for good hard cash?"

Criticizing Miss MacDonald's well financed campaign, Prof. Thompson hinted at abuses but then went on to say that he'd "do the same if he had a big budget."

Discussing a particular evidence of environmental abuse, the English professor from Queen's said, "that ain't rape, that's a screw." He went on to quote facts he had learned at last week's environment symposium, although he said he "went for political reasons". He then located on a map the world's deepest lake, which is polluted "in the heart of the communist world."

On the subject of the country's economy, the NDP candidate said that what knows about economics "could fit in a thimble". However, he was sure that there were "no simplistic solutions."

After citing other waste disposal problems in the present system, Prof. Thompson called for "vision and for a planned economy, instead of letting Canada be "driven by population and profits on a treadmill to oblivion."

At this point the chairman opened the meeting to questions from the floor. The first question came from Ken Wong and concerned the financing of education.

On this subject, Dr. Hazlett said that responsibility for financing education should be shared meaningfully by the student and the government. He said that it should not be a hardship to students but should be "worth working for". Miss MacDonald cited a federal-provincial commission which would indicate that under the present distribution of powers there are simply not enough funds available to finance education for everyone who wants it. She called for a shift in jurisdiction.

John Hazlett

Professor Thompson limited his response to the question to a single statement: that Queen's helped elect the Conservative member in the last provincial election, and if we don't like the fee increase, "Why did you vote PC?"

The next question concerned the War Measures act and a definition of "Apprehended Insurrection".

Miss MacDonald stood opposed to the WMA two years ago, and went to Ottawa at that time to protest. She feels that the criminal code could have coped with the situation, and finds the passing of the WMA unacceptable.

Mr. Thompson said in a derisive tone of voice that "The hero acts decisively for law and order and 99 percent of the people support him." When asked what he personally did at the time, the candidate replied, "I was teaching poetry."

Dr. Hazlett said that the WMA was "not an issue". He said it was an act supported by the majority of Canadians, and one which made the world look on us with envy.

On the subject of an independent Canada, Prof. Thompson called for more power for the Canada Development Corporation, and his party's 10 point program.

Miss MacDonald said that the present government's legislation had ignored the findings of many commissions such as the Gray and Watkins commissions. She called the bill "weak kneed," since it dealt with only 10 percent of foreign investment in Canada.

Dr. Hazlett indicated that this bill was only the beginning, and said that "no party can buy us back". He added that the majority of the people want growth.

A minor row ensued over the next question, which criticized the "carrot and donkey giveaway politics" of the liberals, citing a Globe and Mail article which reported Mr. Trudeau's promise of a waterfront park in Toronto. Dr. Hazlett answered the question by saying that the questioner should not "believe the papers or radio as gospel". Some hecklers then shouted that they should not believe politicians either, and Dr. Hazlett ended by saying that this park was "typical of the action you can expect from the Liberals."

At this point a student asked Miss MacDonald why she was running PC when she was really a "diluted NDP". She answered that she had a personal conception of the PC party and hoped that she could help form party policy.

In answer to a qeustion on how each candidate would reform the welfare act, Dr. Hazlett said that he was in favour of a negative income tax, although the country would not be able to afford it in the immediate future. He said that we already have a guaranteed annual income for senior citizens.

Miss MacDonald criticized the spending of billions of dollars on people who do not need it. She would like to see a basis of needs established,and the establishment of a single program which would ensure that the basic needs are given to those who are truly needy.

Prof. Thompson criticized the work ethic, saying that with automation our concept of reward was changing. He favours a guaranteed income, which would leave about one-third of a person's needs to be provided by his own initiative. Quoting Hamlet, he said that after all, if men were paid according to their merit, "who should 'scape whipping?"

Asked for her stand on bilingualism by a student who had been angered by allegedly anti-Quebecois remarks made by two of her fellow PC candidates. Miss MacDonald said that she endorses the Pearson plan for bilingualism and biculturalism. as does Mr. Stanfield.

Mr. Thompson on this topic called for a belief in deeds, not rhetoric. He urged students not to pay any attention to what he says, although he is trying hard to bring his acts closer to his rhetoric, thereby "creating an existential wholeness to what he stands for."

On this note the meeting adjourned.

representatives on those bodies which advise the government on education. The AMS decided that it was premature to call a fee boycott until after further negotiations with government had been made.

LeBlanc indicated that the AMS will hire a new secretary because there has been a problem getting minutes and letters typed. Money from the commissions as well as from societies which occasionally require this service will go towards paying for this addition to the staff.

John Green, Campus Activities Commissioner formally announced his resignation on Wednesday night. He told the meeting that he "loved his work but was forced to resign for the sake of his school work." Palmer will be acting Commissioner until a replacement is found.

One appointment was announced at the meeting. Doug Fletcher was made chairman of AMS bulletin boards.

Women's centre will be discussed

There will be a meeting this Sunday, Oct. 22, at 8:00 p.m., in the second floor common room of the Union, for all women interested in the formation of a Women's Centre in Kingston.

The meeting is intended to discuss the concept, affiliations and functions of such a centre, as well as to word the brief and applications which will be submitted to the Local Initiatives Program in November, for financing the centre.

The idea originated with a group of women involved in the Kingston Women's Liberation Movement, and is based on other such houses which are now being successfully operated in other cities.

At a meeting last Sunday, a discussion on the basic purposes, problems and requirements of a Kingston Women's Centre was led by Ms. Bobbi Spark. It was agreed by most of the women present that there was a definite need for a house, staffed by three or four full time employees and a number of volunteers, which would serve women both in the university community and in Kingston exclusive of Queen's.

Some of the functions suggested for this proposed centre include: Birth control and abortion information and referral; educational services such as book and magazine lending; a video room and media centre; crisis centre; drop in; lodging for one to two nights for women who are alone or destitute; day care; a meeting place between community and university women; and possibly even moderate clinical facilities. It was generally agreed, however, that this should be quite distinct from existing social service agencies, although it would refer women to these.

The centre has yet to be more closely defined, however, so the group is urging women with ideas or objections to attend the meeting Sunday, or to call Penny Peterson (542-6304), Pat Hill (389-4418) or Nilly Parker (544-9286).

National Students Union

A date has finally been set for the founding conference of the proposed new national student union.

The national conference will be held in Ottawa, November 2-5. One topic to be discussed is a summer proposal that the national student union should be a "non-political" organization. UNB student president Ray Neill suggests the major topic should be standardized student loans and student services. He however is sceptical of a national union because Ontario universities seem more concerned with entertainment and Ontario-oriented problems.

Despite scepticism from Atlantic province representatives, the delegates will decide to form a new national organization.

Enough said.

Canadian economic nationalism. It makes good reading and it makes good sense. But the time for words is over. We need action. Few people in Canada have been more active in this cause than Flora MacDonald. She spent a year travelling coast to coast as the first Executive Director of the Committee for an Independent Canada. Her message has always been that Canadians must do more for themselves and rely less on foreign corporations to develop their country.

As an M.P., Flora will press for the immediate establishment of clear standards of responsible corporate behavior for non-Canadian businesses to enable Canadians to participate fully in their management, research, development and export activities.

For long-term development Flora will work for the definition, by Parliament in co-operation with the provinces, of key sectors in the economy where Canadians will play the major role. Foreign investment in these sectors will be strictly screened. In addition, government assistance must be provided to ensure the development of Canadian-owned labour intensive industries.

The Trudeau government has given Canada a non-policy on this basic issue. The country cannot afford 4 more years of inaction.

Take a positive step toward a real policy. ELECT FLORA MacDONALD TO PARLIAMENT.

Demand change

CUP - In their continuing protest against the structure of Quebec bar exams, more than 1000 students from Quebec's Law and Bar school marched on the Palais de Justice Tuesday, October 3.

Representatives of the students' common front proceeded to the Bar Association offices in Place d'Armes and walked into a session of the Moisan Committee, a Bar Association body which was conducting its own examination of the exam structure. Negotiations between the committee and the students continued until early Wednesday morning.

General meetings of law students have declared that the Quebec Bar exerts exorbitant, abusive and unacceptable power and privileges in matters concerning regulations on entry into the legal profession, and that any action of the front will ultimately be aimed at remedying this situation".

Included in the demands that the students are making for the upcoming November to April session of classes are: that there be six months of courses; that instead of the present 12 months, there be six months of articling; that the exams be on the subject matter of courses and that they count for 50 per cent along with 50 per cent for practical exams.

University of Montreal students seemed to be willing to jump from the frying pan into the fire. Unlike those at McGill, they doubted that the Bar Association was willing to change policy. Many talked in favour of intervention by Justice Minister Jerome Choquette.

Teachers taxed

CUP - Newly-arrived foreign teachers will no longer get away without paying income tax for two years.

During the past ten years, under reciprocal treaties with 14 other nations, Canada has exempted from income tax foreign teachers who declare their stay in Canada will be no more than two years.

Now foreign teachers will have income tax and Canada pension plan contributions deducted from their pay at the source. If they leave the country within the two-year period they may apply for a refund from the Department of National Revenue. Under the old system, it was possible for a teacher to pay no tax and then decide to stay in Canada after being here two years.

Deutsch urges caution

In the event of a fee strike in January, Principal John J. Deutsch said he hoped students "would consider all aspects of their actions."

A fee strike would result in a severe reduction in revenue to the university. Declining real resourses have already forced the university to cut back costs in the past two years. "Further cuts in expenditures particularly in academic services would be required if students decided to withhold fees," Deutsch said.

The fee increase and student award decrease were probably "done in too much of a hurry, without too much thought to the implications," he added.

When the final report of the Wright Commission of which Deutsch is a member, appears in December, important recommendations concerning student aid will be made.

What has the Trudeau Government done to foster the growth and advancement of the arts in Canada?

1.) This year, nearly $14 million has been allocated to the National Film Board which covered the production of 141 English language films and 67 French language films in 1970-71, including Mon Oncle Antoine.

2.) The Canadian content of television programmes has been increased to 60 per cent.

3.) A special fund has been created to expand Canada's publishing industry, ie books written and translated by Canadians and printed by Canadian-owned publishing houses.

4.) A new school-hostel has been built at Rae-Edzo in the NWT with a northern oriented curriculum emphasizing the native languages, traditions, and skills of our first Canadians.

We have a great land.

The Trudeau Government wants to keep it that way.

Delay explained

Dear Editor:

In response to the deluge of criticism levelled at the concert committee, but more importantly to inform those students who patiently waited through last Thursday's Malo concert the following explanation is offered.

It was obvious to those who attended the concert that the problems causing delay were related to the sound system. Westbury Sound of Toronto was hired by the concert committee to provide the sound for all three groups. This system, though not the most sophisticated available was perfectly adequate for the requirements of the musicians as well as the size of the arena. In response to allegations of disorganization it must be stated that this sound system was set up and in perfect running order at 12 noon on the day of the concert. Thus it was available all afternoon for testing and sound checks by any of the groups that chose to do so.

Malo's sound and equipment men arrived at 4:00 p.m., they inspected the sound system and approved it as being adequate for their purposes. Dr. Music's equipment men arrived late, at 4:45 p.m., they inspected the system upon arrival but did not register either acceptance or refusal of it's use. Fludd arrived shortly thereafter and decided to use their own sound equipment since they were more accustomed to it's operation.

At approximately 8:15 p.m., 15 minutes before the concert was scheduled to begin and more than three hours after they had arrived, Dr. Music decided to use their own equipment rather than using the system we had provided. This proposal was immediately vetoed by the committee since it would have caused a long delay in the start of the concert. In an effort to compromise with Dr. Music since they had decided after 3 hours of procrastination that their own system would better suit their performance it was agreed that they would integrate their mixer board with Westbury's system. Since it is a relatively short operation it was assumed that it could be done during the performance of Fludd who were using a separate system. Problems resulted when it was discovered that Dr. Music's sound man was not competent to integrate his mixer into an unfamiliar system. Subsequently, further delays ensued when Westbury Sound had some trouble amidst the crowd and pressures in re-assembling the original system which had been functioning properly before the concert. Dr. Music ended up performing a short set with only a partially operating system. The long break between Dr. Music and Malo was required to iron out the problems which were preventing the operating of the complete system.

At this point the concert committee must accept partial responsibility for the delay, because we permitted Dr. Music to attempt last minute adjustments to a sound system which was performing well before they attempted those changes. Looking back on the situation it would have been much better to refuse them that priviledge.

olitical figure, "This is a corporate rip-off" at the expense of the student body. (How, with all this financial support, "lack" of major original investment, and prices which mainly parallel those of "standard" downtown restaurants, does the operation of Beaver Foods and the Student Memorial Union become a "non-profit" organization catering to a student body who for the greater part cannot afford the high cost of a food service which at its best is poor?)

A major segment of the student body are first year students who as yet are uninitiated to the fallacies of a service for which they will, if unchanged, pay a rich price. One may question as to what alternatives are available? I could simply reply: "A revamping of the old management (Beaver) or a new catering service with some backbone and imagination capable of providing a reasonable service at a reasonable price, and a definite end to the University's improper management of our money". Fees, as we all too well know, have jumped $100.00 or 20 per cent for most students and much more for many others. This only makes the average student a bit poorer for the term and yet the cost of coffee has risen 50 percent to 15c for an item which only costs approximately 4c per mug with cream and sugar.

How long are we, the gullible student body of a very conservative university, going to take the shit of a university corporate rip-off which has already for so many years labelled this continuous stream of excrement at a student body which does not seem to have the initiative to question WHY?

Look at our Union, designed almost 30 years ago for a maximum of 4000 students. Look at the general decor, do you find what you see is pleasing or at least pleasant? Do you find waiting 15 minutes for a hamburger and coffee a large pain in the ass? Do you find that paying 15c for a hot "swamp-water" coffee is justifiable when you get much better elsewhere from people who are out to make a profit from you? Do you find the jostling for seats, having your toes and coats walked on, an atmosphere conducive to relaxation between quite often hectic classes?

So if you agree, start asking questions look around you when you walk into your Student Union, and if you honestly believe something is wrong, it is your right to express your ideas and the place to do it is through the AMS via the AMS representatives (if you can tear them away from their busy agenda of also making money from you via their large housing investments, business endeavours and of course, the Pub,) or you can call me at 544-9279. Let's have an honest change now! A new Students' Union so often referred to is at least six years away. We will have come and gone by then, using the same old unexpanded facilities, eating the same old unimaginative food and of course at higher prices. You can't afford to support the system for another year, let alone another four. Think about it!

Whodunit?

To the Editor:

Is Agnes Etherington Arts Centre a gallery for the people or an elitist institution?

I tend to believe the latter after visiting the Arts Centre last week to view "Realism: Emulsion and Omission" and "German Expressionist Prints". Both exhibits could only be viewed satisfactorily with the purchase of gallery publications since each piece of art was identified only by a number which referred to a guide book. Therefore, unless one were solvent enough to fork out $2.00 for a book to accompany the Realism exhibit ($1.00 if one is a member of the Gallery Association) and 15c for a small poster describing the Expressionist Prints, one would not know the title or the artist of any of the art in these displays.

I propose that since Queen's University is supporting the Arts Centre, at least we of the Queen's community (and hopefully all Arts Centre visitors) are entitled to know such simple details as title and artist of the art in our gallery without purchasing gallery publications.

Hazlett

Dear Editor,

As Federal Liberal candidate in the riding of Kingston and the Islands, I have expressed my desire to carry on a limited degree of medical practice, if I am elected to represent my riding as member of parliament.

I believe it is sufficient to point out to the two students whose letter was published in your journal on September 13th, and any others who are interested, that a doctor, particularly a surgeon, has an ethical and moral obligation to continue, to the best of his ability, the follow-up of his patients. In particular, a patient undergoing serious and involved back or other major joint surgery, values the continued advice and ability to contact the surgeon who knows the most about his particular problem.

In addition, I have a number of friends as well as patients, who might look to me for medical advice.

I will not let these people down, in spite of the comments of your two student correspondents.

Yours sincerely,
J. W. Hazlett, M.D.

Busit equality

Dear Editor

As given to understand, the third week of "Busit" was to be the time when the PUC would count the number of student users. It was on the basis of use during this crucial period that the rates charged to Queen's students would be assessed. To date there is no evidence of such a count or survey. Am I to assume that the PUC and our humble, elected representatives (?) of the AMS have already agreed on a price for this, in my opinion desirable service and that we are merely going through the motions?

Further, the people who are more likely to utilize the bus and who reside in Henderson Place of Barriefield have been excluded. Could it be that the extra nickel required (30c vice 25c fare) would bankrupt the PUC? If so, I would be only too happy to pay the nickel and show my students card. Or is it, as usual, that the AMS forgot about the minority altogether? I was informed that the AMS had no bargaining power--what a line! The PUC is in this business to make money, and, I might add, money which they are not now realizing, without having to increase the services presently provided. Surely the Transit System runs with or without student support, except in the latter case it's yearly deficit is higher.

The undersigned hopes that the AMS delegated to the bargaining table will insist on equality for all students when negotiating the terms of contract.

G.H.P.

Dear Ed:

In answer to the two previous letters in the Journal re: photographers disturbing other students, logically the tactful approach for the photographers would be to let the issue die. The point is, however, that their position should be defended despite the fact that there may be valid points raised against them.

If the majority of the students truly feel as adverse to photographers as the writers of the two published letters, the A.M.S. would probably withdraw support (through proper legislation) from the Tricolor-Journal and the Golden Words. The photographers would surely be sorry. Doubtfully, however would their enthusiasm be dampened. The membership of the camera club would increase somewhat, and the students would still face the same "problem" (without a Tricolor-Journal, Golden Words, and probably Who's Where.)

As mentioned, valid points may have been raised against them. It doesn't look professional to have a swarm of photogs in the show. Who's professional? The photographers are advised to adjust their cameras rather than use a flash as it is annoying to the crowd. Common sense would tell us that in fact. (How often do we think of that when looking for a souvenir photo with our Instamatics? A point here is that the POP! of an electronic flash is not as irritating as the SHPLUT! of a flashcube.)

I don't want to get involved in a discussion of the yearbook, (it was over-inked, still one of the best around however) the papers, etc. but I'm sure most of the student's here would rather suffer the photographers than do without the publications. Doing a fine job photogs.

P.S. If anyone is so damned spoiled that you can complain about the flashes try a concert in To. or Montreal.

Casey Kelly - Elektra 75040

Ever since I first laid ears on this record I've been towing the mark, wanting to tell somebody about how good it really sounds, and it really sounds good. It isn't a brilliant revelation or anything of that sort. In fact, the album is musically quite simple. This is Casey Kelly's first album. He plays a pretty fair guitar, has a strong musical voice and likes to sing about rather simple situations. Why then, would one bother with the whole affair, if it's so common and simple?

Well let me give you a hint.

The first cut of the album, "Silver Meteor", sets the tone. Backed by the legendary Sneaky Pete on pedal steel guitar, Casey hauls into a toe tapper that holds its own against most any around. The musical back-up is superb, so light, yet so tight. Keyboards, handled by Craig Doerge, keep surfacing and receding, blending beautifully with the unobtrusive but simple perfect beat layed down by one Russell Kunkel. The resulting sound is fluid, sparkling country-rock.

The quicker tunes are all memorable. Things like "Poor Boy", "You Can't Get There From Here", featuring a cameo appearance by Jim Messina, "Resign Yourself to Me", and "Run Away" are all fun-timers.

Some slower, more reflective things constitute about one third of the album and features Casey Kelly's excellent vocals. In general, they reflect the remarkable healthy tone which the entire record seems to generate. Lyrically, Kelly possesses the same ability to turn a phrase which characterized Jackson Browne's debut album earlier this year. The words just sort of fall into place, nothing spectacular, they simply go together in a way that leaves one thinking, "I wish I'd said that".

My vote for the nicest song on the album goes to "A Good Love is Like a Good Song." If you listen to this cut a few times you just can't get it out of your head.

I was a lonely solo voice in the crowd,
Just whistling sadly with my head always bowed.
I hadn't anything of which to be proud
And then I saw her and my Heart sang out loud.

A good love is like a good song
It grows on you 'til it's so strong
It never leaves you, it never goes wrong

You know a good love is like a good song.
We introduced ourselves, my heart simply soared
We walked and talked about the things we adored
Within the rhythm of the rain as it poured
I heard the echo of an old familiar chord
It said. . .

So there you have it. If anyone pays any attention to this album it'll go pretty far. You can consider me impressed.

This Sunday we have the chance to see Stevie Wonder. His latest from Tamla Motown is "Music of My Mind".

Steveland Morris was born blind in Saginaw, Michigan, in 1950. That's right, Stevie Wonder is only 22. At the age of twelve this black musican released his first album, "The 12-year Old Genuis", and came to world fame as "Little Stevie Wonder". Since that time he has released 16 albums and had over a dozen golden records, including "I was made to love her""For Once in my Life"and "Signed, Sealed and Delivered". Clearly an impressive feat for anyone.

In the past, the only use I have had for Stevie Wonder's music, has been as an accompaniment on the dance floor for my "Detroit Moves". For the last few years Stevie has attempted to shake the "Little Stevie Wonder" label, and his P.R. people have introduced each new album as the new Stevie Wonder, "Stevie Wonder, the man". But now it is finally true, with "Music of My Mind" he completely distinguishes himself as a musician, a composer and an arranger. He is no longer just another Motown "Do-Bopper", but an artist conveying his moods through this music. This is a strong album.

"Rolling Stone" has called it "the great album of the year." And this is without regard for the personal achievement of the album. For, with the exception of a guitar and trombone solo, Stevie does everything on the album himself. This includes playing the piano, drums, harmonica, organ, clavichord, clarinet and ARP and Mogg Synthesizers. To quote the album jacket, "The Man is his own instrument. The instrument is an orchestra.

Note: Stevie's tour group "Wonderlove" includes a number of ex-Paul Butterfield people and four singers.

Keeping in touch,
Slip

A tight singing unit, the band consists of Chris and Ken Whiteley and Tom Evans. With Chris playing the harmonica, guitar and trumpet, Ken playing the Kazoo, banjo, dobro jug and guitar and Tom playing the clarinet, fiddle, mandolin and guitar, they have a considerably wide instrumental range. Their vocal range is also quite extensive.

Queen's first "Game of the Year" comes up Saturday afternoon when the Gaels take on Varsity for the entertainment of what will probably be a sellout Homecoming crowd. The Gaels are tied with Ottawa U. and Toronto in the OUAA's Eastern Division, all with 3-2 records. If the Gaels beat the Blues, Queen's will be in first, and will host Ottawa the following weekend. If Queen's should lose, they will still make the playoff, if the Carleton Ravens can knock off Ottawa in the Panda game.

So much for the preliminaries. Now, who do you look for Saturday? The Gaels' offense shapes up like this: John Hollingsworth (74) and John Waddell (71) start at tight end, (although Alex Melvin (73) plays often, and well) with Dave Whiteside (67) and Bruce Potter (61) at tackle. The guards are Don Gordon (53) and Keith Taggart (54), with Tom Dickinson (40) at centre. Rick Koski (42) and rookie Greg McNamara (41) are the backup men. The backfield will probably see Tom Taylor (16) at quarterback, Dave Hadden (27) and captain Brian Warrender (23) at the halfback slots, Geoff Hamlin (26) at fullback, and Stu Lang (30) at flanker. Raold Serebrin (14) is Taylor's backup, with John Booth (28) the backup running back (and a top kick-return man as well).

Defensively, the Gaels are showing some new faces. Greg Anderson (78) and Norm Hagarty (72) are a pair of fine rookie defensive ends, although Paul Hand (44), Don Smith (65) and Dave Devonshire (68) have been around for awhile at the tackle slots. Bill Thompson (79) can play either position, and handles the third-down snaps as well. Brett Biggs (76), John Tovee (51), another rookie, and Gord Squires (22) are the linebackers, with Bob Grimm (29), Andy Sakell (52) and Ian Anderson (34) as the spare parts. The deep five include Doug Cozac (15), the Gaels' fine place-kicker, Alex Morris (38), who leads the league with five interceptions, Dave Campbell (39), the Gaels' punter, and Joe Pal (29) and Darryl Penner (25). Pal was an OUAA All-Star last season at corner, and Penner is yet another rookie find. Gil Labine (70) is the backup man here.

A comment to the author, whoever that brave soul may be, of the "editorial", dealing with the coaching attributes of Messrs. Tindall and McCarney, that appeared, unsigned, in the October 18th edition of Golden Words: if you propose to write an opinion article of this nature, at least have the guts to sign. If you were at all familiar with the problems encountered by the Gaels in 1969 and 1970, it would be quite apparent that the deficiencies did not lie with coaching decisions, but rather with the ability of given personnel to execute these decisions. The 1969 team lost nine starters, including George McKenzie, Derek Orr, Theron Craig, Paul Lindros, John Stirling, and Mike Nihmey on defense, and Don Bayne, Terry Haggarty, and John Gordon on offense. Back-up men Glen Penwarden and Brian Donnelly were also missing; Lorne McConnery was ineligible, and Ron Clarke, the Gaels' big fullback, was lost for half the year with a knee injury. The Gaels had good personnel, yes. The problem was McGill had better, especially at quarterback, and Manitoba, who won it all that year, had even more. Bill McNeill was a fine athlete, and a good defensive back; he was an adequate quarterback, who did improve during the season, but that wasn't enough. So, let's try 1970 on for size. First off, we didn't go to the College Bowl in 1970. We lost to the University of Manitoba Bisons, in overtime, in Winnipeg, in the Western Bowl. Rochette played a fine game for the Gaels; his last-second pass to Brian Warrender almost pulled out the victory. But, it was a fumbled snap from centre, at a time when the Gaels were moving well against the Bisons that set up the winning score for Manitoba. Coaches seldom make calls like that one. Rochette threw the ball quite well enough to win . . . but he didn't hold on to the ball when he needed to. There were a lot of other reasons that things didn't work out well in that game - a rookie named Lang misjudged a kickoff that went for a single, a guy named Eaman was playing hurt (he was still faster than his replacement, but there were a couple of times when two healthy legs would have meant a quick six for Queen's), Jim Sherritt was hurting . . . at any rate, you do the best with the personnel you have. But, these are not coaching decisions . . . they're football facts of life.

On into the "Taylor Era", and some of the same things apply. In 1971-72, Tom Taylor was, for all intents and purposes, a rookie quarterback. He played well, he made rookie mistakes, he improved over the season, especially with regard to his passing . . . but, like most rookies, he had trouble picking a team that was flat up by himself. Don Bayne could-sometimes- after he spent three years behind Cal Connor, learning to be a great quarterback. In terms of a game plan, a strategy, for the Western fiasco, the Gaels were ready. In terms of emotional preparation, something that is very much the concern of the individual, not the coach, they were not. The result was quite obvious. I will agree, at times last year, and this year, that I have disagreed with some of the decisions made by the Queen's coaches (by the way, not all the decisions are made by Frank and Moose - Bill Miklas, who mans the phones up top, Jim Sherritt, and Jim McKeen also have a lot to do with it.; However, when the reasons for the decisions have been explained to me, they usually make some sense. The trouble with coaching is, you can make the right decision, but if the execution isn't there. . . We'll see Saturday how old the men at the top are.

Moose and Frank too old? We doubt it, but maybe Saturday will tell the tale - with a Queen's victory!

Varsity takes OWIAA tennis title

Superior depth and some smooth play in the doubles competitions led the University of Toronto to yet another OWIAA Tennis title here Saturday. Playing under adverse weather conditions, the Varsity girls swept both the first and second doubles and the second singles events to finish with 38 points, well ahead of second-place McMaster who ended with 26 points. Western was third with 20 points, a combined team from York and Waterloo finished 4th with 16 points. Anke Bonsels of York broke the T.O. grip on individual titles, defeating Theresa Quigley of Western 10-6 in her final match to win the first singles crown. The match was a frustrating one for the UWO star, who appeared baffled by the wide assortment of cut shots used by Miss Bonsels. On several occasions, the York girl made fine returns that simply spun away from her opponent.

Queen's contingent managed to qualify for the finals as representatives of the OWIAA's eastern division but had little success thereafter, finishing tied for last spot with a composite team from Carleton-Laurentian.

Ski club expanding

The ski club has been rapidly expanding since it was started six years ago. Last year they had a membership of 550, 200 more than the previous year and their budget doubled from $7,000 to $14,000 in the same period.

This year the ski club hopes to organize day trips on Saturdays and Sundays to the surrounding ski areas. The traditional Tremblent weekend will be planned for early March. Other perspective trips include a ski trip to the Eastern Townships during the Christmas holidays and one to Mount Ste. Anne during the reading week.

The ski club is also hoping to offer free lessons to members of the club. Qualified instructors will see one trip free in return for giving instruction.

Membership in the club is $1.00 and interested skiers are encouraged to join at any general meeting.

The flag football season is well underway now and one very interesting fact is that Commerce '75 has yet to be scored on in their three games so far. They have defeated Law '75 30-0, Arts '73 8-0, and Arts and Science Grads 7-0, in their three games to date. Last year's Commerce '75 team went as far as the semi-finals only to lose to Commerce '72. They were the first frosh team to get that far in post-season play. This year, with Commerce '72 gone and the league winners, Law '72 also graduated, Commerce '75 could well make a strong bid for the championship.

In golf, the semi-final round has now been completed. Bill White defeated Dave Miller and Tom Bainbridge defeated Steve Blake. Bainbridge and White will now meet for the individual golf championship.

November 10 is the deadline for entries for the innertube waterpolo competition. League play will commence on the following Tuesday, November 14 at 10 p.m. in the Pool. Schedules will be posted on the Monday. Team captains for each unit are asked to pick up a copy of the rules from the Pool office. For further information contact the sport supervisor, Simon Beitler in the Pool Office.

Scorekeepers and referees are needed for the Bews and inter-faculty leagues which will be getting under way early next month. Those people who are interested are invited to sign the sheets on the notice board in the locker room or contact Mr. Carnegie. A hockey referees clinic will be held Monday October 30 in Seminar "A" of the Physical Education Centre beginning at 7:15 p.m. While not compulsory, this clinic will be of great value to anyone who is interested in refereeing this winter.

The Harrier races were conducted last Monday at the Glen Lawrence Golf and Country Club. A total of 219 competitors took part in the event of which no less than 101 were from Civil and Math. Civil and Math "A" team came first followed to PHE in second place Commerce '74 was third. The Civil and Math "B" team placed seventh. With 30 points being awarded to each participant, 500 points going to the event winner, and 50 points going to the seventh place team, it means that Civil and Math picked up nearly 3600 points on Monday afternoon. Our congratulations to them for their fine performance.

A lot of matches are still to be played in the paddleball and squash singles tournaments. The first round should be completed by today The draws are posted on the locker room notice board and entrants should consult these sheets. Try to have the first round matches completed as soon as possible. Don't forget that entry sheets for various team sports are also posted in the locker room and if you are interested in any of the sports, please sign your name or get in touch with your athletic stick.

Entries for Bews hockey and paddleball doubles close next Wednesday, October 25 at noon sharp. Remember that no entries will be accepted after the deadline so get them in now. Both events will begin the following Monday. Schedules will be posted in the locker room.

A look at the Bews race finds Civil and Math still leading the way with 5350 points. Since these results are only up to October 13, the harrier results are not included. Mechanical, Commerce '73, Mining, and PHE complete the top five.

The WIC tennis tournament was held last Sunday. Congratulations to the winners Jarmila Smola, PHE, in singles and Marilyn Samuels, PHE, and Diane Wisley, Nursing Science, in doubles.

Coming events include paddleball, ringette, synchronized swim and a swimathon. Entries for paddleball close on Friday October 20 at 5 p.m.; the tournament begins Tuesday October 24. Entries for ringette and swimming close the following Friday.

A ringette clinic will be held on October 25 from 7:00 to 8:20 p.m. Ringette is a fairly new sport in intramurals. It is a non-contact ice sport played with sawed-off hockey sticks and a ring. It can be a lot of fun so why not come on Wednesday night with your skates and learn the basics?

Basketball continues on Tuesdays and Badminton on Thursdays.

World: Contenders running close in West German election

BONN — The upcoming West German election promises to be a close race according to recent polls that have been taken. Chancellor Willy Brandt's Social Democratic Party is receiving tough opposition from Rainer Barzel's Christian Democrats with only four weeks of campaining left before November 19.

Barzel, who represents the conservative elements in West Germany has cautioned that voters must be aware of the creeping communist elements in the left of Brandt's party, which is espousing large government participation in the community. Brandt, on the other hand, has branded Barzel and the Christian Democrats as a tool of big business and claims that a win by Barzel could result in serious working class disturbances.

The election was called last last month after Brandt moved and intentionally lost a vote of confidence in his government. In making the move Brandt stated that he was putting an end to the deadlock which has resulted from the erosion of his original twelve seat majority to nothing.

The Social Democrats are supporting a good neighbour policy with Eastern Europe and a large increase in government spending. The Christian Democrats are placing major emphasis on economic questions.

Representing the middle line is Brandt's small coalition partner, the Free Democratic Party under Foreign Affairs Minister Walter Scheel. Their major interest is to seek the middle road and prevent major shifts to the left or right, which could result with either a Christian Democrat of a Social Democrat majority.

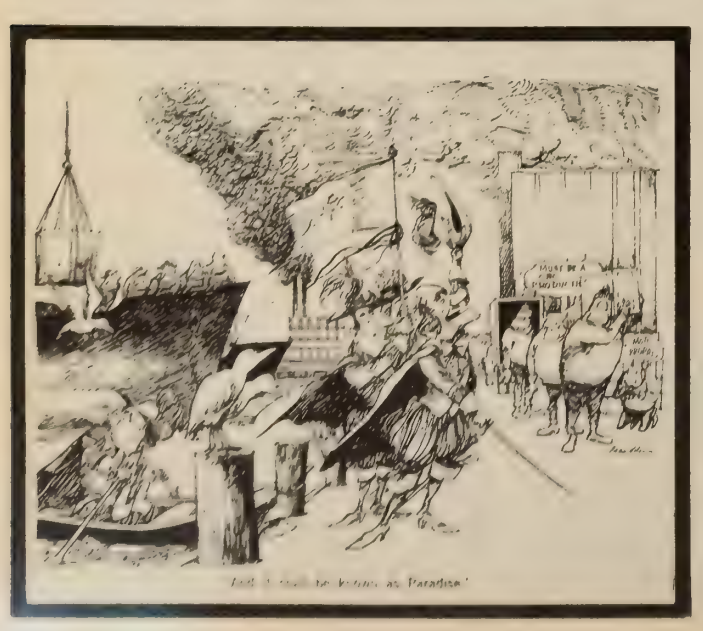
SANTIAGO, CHILE — Anti-Marxist political groups in Chile have thrown their support behind the national strike by truckers and their sympatizers which has paralyzed the country.

The province of Santiago and sixteen of twenty-five others are still under a state of emergency as supplies of food and fuel are becoming scarce.

Violence has broken out in Santiago's commercial district as authorities tightened control of the news media and most shops and businesses stayed closed in support of the strike. Police equipped with tear gas invaded the downtown areas of the city as hundreds shouted "Chile is and will be a country of liberty."

Meanwhile the truck drivers have decided to continue their strike indefinitely. The bank clerks and the Chilean Association of Engineers have also announced plans to join the strike, and asked their members to stay away from their jobs.

BEIRUT — Ceasefire has been declared along the borders of North and South Lebanon, putting an end to their three week old conflict. The Arab Mediation League has been working for peace in the area since the fighting began September 26.



TEL AVIV — Israeli planes have struck into Syria and Lebanon in a new move to crush Palestinian guerillas and their bases. According to an Israeli military source, Israel is adopting a policy of hitting first.

A thirty minute attack was launched on five guerrilla bases in the two countries, however a Lebanese communique stated that anti-aircraft fire kept the Israeli jets from hitting their target.

Palestinian guerrilla leader Yasir Araf has since agreed with the Lebanese government to discontinue raids into Israel through Lebanon.

TOKYO — The Cabinet of Premier Kakuei Tanaka has approved the doubling of defense spending as part of the nation's fourth five-year plan. Japan has clearly been building their military strength, but Tanaka claims that it is for purposes of self-defence only.

The Japanese government is aiming at a defense budget equal to one per cent of their GNP. At present, with the increase, it stands at $15 million over five years or .88 per cent. Tanaka has also announced plans for a super-sonic jet fighter, largely of Japanese design.

Canada: Mayor Swain will retire

KINGSTON — Mayor Valorie Swain has announced that he will not seek re-election in the December 4 municipal election. Swain, after two-two-year terms in the mayor's office, has expressed a desire to retire from politics and return to his law practice.

He first entered politics in 1964 as a city alderman, was elected mayor in the 1968 election, and was returned by acclamation in 1970. The post, he claims has required a minimum fifty hours a week of his time. His two terms in office, Swain claims, cost him $15,000 a year in lost income from his law practice. Swain simply stated that he was tired and that he had shouldered the burden long enough.

OTTAWA — The Peoples' Republic of China and Canada have concluded a civil air pact, clearing the way for direct flights between the two countries beginning next year. The pact has now to be referred to the respective governments for ratification. The Canadian carrier is expected to be Air Canada, which already has scheduled flights going to the Orient.

CAMBRIDGE, ONT. — Voters of Preston, Galt and Hespeler have elected to name Canada's newest city Cambridge. The three previous centers were merged into a regional government which is to become effective January 1.

The new city, located near Kitchener, will also take in about 3,000 acres of Ontario Housing Corp, land north of the Macdonald Cartier Freeway, in addition to the three municipalities.

Jack Young, former chairman of the Regional Planning Board is to be regional chairman and Preston mayor Claudette Millar was elected mayor.

OTTAWA — A cross-country nutritional study of 21,000 Canadians has revealed that health problems among 4,000 of them are serious enough to warrant referral to a doctor. Nutrition Canada discovered that one in every five interviewed were sufferring from problems such as vitamin defficiencies, high colesterol blood levels, heart conditions and metabolic diseases, notably diabetes.

OTTAWA — Daily arrivals of between 100 and 200 Uganda Asians are expected for the rest of this month. So far the seventh plane load has arrived bringing the total to 837 since September 28. All that are arriving in Canada are fluent in English and most have worked as professionals, skilled tradesmen, and businessmen in Uganda. Britain is taking in ten flights a day.

Election: Canada

OTTAWA — According to the second gallop poll before the October 30 election which was just released, the Liberals continue to hold a substantial lead in popularity and the New Democratic Party is gaining substantial support.

During interviews held in the third week of September, the Liberals were favoured by 44 per cent, the Conservatives by 31 per cent and the New Democratic Party by 21 per cent. An additional 4 per cent went to Social Credit and other candidates, while only 11 per cent of those interviewed were undecided.

The Liberal popularity figure is just under what they received in the last election, but the NDP popularity is 5 per cent greater than in 1968, reflecting substantial gains in Ontario and the west. The Liberals were shown to be gaining support in Quebec, but losing it in the west.

SAULT STE. MARIE, ONT. — Robert Stanfield, leader of the Progressive Conservative Party has come out in favour of cutting personal income taxes by four percent to be effective as of last July 1. The retroactive cuts, he claimed would be anti-inflationary and at the same time would help Canadians make ends meet. He felt that the proposed three per cent increase which is scheduled to go into effect January 1 is the wrong step to take at this time and should not be used under the present circumstances as a means of combatting inflation.

Stanfield also reccommended price and wage controls in times of emergency as a means of defeating inflationary psychology. He also suggested that old age pensions should be reviewed on a monthly rather than yearly basis to keep it more in line with the current cost of living.

TORONTO — Five thousand residents of the Parkdale area in Toronto were left off the voters' lists after last Friday's deadline for enumeration. The same problem has arisen in various Vancouver ridings, where as many as 2,000 may have been missed. Blame has been placed on the lack of time allowed for recruitment of enumerators and actual enumeration. It has been suggested that the government take over responsibility for ensuring registration of voters instead of leaving it up to the populace.

KAMLOOPS, B.C. — Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau has announced that no tax cuts will be made if he is re-elected to office. Although there is substantial unemployment, he said, the economy is generally booming and tax cuts would over-stimulate the country and push inflation out of control. Trudeau claimed that unemployment could be best combatted on a regional basis with economic expansion programs in slow growth areas.

CHURCHILL, MAN. — New Democratic Party Leader David Lewis has taken his campaign to the remote ridings and is playing on the media to spread his message. Touring the massive and sparsely populated riding of Churchill which covers two-thirds of the total land area in Manitoba, Lewis is attempting to pull stronger support from the province. Churchill is regarded by the NDP as their best chance for gaining ground in Manitoba.

TORONTO — The federal government has announced that it will begin expropriation proceedings along the Toronto waterfront between Bathurst and York Streets for an 85.6 acre federal urban park.

The park is designed to be the Liberal's major bid to hold their present nineteen out of twenty-four Metro area ridings. It is one of the number of "goodies" that Trudeau announced he would be revealing before election day.

However, the government has announced that it is allowing only $30 million for reimbursing those being displaced. These include the Toronto Harbour Commission, Maple Leaf Mills Ltd., Canada Malting Company Ltd., Terminal Warehouses Ltd., Loblaw Groceterias Co. Ltd., and the Harbor Brick Co.

A spokesman for Maple Leaf Mills stated that his company alone would be entitled to much more than $30 million.

Last chance to bitch about university centre

Daniel Norman

The University Centre User's Committee will hold its first open meeting on Thursday, October 26 at 7.30 pm in the lower lounge of the International Centre. A brief presentation of the university centre concept will be given before questions and comments are solicited from the audience. The following is a statement of purposes from the University Centre User's Committee.

The University Centre, first proposed by an AMS committee in 1969, is intended to encourage the coming together of individuals and groups from all parts of the Queen's Community. Such encounter, in social, recreational, and cultural situations is an important part of University life. More adequate and attractive lounges, dining facilities, recreational facilities, and spaces for student organizations will provide increased opportunities for all of us to enjoy and learn from the varied population and life of the university. In addition, the Centre will contain a variety of services, so that we can satisfy some of our day-to-day needs more conveniently. (Student typing, Career Planning, a bank, a drugstore, etc.)

The Centre concept involves a cluster of activities at the corner of Union and University (a "Main Centre"), and a number of Sub-Centres. A User's Committee is presently trying to decide exactly what needs to go in the "Main Centre" (a renovated Union, and a new building on the north-west corner of University and Union, together with some nearby houses, such as 165 University Ave.) However, the concept accepted by Senate recognizes that we should make provision not just in a "Main Centre" but throughout the campus so that people have places to sit, to talk, to have coffee. The first Sub-Centre will be open next September in the new Arts and Social Science Complex (behind Richardson Hall). It will contain a lounge and coffee-shop. Possible dates for completion of the Main Centre are 1975 or 1976.

The purposes of the University Centre are clearly stated in the report of the earlier Planning Committee (1971):

"The Centre concept involves more than a mere building. The physical structure, while essential, serves only to facilitate the achievement of certain objectives.

The central and overriding purposes of the University Centre must be:

1. To foster communication among and between students (both graduate and undergraduate), faculty, administration and alumni.
2. To provide essential services and amenities for the convenience of its users.
3. To provide for the cultural, social, intellectual and recreational life of the University Community."

Politics seminar

The Politics DSC will hold two seminars at 7:30 pm on October 26 in the faculty lounge. Topics to be discussed are Political Studies as a career field and student participation in curriculum and undergraduate studies planning. Speakers will include Professors J. Grove, Head of the department, G. C. Perlin and B. Berman. All students and faculty members are invited.

The Public is Cordially Invited to Attend

OFS silent on fee strike, calls demonstration

Ed note: The following was written by a Queen's observer on Saturday night at the Waterloo Ontario Federation of Students Conference. He did not stay for the sessions on Sunday.

WATERLOO — On the afternoon of Friday, October 20, AMS External Affairs Commissioner, Lyn Whitham, led a small entourage off to the University of Waterloo to attend the Ontario Federation of Students general meeting. The main purpose of the weekend conference was to interpret the referendum held earlier in the month, on the Ontario fee issue, and to decide on initiatives for future action.

Friday evening, a plenary meeting was called into session which representatives from seventeen Ontario universities attended. The results of the OFS referendum were discussed and each university presented a commentary and interpretation of its own particular referendum results.

It was astonishing to this reporter to see that the bastion of middle-class passivity, Queen's, led all institutions on Ontario in voter turnout. Such success on the part of Queen's may be attributable to three things: 1.) promotional abilities of Gary Gannage, Inc. 2.) A reincarnation of convition in the heart of the moribund Queen's soul. 3.) the blatant lack of student concern throughout the rest of the province in the activities of the OFS and the plight of the underfinanced student. However, no matter why the vote results were as they were, Queen's University did have the best turnout; Queen's University did demonstrate the most student solidarity. (Voter breakdown for the referendum may be found on page 7.)

Consequently, the opinion of the delegates was that a fee strike per se was not feasible in the view of the low voter-out. However, the OFS executive threw open to discussion, the possibilities of creating a trust fund into which the universities could be paid when either the government capitulated to the demands of the OFS or the individual decided to capitulate to the adamancy of the government and the university.

As one school after another rose on Friday night to make excuses for the inability of their students to "come across" with the vote, the solidarity and impetus of the OFS fee movement visibily began to transform its kenetic energy into latent intellectualism on the ethics of strike. More than once, delegates were heard to cry "where are we going, great body?". Only Queen's, U of T, Laurentian and Western, were able to argue for strong action in a credible manner.

Although many delegates from other universities concluded their excuses with encouragements and promises for intense solidarity, one had to feel that these statements were more the wishes and dreams of unsuccessful student leaders than the concise factual projections of objective student representatives. Observers left the plenary on Friday infused with the feelings which old die-hard student leader Peter Warrian, the last president of the Canadian Union of Students, echoed for all on Saturday afternoon, when he addressed the plenary on the subject of student government. Warrian observed that the inadequacy of student politicians to ally support for their cause was clearly mirrored in the fact that the most middle-class of all Ontario universities, Queen's, Toronto, and Western, the schools with the least to lose from fee hikes because of the conservative affluence of their students, were the only universities effectively to support the fee referendum. "Oh, what has happened to student militiancy," Warrian asked. (Probably, in the opinion of this reporter, the same thing that happened to Peter Warrian. Both forces died with the sixties.)

The death of student militancy was clearly demonstrated Saturday morning when the plenary broke into four groups to discuss the fee strike, and new directions for negotiations with the provincial government. Not only were the discussions carried on in a quiet, intelligent and well-organized manner; but also, the students attending were able to prepare several coherent, and enimently sensible resolutions for debate at the resolution plenary scheduled for Sunday.

In summary form, the groups decided that the negotiations should continue as they have in the past. Notwithstanding this decision, no one denied that the general referendum turnout was most disappointing. However, the groups did not give up the idea of a fee strike. Concensus was that, if there were to be a fee boycott, something the OFS will decide in November, it must be a full boycott of fees, and not a simple withholding of the $100 amount which the government had added to this year's fees for Ontario under-graduates. The mechanism for the boycott would have to take one or two of two forms. Either individual withholding of second term fees by students and-or payment by students of their second-term fees into a provincial trust fund

Exec. meets McNie

TORONTO — The Ontario Federation of Students voted this weekend to hold a day of protest against the fee increase, and to demonstrate at Queen's Park on the day of the opening of the Ontario legislature.

The OFS also mandidated its executive to meet Monday (October 23) with the Minister of Colleges and Universities Jack McNie, to demand an immediate, unambiguous statement of government policy on tuition fees and student aid for the 1973-74 academic year. The executive was instructed, however, not to accept any offers from the government.

The body will meet again in late November to assess negotiations and to plan further action.

Queen's, the University of Toronto, and the University of Western Ontario, will not participate in the demonstrations being planned. Queen's deligate to the conference Lyn Whitham said she voted against the motion because she was "hesitant about the expediency of such action", having reservations about the turnout at such a demonstration because the deligations "most adament about a demonstration came from schools which had the poorest turnout in the (fee) referendum. I don't like the idea of demonstrating. It reduces the possibilities of support from the public."

Miss Whitham also pointed out that Queen's "couldn't afford financially" to support a demonstration.

The meeting also endorsed a Queen's proposal to seek more support from community groups and the mass media for the student demands, and planned campaigns to make both students and the public aware of the OFS demands and to publicize the upcoming demonstration.

Miss Whitham denied rumors coming from the student government at U of T that the OFS attempted to quietly water down its demands. She said that the demands were discussed with a view towards the November conference.

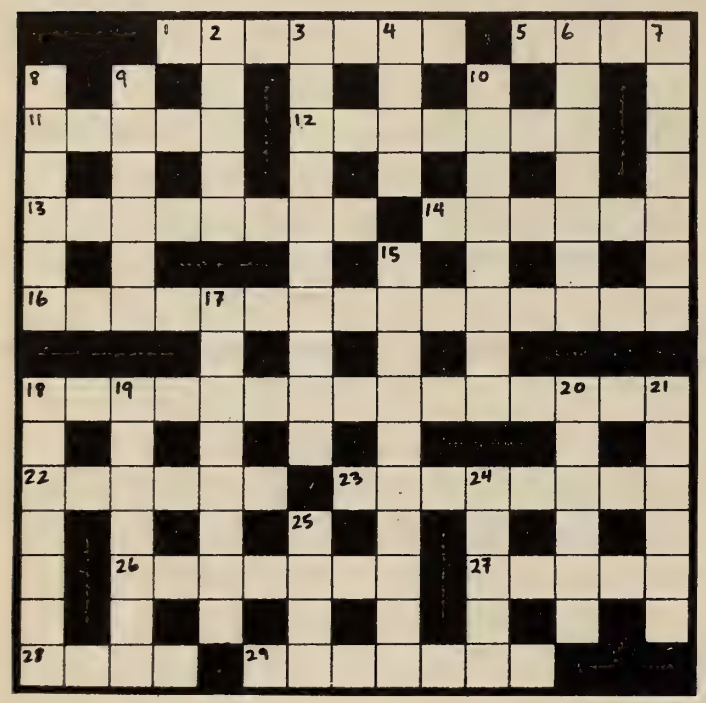
Prof. Sayeed questions value of social scientists

by Raj Anand

As part of the Alumni Theological Conference held this week, Professor K. B. Sayeed, of the Department of Political Studies, gave a lecture last Wednesday on "The Role of Social Scientists in Shaping Public Policy."



Sayeed considered the influence of university professors, government advisers, and so-called "intellectuals" on three levels: in international policy, in U.S. policy, and on the Canadian scene.

The value of social scientists on the international front, on the whole, has been questionable. As Sayeed put it, "they tend to use scientific methods to apply to human situations." For example, the knowledge in economic trends accumulated in years of academic life by an American professor may have little value when applied directly to an Islamic nation. Economic "experts" who advised President Ayub Khan of Pakistan not to interfere in the private sector of the Pakistani economy immediately hailed Pakistan as "the economic showcase of Asia;" when investigated further, it was seen that twenty-two "families" were profiting immensely and the rest of the country was close to or below the poverty level.

Focussing on Pakistan, Sayeed examined the attitudes of the U.S. before and during the

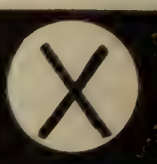
THE STRENGTH OF OUR LAND

What has the Trudeau Governmnent done to improve Canada's foreign relations with the other countries of the world.

It led the way in the diplomatic recognition of the Peoples Republic of China.

It has established closer relations with Latin America. Canada obtained observer status in the Organization of American States, and is now developing closer ties with Mexico.



A widely publicized tour of Russia by the Prime Minister in 1971 helped to foster better Canadian-Soviet relations especially in the fields of science and trade.

Canada has contributed 35 per cent to the 1972 operating costs of the Agency for Cultural and Technical Cooperation, an agency that promotes the growth and diffusion of culture and technology among Francophone nations, especially those of Africa.

WE HAVE A STRONG LAND.

French Canadian studies courses limited

by Jennifer Grass

A survey of 24 Canadian universities, including two bilingual ones, reveals a serious lack of French-Canadian content in university French courses.

The survey, entitled "French Canadian Studies and their place in University French Department: A Critique and Model for Change in English Canada" was released last week by three Carleton University professors.

Dr. Gerard Bessette, a professor of French at Queen's, was among the group who supported and helped with the study.

The report criticizes the French departments of English-language universities for failing to treat French Canadian language and literature as serious areas of study.

"In general, French departments seem to consider French-Canadian literature and civilization marginal and French Canadian language an unfortunate corruption of pure tongue: the so-called international French which is really the language propagated by the government and institutions of France and which remains culturally and linguistically foreign to many aspects of Canadian life."

The emphasis placed on 19th and 20th century French literature is also attacked on the grounds that such courses prepare students by major ommission, to believe that work done in Canada is not 'serious' work especially when French Canadian literature is barely offered or limited.

The report criticizes the limited number of courses in language and linguistics. Where such courses do exist, it is pointed out that students are taught "a language which is exclusively international and are thus ill-prepared both on the linguistic and cultural level for any real contact with their French-speaking neighbours.

The researchers' model of course-offering has three areas of concern. In each of French-Canadian literary studies, French literary studies, and studies in language and linguisitcs, majoring students would take a mimimum number of courses.

The language courses will aim at developing in the student the linguistic competence of his French-Canadian counterpart.

A university should offer a maximum of thirteen courses in French Canadian literary studies, 15 courses in French studies and 16 in French language and linguistics, the report says. But it admits that "the total number of courses offered in each area would depend upon the resources of individual universities, but a ratio close to the one presented here should be retained in order to provide a full and open program of offering that is fair to the integrity of each area."

At Queen's three courses out of a total of 27 are devoted to French Canadian literature.

Dr. G.W. Ireland, head of the French department said he had approached arts and science dean Dr. Ron Watts concerning a further appointment to the department to extend French Canadian studies. The reply was inconclusive. But the report will be circulated throughout the French department and discussed at the next curriculum meeting, Ireland said.

Labour major topic at candidates forum

by Bob Mutrie

The three candidates for Kingston and the Islands in the federal election met in the Steel Workers' Hall Thursday night to discuss the issues.

Dr. John Hazlett, Liberal candidate in the October 30 election was first to speak."The Liberal government has done much for labour during their past years in office," he claimed. In 1967, under Prime Minister Lester Pearson, he pointed out that 237,000 civil servants were given the right to strike. In 1971, he continued, the Unemployment Insurance Act was revamped, allowing a wider range of coverage, and increased benefits providing a "direct injection of cash to low income consumers." Hazlett also told the audience of the revision of the Canadian Labour Standards Code to raise the minimum wage to $1.75.

He outlined the program a Liberal government would institute for the next four years, emphasizing a preventive mediation program to lessen time lost in labour disputes.

"I began campaigning when the Prime Minister (Trudeau) announced that he had dealt with the major social problems facing Canada and actually hadn't", Progressive Conservative candidate Flora MacDonald revealed after Hazlett finished speaking.

She pointed out that one in every three families in Canada are living below the pverty line. "No government can feel self-satisfied until this problem is solved," she claimed.

To alleviate poverty MacDonald suggested that a minimum income program should be instituted. There should be incentives to find self-fulfillment in work, she claimed. Not only is it a question of income, but of personal dignity and power, MacDonald pointed out.

She stated that organized labour has been important in giving individuals the dignity they need through allowing them a say in actual decision making. Macdonald pointed to the example of Newfoundland fishermen being exploited by fish merchants until they formed a community organization to help themselves.

MacDonald stated that the strike as a potent weapon is obsolete as everyone ends up a net loser. She announced that a Conservative government would seek other means such as negotiation throughout contract terms instead of just before termination of the agreement.

Lars Thompson, the New Democratic Party's local candidate started his address with an example. He told of a member of the United Auto Workers union who was presently earning an income of $7,000 which he paid $1,161 in income tax. "Why, when International Nickel made $94 million last year, did they not have to pay any income tax?" he asked. "The economy is being mis-managed for the benefit of the rich powerful corporation at the cost of the private people", he stated.

Corporate rip-off is costing jobs, Thompson claimed. We need more money for secondary industry where more jobs become available", he claimed. He stressed that too many of Canada's raw materials are being shipped to the United States providing investments in American secondary industry and by-passing Canadian.

Thompson claimed that the strike was still an important tool for organized labour in their battle to gain a better share of their own labour. He claimed also that labour wage increases should not be blamed for the high rate of inflation, pointing out to the lower relative level at which wages are compared to that of prices.

In the question and answer period which followed, the three candidates were asked to comment on the role of crown corporations and the Canadian Development Corporation.

Hazlett pointed out that although there is a shortage of Canadian long-term investment the money does exist. "The Canadian Development Corporation was designed to encourage such investment" he claimed. Crown corporations were placed under the CDC"s jurisdiction to provide it with a strong bases and to ensure Canadians of its stability.

Thompson stressed that more bite must be put into the CDC to encourage more investment in Canada. However, he stated, the New Democratic Party would not list it on the stock exchange but keep it in public hands.

MacDonald pointed out that the CDC is already funded by $2 billion and that she would not transfer crown corporations such as Polymer to it. She also stated that the CDC should be placed immediately on the stock market to allow Canadian investors an opportunity to invest in it. "It is our contribution to developing Canada" she said. MacDonald also suggested that crown corporations be established in the area of pollution and conservation.

On the subject of the $1.75 per hour minimum wage set out in the Canadian Labour Standards Code, MacDonald stated that she favored a minimum income somewhat higher. She also pointed out that old age pensions were well below the poverty line set out by the Economic Council of Canada and suggested that they be kept more current.

Thompson suggested that an income of $1.75 per hour is impossible to live on and stated that the $2,000 poverty line for a single person that was suggested by the ECC was equally impossible. He pointed out that the federal government should be setting an example, but stated that they were starting their employess at $1.92. Thompson claimed that it

Bangla Desh crisis. Why, he asked, did the majority of economists and many of the most distinguished academics support and eulogize President Ayub?

This, Sayeed felt, was an example of the application of traditional Western principles to a wholly different environment. Economic advisers have hampered Islamic societies greatly by considering them in terms of Western liberal democratic forms which are entirely inapplicable.

It is true that task forces consisting largely of university people played a large role in shaping the educational and urban planning programs of Presidents Kennedy and Johnson. But were they conceived as part of a unified policy? In general, they were not. The governments received large numbers of innovative ideas, but two main problems remained: integrating the diverse suggestions, and implementing them. On the whole, policy was improvised, not planned.

The result then and now, both in the U.S. and in Canada, is that programs are produced by different sets of advisers, concentrate on different areas, and accomplish diametrically opposite aims. The interconnections are lacking.

One of the missing interconnections is the link to power politics and the aims of politicians. Professor Litwick of Carleton, commenting on the failure of his governmental reorganization programs, said, "Certainly I was overoptimistic in hoping for governmental reorganization....what we though was non-bureaucratic was indeed bureaucratic." What Litwick had failed to take into account were the influence of certain power structures, which would be distrubed if his proposals were implemented, and the business sector, which also resisted his programs.

Does this mean that we cannot depend on either governmental agencies or intellectuals for advice in public policy? Sayeed said that this question raised another fascinating problem: "How do we train young minds in the art of advising governments?" In Harvard and a few other universities, there is a great emphasis in the social sciences on political and operational analysis; in other words, the students are taught the practicalities of the world in which their advice must be implemented.

Sayeed was skeptical about the merit of such training: "What I find disturbing is the training of young people in political and administrative manipulation." Students are being taught seven skills in being "operationally successful;" for example, how to influence the boss, knowing where power lies, and so on.

But governments today cannot depend on bureaucrats to provide analysis in certain vital areas. The responsibility must to a great extent lie with students. An immediate difficulty with this, of course, is the previously-mentioned lack of touch with reality which is evident in many social science courses. "The walls at universities are still high, if not impregnable," Sayeed claimed. He likened their teaching to John Keats' concept of "negative capability:" accepting a situation without reaching for fact or reason.

But on the other hand, should universities succumb to the "dollars value" concept prevalent in Communist societies? This theory claims that society must be compensated for the money invested in a student. Accordingly, the student must study strictly with the aim of entering a field in which the country needs professional people. A social science student would be taught only in terms of the social problem at hand. The result of such an outlook, of course, is the loss of the autonomy and intellectual integrity of the university. "Is the university a conscience-keeper?

At the close of the lecture, Sayeed's analysis of the role of social scientist left us (with these questions about the basic aim of the university.) With those questions about the basic aims of the university, Sayeed concluded his analysis of the role of the social scientist.

administered by a reputable trust company. Allowance for individual retrieval of fees from the fund was also favourably considered.

Payment to local student councils was rejected by the groups. At the same time, everyone agreed that everyone ought to research and disperse bales of information on the retention by universities of OSAP cheques for the second term. The administration at U of T has stated that the university has no right to require students to pay fees before the OSAP cheques are issued. Laurention, however, disagreed.

Whether anyone will actually do the research necessary to resolve this conflict was never discussed. This fact, in the opinion of this reporter, seems to mitigate against the success of any information dispersal; however, in defense of this oversight, there was only so much time for decisions at the conference.

Group discussions eventually passed on the courses of alternative action. Toronto demonstrations seemed to be very popular with many of the delegates who were hot to trot all over Queen's Park grass.

For the more timid delegates, the plausibility of reams of paper being signed with protestations of students appeared to be more acceptable. Locally organized teach-ins and demonstrations found favour with the demigods of a more instructive bend in the student governments. However, debate in this area was equally divided between the impossibility of attracting audiences to the teach-ins and the impossibility of attracting audiences to the teach-ins and the improbability of discovering teachers to teach them. Through no fault of anyone, it became apparent that there was a distinct chance that neither audience nor teachers would be found.

Thus the discussion rambled on to an encounter with the wise suggestion of Miss Whitham that each campus devote itself fervently soliciting support from municipal governments and community organizations. With all probability this suggestion will find wide support on Sunday. This support will be rallied, if for no other reason, than the fine eloquence of Miss Whitham, who has indeed become both an adept politician, and a gracious ambassador for Queen's.

As this reporter sits writing these words, in the early evening of a wet Waterloo Saturday, the excitement with which some delegates arrived at this meeting has given over to the soft sounds of complacent snoozing as many delegates dozily await the Sunday resolution plenary. In the midst of the somuolence, a happy little man from Waterloo trips about behind the scenes, churning out irrelevant motions on matters the plenary will never have time to consider. These motions request OFS support for North Viet Nam, labour union militancy, the NDP, and abortions on demand. This little man is known to this reporter as the father of many other motions which fell to oblivion at many other past meetings; and this reporter must wonder whether the new motions this chap has produced are from an honest desire to better society, or simply an attempt to maintain his growing reputation.

Destruction of our environment eminent

"Social Problems in Environmental Reform" will be the theme of this year's Dunning Trust Lecture Series.

The fact that our environment is deteriorating is recognized by most.

Projections of present trends in environmental destruction and in the closely related field of resource depletion, indicate that within the lifetime of a majority of those now living we shall face famine, epidemics, and war.

Despite the lip service paid to environmental quality at all levels of government, the gains are outrunning the losses. The issues are being ignored by our politiccians. Neither the population at large nor the politicians has had the courage to face the fundamental changes necessary in some of our society's most characteristic beliefs. As long as disaster is not actually upon us, we continue to hope for a miraculous solution.

The three Dunning Trust lecturers--an ecologist, an architect and a town planner will present formal lectures concerning our ecological problems, and also meet with smaller groups on campus.

Garrett Hardin is an American biologist now teaching at the University of California. His major concern is with human population dynamics, evolution, and the history of science. "Population, the Solution is in our Minds" is the subject of the lecture he will deliver in Dunning Hall on October 23

Raymond Moriyamam, Caanadian architect who has won numerous awards for his designs, including one for the Ontario Science Centre, will speak on "Growth, Temporal and Spiritual" on Tuesday. He will also show a short film, "The Great American Goose Egg Company".

Ian McHarg is a Scottish landscape artist who came to the United States twenty years ago. A practising planner and academic at the University of Pennsylvania, McHarg summed up his attitudes to landscape in his book "Design with Nature". He will expand on this theme on Wednesday October 25 in Grant Hall. McHarg will be joined by Messrs. Hardin and Moriyama at the end of the evening to summarize their views and impressions from the three days of seminars. Chairman of this important session will be John Livingston, professor of environmental studies of York University.

We must accept a challenge in examing these attitudes and values of our culture which have negative consequences for our environment. The fate of future generations must be given greater consideration.

The three Dunning Trust lecturers this year are eminently qualified to quide us in this task.

was impossible for anyone to live under $5,000.

Hazlett pointed out that we must "be realistic as to what the tax payer can afford", He claimed that an increased minimum wage could cause a decrease in job opportunities. The Minimum wage of $1.75 figures to $3,000 a year which is well above the poverty line, he claimed. He also stated that the average income in Canada is $6,000.

On the repatriation of Canadian resources, Hazlett pointed to Trudeau's statement that, no way can Canada buy Canada back.

Thompson quoted from his party platform that a New Democratic Party government would increase public investment in resource industries, which would include public ow ership. Control would be attained in the oil and gas industries and any continental energy deal would be vetoed. "The NDP would put an end to unjust tax concessions to resource industries, especially those under foreign control," he said.

MacDonald claimed that her party's policy was not as strong as she would want in this case. She stated that Canadians should control their own economy and that she "hopes her influence in the party will stimulate it to be more active in this field."

"It is unreasonable for every young couple to want to own their own home", Hazlett stated, commenting on high mortgage rates and CMHA charges. Young couples should rent homes, he stated, and work towards ownership.

MacDonald pointed to the need for wage, price and profit controls to get inflationary psychology under control.

Thompson placed blame for high housing costs on land speculation and high lot costs.

"Price, wage and profit controls would throw a monkey wrench into the economy," Hazlett claimed. The present inflationary trend is attributable to local factors, he stated and he cautioned against over-reaction. He claimed that the cost of living in Kingston is not excessively high.

The three candidates were asked to comment on whether those sentenced to terms in jail and penitentiaries be allowed to vote.

Hazlett gave an emphatic "no", claiming that those sentenced in our courts are sent to jail to protect society. He claimed that inmates must work towards a re-establishment of their civil rights.

Thompson felt inmates should receive the franchise, claiming that giving them a sense of worth is crucial to their rehabilitation.

MacDonald was in favour of giving inmates the vote, claiming that they are still individuals entitled to basic rights.

In his closing statement, Thompson commented on his seriousness as an NDP candidate in a riding which has voted in a traditional way. "No party has an exclusive truth and honest dialoque is important", he said. "It is more important to stand for the things you believe in". One must have a well informed conviction, he pointed out, adding that one must have a party with a well informed conviction.

MacDonald addressed herself to housing costs, pointing out that the majority of Canadians who are in the $4,000 to $9,000 bracket cannot afford CMHA charges. She would set up land assembly banks and eliminated the 11 per cent sales tax on building supplies. MacDonald claimed that 41 per cent of the cost of a home may be attributed to the cost of land, profit and profit overhead. She pointed out that the CMHA receives 7 per cent loans from the federal government, yet charges 9 per cent on its mortgages, thus giving the government a profit.

In closing, Hazlett stated that the Liberal Party was interested in social progress and reform. He also referred to his maintaining his medical practice if elected to parliament, stating that he still has "some moral and ethical obligations to his patients", and so will continue to maintain an office.

Canada: Two announce candidacy

KINGSTON — Two Kingston businessmen have put their name forward for alderman in Victoria Ward in the December 4 municipal elections. They are George Holloway, manager of Grand and Toy Ltd. and Kenneth Lamb, realtor.

Halloway is president of the downtown mall committee and was a key figure in organizing Kingston's first mall on Princess Street last summer. Lamb is past president of the Kingston Real Estate Board, and if elected alderman he says he will work toward keeping taxes down, an improvement in city police protection and relief for tax exempt property in the city.

Joseph Hawkins, running in Frontenac Ward, is the only other person to announce his candidacy.

TORONTO — Ontario Hydro's 12,000 union employees have ended a 122-day strike and are back on the job. After a week during which an impass in negotiations were realized, the union and Hydro agreed to submit the matter to a three man arbitration board. A member will be nominated from each of the two parties involved and they will then select a chairman.

TORONTO — Figures released by the Ministry of Colleges and Universities show that fulltime enrollment on Ontario campuses hhas fallen 9,100 short of projections made ten months ago. Instead of the expected eight percent increase in enrollment, an increase of only one percent was realized.

According to the report, only the University of Guelph and Regis College in Toronto beat their projections. Many universities and colleges are indicating millions of dollars in deficits because of the smaller enrollment, the report claimed. Carleton is facing a $1.3 million deficit and York has had to cut $4.1 million from its original budget plans.

For the first time in many years the number of graduate students has declined, from 13,919 to 13,360, the report said.

OTTAWA — Finance Minister John Turner has announced the redevelopment of fifty acres of land in the historic Lower Town section of downtown Ottawa. The plan includes a group of buildings and covered malls and possibly 1,000,000 square feet of federal offices.

The plan is part of the government's plans to revive the core area ecncompassed by Ottawa and nearby Hull.

KINGSTON — The Royal Canadian Horse Artillery Brigade Association, which owns land along the Kingston waterfront has reached agreement for its sale to Ottawa developer William Teron, ending their year-old dispute.

Teron declared that he could not proceed with his plans for development of a $30 million marina city unless he held the RCHA land. The development will include a residential and commercial complex.

OTTAWA — The Department of Health and Welfare has announced that unemployment insurance payments were up thirteen per cent during August, a time when the number of claimants had fallen.

Total funds distributed amounted to $143.8 million compared with $127.1 million in July. The number of claimants fell five percent in August.

The explanation given was that August consisted of five Tuesdays, the biggest day for UIC payments. The report also stated that the number of claimants tend to be overstated as each recipient's report is kept for five weeks after his last welfare receipt.

OTTAWA — New rules announced by the Canadian Transportation Commission will make chartered flights more reliable and put an end to the danger of being stranded overseas as thousands were this summer.

The rules also opened charter flights to everyone, whether they are a member of an organization or not, as long as they book the flight ninety days in advance and at that time pay twenty-five percent of the fare as deposit.

TORONTO — According to the Technical Services Council of Toronto, job openings have increased 34 per cent during the first nine months of 1972. Employer demand is strongest for accountants and industrial engineers, it claimed.

In the survey, which covered 1400 companies across Canada, 1,240 job openings for engineers, scientists and executives were discovered, compared with 820 in 1971. The demand for accountants and industrial engineers has doubled the study stated, and most of the positions are in the $12,000 to $15,000 bracket.

The survey also showed that there were 45 per cent more job openings in Ontario than last year.

TORONTO — Premier William Davis has announced the appointment of two backbenchers as parliamentary assistants. Frank Miller is to become parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Health, while Donald Irvine is appointed to the Treasurey Department.

Davis also announced the transfer of Smith from Industry and Tourism to the position of parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Education.

KINGSTON — Lars Thompson, New Democratic Party candidate for Kingston and the Islands has released a report showing that ten percent of the Kingston and district labour force is actively looking for work. The figure, he stated, was obtained from Canada Manpower ststistics.

During the past year hundreds of area residents have been laid off from Dupont and Millhave Fibres, Thompson said.

He pointed out that the ten percent figure represents about 4,000 people. He also pointed out that Jean Marchand's department of regional economic expansion which allocates funds to private industry, does not classify Kingston as an economically depressed area.

The Canadian average for unemployed was 7.1 per cent of the labour force in August.

KINGSTON — Progressive Conservative Leader Robert Standifeld will be in Kingston on Friday, October 27 during the afternoon and evening. He will be speaking at Queen Elizabeth Collegiate on Kirkpatrick Street at 7:30 p.m.

MONTREAL — The New Democratic Party in Quebec announced that it will institute a new strategy placing emphasis on the French language working-class in Montreal Island ridings. They will be running 63 candidates in the province, which has 74 seats. The NDP has not, as yet, fielded a candidate from Quebec.

The Quebec branch of the party was also given greater credibility by the loudly announced defection to their ranks of former Liberal cabinet minister Eric Kierans, a resident of Trudeau's Montreal-Mount Royal riding.

OTTAWA — Opposition Leader Robert Stanfield has announced that his Conservative Party will not be introducing any more issues in their federal campaign, but will continue to emphasize the problems of unemployment, inflation, housing and urban transportation.

He stated that, according to a report put out by Dunn and Bradstreet in Toronto, business failures in August were the highest for that month since the 1930's, having risen to 233 from 145 in August 1971.

Stanfield claimed that his party would make more unconditional grants to needy provinces to help combat regional disparities. He felt that the emphasis should be removed from federal-provincial shared cost programs as they discriminate against the poorer provinces which would have trouble raising their part of the tab.

Stanfield also suggested that there should be regional decision making bodies, reorganization of the Industrial Development Bank, and a revamped national transportation policy to equalize rail costs of sending prairie grain to port.

HANMER, ONT. — Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau while speaking on a hot-line program, agreed with a caller that the federal government should have a share of the jurisdiction in the field of higher education. However, he stated, he didn't think that the provinces were willing to relinquish their responsibility in the field.

RIVIERE DU LOUP, Quebec — Real Caouette, leader of the Social Creditiste Party, criticized young people for not taking things seriously. "They preach socialism but they don't know that if they were in Cuba or another socialist country, they wouldn't have the freedom to meet as they did", he claimed. Caouette added that todays youth is "too stupid to appreciate their freedom".

"Now what — we can't afford the cost of THAT either . . ."

JOHN HAZLETT

John Hazlett, Liberal Party candidate for Kingston and the Islands is warning the electorate against overreacting. "We have a strong economy and need only remedial measures", he claims. The Liberal goal, he stressed is to provide full employment for a more skilled, better educated workforce.

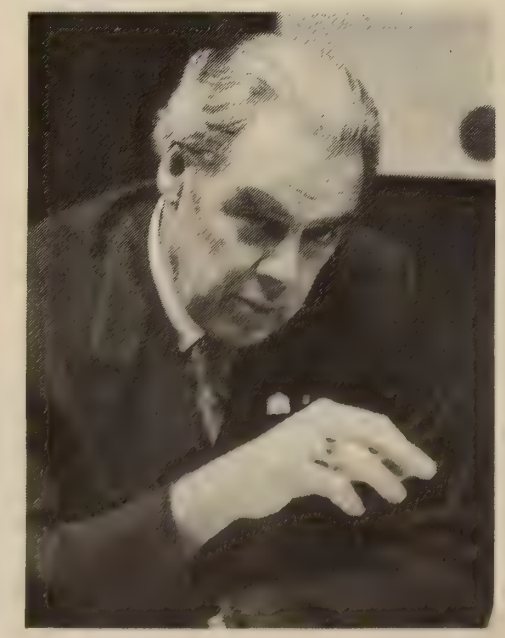
Hazlett holds a firm belief in the responsibility of the individual to the community. Canadian citizens have a responsibility to maintain heir employment, their environment, their concern for one another and for their country, he pointed out. "If these conditions are fulfilled, then they have a right to shelter, to not be hungry and to not be ill".

Hazlett is firmly opposed to price, wage and profit controls. They are a danger without a full inflationary trend, he commented. "Price, wage and profit controls will set off a viscious chain reaction with food shortages, black marketeering, eventual rationing, rigid bureaucratic controls and stagnation of the economy", according to one of his recent speeches.

Hazlett warns that the economy must not peak itself, stating that economic growth in Canada during 1971 was among the highest in the world, a trend which he pointed out has continued in 1972.

"The member of parliament representing this riding is not just responsible for Kingston, but also for Kingston Township and parts of Pittsburg Township", he pointed out. This, he claims, calls for the MP to coordinate activities between the city and township councils. He pointed out the example of Norman Rogers Airport which is owned by the city of Kingston but situated in the township. Better accord may be reached on such projects, he suggested, if the MP were to aid in coordinating them.

The extension of the parks program is of major interest to Hazlett. He wants a system of parks along the Trent-Rideau Canal System for Kingston area naturalists. Preservation of trails and historical landmarks rank high on his list to extend Canada's tourist potential.



Hazlett suggested that an old, little used canal through Wolfe Island be dredged and that the present bridge across it be raised, then facilities installed along it for people with boats to picnic.

"A guaranteed annual income is neither wise nor possible", the Liberal candidate claimed. The nagative income tax scheme would cost the taxpayers of Canada an additional $2 billion to $2.5 billion, over the present system, he said. However, Hazlett pointed out, we have a guaranteed annual income for senior citizens, which is presently registering $1800 for a single person and $3,600 for a couple.

He feels that the economy has too many problems for the guaranteed annual income scheme to be workable. An injection of funds such as that resulting from an across-the-board negative income tax program would lead to large scale inflation, he stressed, adding that such programs are best administered on a regional basis depending on the welfare of the individual community. "Ontario might consider it", he stated, "but Canada couldn't."

Hazlett is also in favour of a preventive mediation program to investigate and reduce production time lost in industrial disputes.

New Democratic Party Leader David Lewis' claims of corporate rip-off misrepresent the facts and institute a false set of figures, Hazlett stated. The government has given grants of rapid depreciation allowance on equipment and tax deferrals to industry to stimulate the economy. He admitted that there are places where it hasn't worked but that there are many more where it has. With regard to NDP claims that aid to primary industry does not create jobs because of its great capital intensity, Hazlett pointed out that the jobs of three million Canadians are in some way related to the oil and gas industry.

FLORA M

Flora MacDonald, Progressive Conservative contender for Kingston and the Islands is placing the major emphasis of her campaign on Canada's future potential and the planning of policies today to meet the demands not just of the present but also of the future.

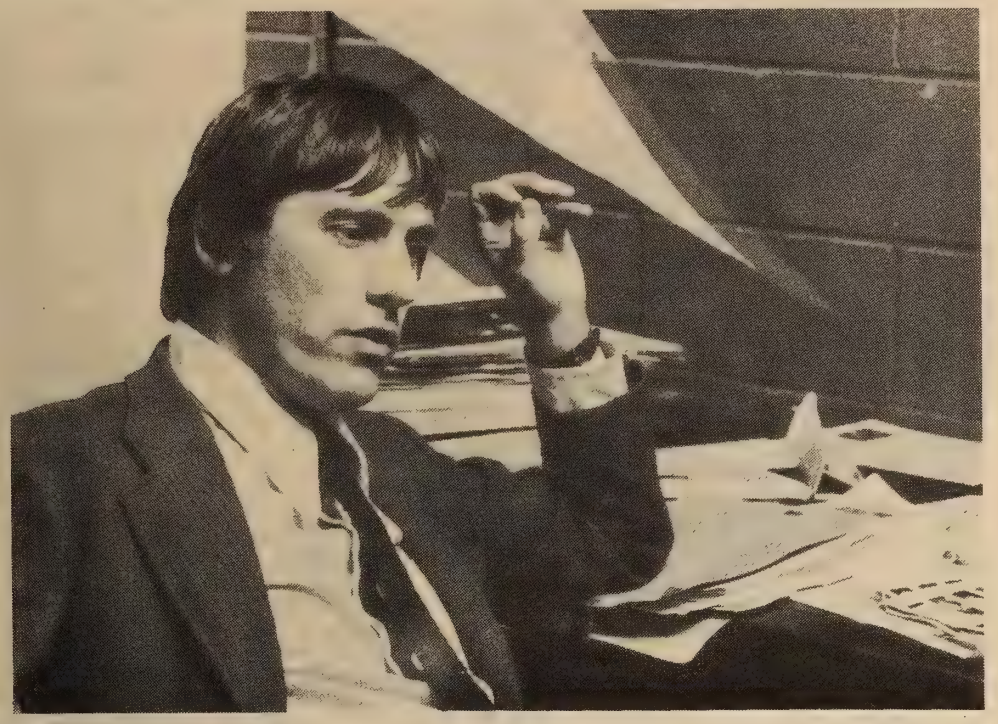
MacDonald is a firm believer in price, wage and profit controls on a temporary basis to break inflationary trends and inflationary psychology. "We are in an emergency situation, especially for those on limited and fixed incomes", she claimed. The cost of living has risen ten per cent in the last year, she pointed out, but salaries have not risen to meet this. MacDonald pointed out that food prices could rise as much as thirty per cent this year and concluded that the government has to respond out of humanitarian reasons. It is a problem for everyone with incomes right up to $9,000, she said.

MacDonald suggests that wage, price and profit controls similar to those instituted by the United States last year would be ideal. "We need controls across the board on food prices she claimed." The American example showed a reduction in food price inflation from five per cent to two per cent and it is only recently that the rate of inflation has climbed to three per cent.

MacDonald also called for an in-depth study to determine the reason for the gap between the price that the farmer receives for his produce and that which is charged in the supermarked.

The Conservative candidate also expressed a concern for the Canadian people as they make the transition from a work-oriented society to one with a leisure orientation. With the increasing trend toward a shortened work week, people must learn how to deal effectively with their off-work time. She also advised more creative use of the educational system.

According to MacDonald, the primary role of the member of parliament is to provide a mode of communications between the individuals in constituency and the government decision mak bodies in Ottawa. "The MP must have an intim and clear idea of the problems concerning the dividuals in the riding, and through this preven breakdown in the linkage between the governm and the individual." Given this, she claims, day-



LARS THOMPSON

Lars Thompson, representing the New Democratic Party in Kingston and the Islands, is a "serious candidate". "Although I have few funds, was last to be nominated and started the campaign later, I am still a very serious candidate from the standpoint of pressing the issues." This Thompson claims is the most crucial kind of seriousness, more so than just being elected.

Thompson has devoted a major part of his campaign to questioning the present government's goals, especially that of continued emphasis of the Canadian Gross National Product. "We must sort out our values", he claimed, "and re-examine those of the government to see if they meet the demands of the Canadian people.".

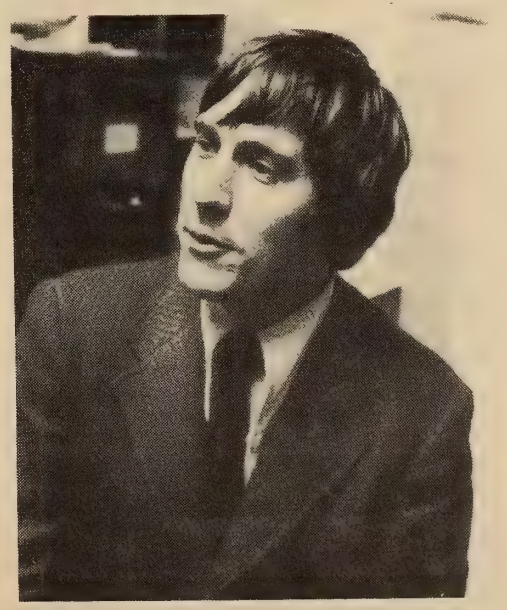
The NDP candidate pointed out that the Liberal anti-inflationary policies have not stopped inflation, increased job opportunities, nor given relief to fixed income groups. Thompson feels that wage, price and profit controls provide a more workable answer.

"A review board should be set up to sort out major inflationary factors and set up ways of dealing with them," Thompson claims. He would also empower it with the actual responsibility for calling for wage, price and profit freezes where needed.

As an example of inordinate profit situations, Thompson cited the Harrowsmith-Kraft case. Harrowsmith is presently selling cheese at eighty-two cents a pound, compared with Kraft, who is charging $1.12. The latter company is presently buying up shares of the former and Thompson claims that the consumer will soon be left with no choice but to buy Kraft cheese at the higher price.

Close control of the economy is very necessary, according to Thompson, "and such controls can only be implemented by state management". It is the past lack of control for the Canadian economy, he claims, that has caused the high inflation which we are now experiencing.

"The Liberals are campaigning in a different election than I'm in". He pointed out that important issues are being brought up this election, but that the Liberal Party is ignoring them while they continue to run a 1968 charisma campaign.



One issue that unites us all, the NDP candidate pointed out is the present system of grants and tax concessions to large industries, a system which the New Democratic Party has named "corporate rip-off". Like his party, Thompson feels that these incentive plans for industry have not fulfilled the purpose set out for them- that of creating jobs. "Grants are being given in large amounts to capital intensive resource based industry", he stated, adding that this has resulted in money becoming less available to lavour intensive secondary industry where more jobs may become more easily available.

"Local plants such as Du Pont and Canadian Industries Ltd. cannot use grants for creating jobs, yet have received extensive federal aid", he stated. Attention must be drawn to this policy he said and the whole program brought under deeper study.

On the subject of penitentiaries, Thompson feels that there must be special policing to prevent the massive breakouts that have been occurring. He agrees in principal with past government penal reform programs, but cautioned that, "Reform costs money and the success of their past pentitentiary programs has been lost in the implementation due to the lack of funds being made available." Because money wasn't available, Thompson claimed that the new freedom that the permissive policy afforded could not be effectively supervised. It has only resulted in confusion and an antagonized populace, he said.

Thompson stated that he has been informing himself in his present campaign and that passing this information on to the electorate is one of his major objectives.

"We must realize that politics cannot do everything for us", he pointed out, "The crucial things in life are personal. The government cannot legislate pain out of existence, nor guarantee laughter and joy in our hearts".

concept of an MP is one who holds townhall ngs where grievances and problems can be sed on a continuing basis. "Open-line radio have become a major part of our life", onald suggested, pointing out that the reason is that people who have never expressed ns before are taking advantage of them to s the red tape and degrading treatment ed when approaching the government.

ember of the Committee For An Independent a, MacDonald is expressing great concern he American presence in Canada. "The ls have proved themselves inhibited, in- g weak policies to deal withforeign owner- d control of Canadian industry", she claims. onald stated that the policies presently in nfluence only about ten per cent of all foreign sts in this country. "We need more emphatic tion controlling their actions, ensuring ally that dividends and profits are re-invested country", she stressed. Most important she is not to restrict foreign investment but to it.

t $8 billion has left this country in the form of nds and profits during the last four years, onald stated. She called also for the establish- f secondary industry in Canada to produce w resources so that they are being processed in Canada instead of being shipped elsewhere for processing then back here to be sold.

She stated that the recent permission given to German developers to take raw materials out of Baffin Island was a case in point for her argument. The German developers sent the ore taken out of Baffin Island back to the Rurr Area in Germany for processing then shipped it back to Canada to be placed on sale. Special ships needed for the venture were built in German shipyards.

MacDonald also pointed out that research is being carried on by parent firms in the United States and then is being applied to Canada through the subsidiaries. Research done in the United States she claims cannot relfect Canadian goals and values. It is hurting Canada's own research potential, she stated and more and more people capable of carrying it out are finding themselves unemployed.

The American influence is also beginning to adversely affect the Canadian environment, she stated. Americans are building energy plants in Canada causing extensive pollution of our environment, then import it back from us, she said.

Canadians also want home ownership, she claims, but under the present system not even those in the $9,000 bracket can afford their own homes. She suggests that the eleven per cent sales tax on construction materials be dropped and land assembly banks formed.

MacDonald agrees with the programs that have been instituted in the field of penal reform but claims that the expansion of the program coupled with a reduction of staff, has resulted in a confusion in administration. This she said, is resulting in a demoralized public.

AMS is floundering

Last Wednesday, the AMS Outer Council listened for three quarters of an hour to members put down the Heffalump although no one bothered to speak in its defence. The outcome of the vote was never in question. However, when External Affairs Commissioner Lyn Whitham asked for comments concerning the fee strike to take to the meeting of the Ontario Federation of Students this past weekend, council had nothing to say.

Bogged down with bureaucratic detail, the AMS has shown itself unable to cope with the issues at hand. Rather it expends large quantities of energy in the mechanics of organization with sometimes questionable ability. Meetings are held regularly and publicly to discuss business but it is usually evident from the countless waving hands during question period that our esteemed representatives have failed to do their homework.

Rebuke is not sufficient to extricate the AMS from the stagnant waters into which it is sinking. Again it is time that the word "restructuring" reared its head.

The responsibility for all services must be hastily removed from under the thumb of inner council to a separate body. Operation of the pub, typing and housing services are slated to be run by the soon to be instated Queen's Student Agencies. But all student events, concerts and constables should be shifted to the jurisdiction of this body as well. A group of students specifically interested in organizing these activities could very effectively carry them out while receiving funds and reporting regularly to the AMS.

Released from the mechanical operation and direct responsibility for services, the AMS would have time to make input into the university and deal with the problems at all levels of student concern. Issues which have previously been glossed over or not even brought forward could receive ample attention from a refurbished AMS and recommendations concerning student complaints could be passed on to senate by student senators acting as ex officio members of the AMS.

This university is filled with administrators. It is time our student government started talking about policy. It is time we started talking about restructuring.

They don't care

On Sunday, the Ontario Federation of Students called a demonstration at Queen's Park to protest last March's fee increase, and the reduction in student aid from the provincial government. Queen's, U of T, and Western, (the schools with the highest percentage turnouts in the recent fee referendum,) voted against the demonstration.

This demonstration, if it is to be held, should have taken place last spring, when the increase was announced. It wasn't. Ontario students had another chance to demonstrate their feelings on the fee increase earlier this month. For the most part, they didn't.

The public and the provincial legislature are not going to be aroused to the plight and the anger of the students at this late date after the students missed two previous opportunities to show their feelings, especially if the turnout at this demonstration is similar to the voter turnout, (and all indications from Waterloo are that it will be.)

The students of Ontario have had their chance to speak on fees, - they chose not to. Perhaps because they don't really care.

You're on right track

The AMS concert committee at least partially redeemed itself Sunday night. The concert was reasonably well run - the only serious hitch being that the audience had to wait in the rain for a half hour while the musicians finished practising (a problem apparently beyond the control of the committee). However, the committee still has not solved the problem of how to get people to come to their concerts. Attendance Sunday night was less than a thousand. Maybe next time. . .

Empty words

Dear Editor,

Earlier this year, in a speech praising the Liberal federal government, Mitchell Sharp said, "We have sought to preserve the quality of our environment for present and future generations of Canadians." For the people of Cape Breton, however, these are empty words.

This northernmost portion of Nova Scotia has been one of the traditionally exploited regions of Canada. Unemployment is very high here, the existing jobs are tedious and exhausting, and living costs are exhorbitant. A quart of milk, for example, costs 37c home-delivered and 40 to 46c in the store, thanks to processing industry-inspired price fixing by the Liberally-appointed N.S. Dairy Commission.

What is worse, the federal and provincial Liberal governments have joined forces to exploit the labour of Cape Bretoners for profit while exhausting the region's non-renewable resources and poisoning our air, water, soil and food.

Some years ago the provincial government took over the Sydney Steel Corporation (Sysco). The federal government, through the Cape Breton "Development" Corporation (Devco), took over the coal mines and coke ovens here. The coal mines bore deeper and deeper under the ocean floor, while the coke ovens and steel mill make Sydney's air the most polluted in Canada.

Instead of installing smoke-control devices, the Liberal politicians in Halifax and Ottawa have chosen to create additional bureaucratic smokescreens: departments of the environment. With election time approaching, the governments have also sponsored a series of environment hearings in preparation for a do-nothing resources conference.

The air over Sydney, Cape Breton, is cleaner for the moment, but only because the steelworkers are on strike. Their provincial employer, Sysco, refuses to give in to their wage demands, and air pollution hasn't even been discussed yet.

Nova Scotia isn't the only province whose ecology is suffering under a partnership of Liberal governments. Quebec, Trudeau's home province, is continuing with its plans to flood vast areas of Indian land around James Bay in order to sell hydro electric power to the United States. Meanwhile, the federal government has issued a series of postage stamps honouring the Plains Indians.

These are just some examples of what has become a standard Liberal ploy: Appear generous while backstabbing.

Yours sincerely,
Walter W. Plaut
Journalist (with the Cape Breton Post)

limped wrist

Dear Editor,

How true is it that "the blood of the English language is invisible to those who spill it," to quote Sandra Bernstein's letter appearing 17 Oct.

Apparently (or disapparently, wields my bloody incisive pen) that is not all that is, transparent, for she tells us that her watch was drooping over her --- believe it or not --- "Limped wrist." Mr. Ripley, where are you?

I really must try to meet this most wondrous woman. Imagine the thrill of gazing into her pellucid wrist!

Sanguinarily,
Brian Judge.

On moonlighting

To the Editor

Most people recognize that even when there is no dispute about facts, careful and honest persons may come to different conclusions about what these facts mean. Dr. Hazlett, the Liberal candidate for Kingston, reported assessment of the effects of an Incomes Policy falls in this category; as facts about the effects of income policies are rather contradictory, depending upon the initial assumption used to assess which policies.

But his reported statement in the Whig Standard, October 18th, that his political opponents are using his profession as an election issue is surely a gross misrepresentation of the facts. (It illustrates the danger of presenting an 'interpretation of an assumed fact' as a fact.) Dr. Hazlett, in making this charge on the basis of a Queen's Journal article on the prospect of Dr. Hazlett joinging 'Moonlighting politicians,' missed the entire point of the artical. If one accepts the assumption that a politician's job is a full time job, and is paid as much, it is justifiable to charge conflict of interests if a candidate indicates he is to continue in his chosen profession if elected.

There would have been valid grounds for his charge if the article had developed a theme on the monopoly nature, and high social cost of the medical profession if it had suggested that the only reason a medical specialist shifted his profession is if he has a much greater capacity for competence in his alternative choice of a profession. Given Dr. Hazlett's stated election claim that the key issue in the election is the quality of leadership in this country, such an argument would be a valid reason for his charge. I challenge Dr. Hazlett to find anywhere in the statements of his political opponents any such argument!

Indeed it would be fair to also ask why he chose to claim that the conservatives were making such a charge thus rather disappointing to see such antics of the part of the liberal candidate, and I think that it is irresponsible of him to attempt to direct public attention to provide some answers to direct public attention to provide some answers to the pressing social and economic issues raised by the problem of inflation, unemployment and foreigh ownership.

It would be preferable, for example if he could explain and justify the liberal government's method of determining the number of new jobs created; some assessment of their relevance and accuracy could then be attempted. Such activities would surely be more worthwhile than making ridiculous and unsupportable charges against his political opponents.

In closing, if I may make one personal observation of Trudeau's Liberal Government's use of statistics in this election by quoting the great poet Emily Dickinson.

'He preached upon Breadth till it argued him narrow,
The broad are too broad to define.
The truth never flaunted a sign.'

Thanks to all

Dear Editor,

I would like to commend all the Commerce students who made last Saturday's Hoedown in the Arena a tremendous success. Special thanks are deserving to Lach McLachlan, the Social Convenor, and his friends.

I hope students will look forward to the next Commerce social event when we team up with the Meds people for a really good time in Grant Hall, Saturday, November 25th.

Yours very truly,

Orange Juice

Dear Editor,

Peter Jensen quotes George Orwell with some approval. I only hope he does not share Orwell's dislike of socialists "who drink orange juice".

It may be true that tinkering with "managerial rights and hours of work" is not an integral part of socialism but I do see a difference between a party that resolves to readjust society in favour of the working class; and parties who are committed to creating an atmosphere conducive to the making of profit. Social democratic parties like the NDP and the Labour Party of Britain do at least have good intentions.

Frank Okoh

Mental eunuchs

Dear Editor:

This is just a short note re Peter Jensen's Looking About, particularly The Revolving Door (17-10-72).

If Mr. Jensen has an opinion to express re last weeks ill-managed fee referendum, let him do so in at least a semi-literate manner. We are subjected to enough rattle-bagged and indigestible analogies, pseudo-literary prose and just plain crap. I personally, as one of his so-called "mental eunuchs", would delight in a respite from such tortuous trivialities...

An artistically placed blank space on the page would have served your readers better, for we all know that modern literature, particularly poetry, depends more on physical format and artistic spacings, than upon content or "relevance".

Let Mr. Jensen also realize that the decision to vote or not to vote is just as much of a democratice privilege as the decision of how to vote. Or would he institute a regime similar to that of certain eastern European countries where one has neither the choice of whether or how to vote?

By all means let us have considered opinions expressed in an intelligent manner. Enough moronic cant, otherwise, to quote Mr. Jensen, "you will find the face of a mental eunuch, and if you have yet a rag of honesty, you will agree you have a discerning eye as keen as the eye of a potatoe".

Richard A. Marchand

The real issue

Dear Editor:

The Liberal candidate, Dr. Hazlett, in his reply of October 18, 1972, has unfortunately misunderstood the point we are trying to make. Certainly we sympathize with his concern for his present patients, but the real issue here is the interests of the constituents of Kingston and the Islands. What we are saying is that in our modern complex society where government has such a tremendous influence on the lives of each of us, we can not afford to have anything less than full-time representation. It does not matter whether you are a doctor, lawyer, secretary or factory worker. If you can not in good conscience leave the work you are presently doing in order to represent your constituents on a fulltime basis, they wou should not run in this election.

We think there is an ethical question here too. Do you agree?

University centre

Dear Editor;

All the recent discussion on the new University centre has envisaged the building of a new centre across University Ave. from the present union. There have also been suggestions from other quarters that a new centre, at least of this magnitude is not really needed.

It appears though, that little thought has been given to the possibility of building a medium scale extension to the rear of the present union, filling up the space presently occupied by university-owned buildings at 163 and 165 University.

The most urgently needed services could be built in the addition, and then when the addition is complete, the existing building could be extensively renovated to provide the other facilities deemed necessary.

Since the concept of a number of additional sub-centres around campus has been endorsed, a less expansive main centre would seem appropriate, especially in the age of tight budgets.

John

Crap in memoriam

To Whom it may concern:

Despite the fact that I am convinced that my agonized cry for justice will go unnotices, ignored, it will help me sleep better tonight if I feel that at least one person has read of my plight. I do not expect sympathy. To hope for such would be ludicrous and a direct manifestation of the masochistic tendency; leaning even towards the flagellant snydrome.

But a reaction, though it may be one of disgust and loathing is infinityle more desirable than the void which wuould surely engulf me were I to repress by bellows of indignation. If I can cause you to blink an eyelash or blow a nose, then how could I ask for more?

I am not a greedy man. I take my meagre share of life and pass it on to whose who nave need of it. Might I be so bold as to compare myself to a diving board--providing the necessary impetus for those who strive to plunge into the turbulent waters of today's society? Or would it not be more appropriate to portray myself as a toaster-accepting pale and shivering wretches and popping up warm and learned citizens ready to climb into their particular niche where they will realize a life of contentment.

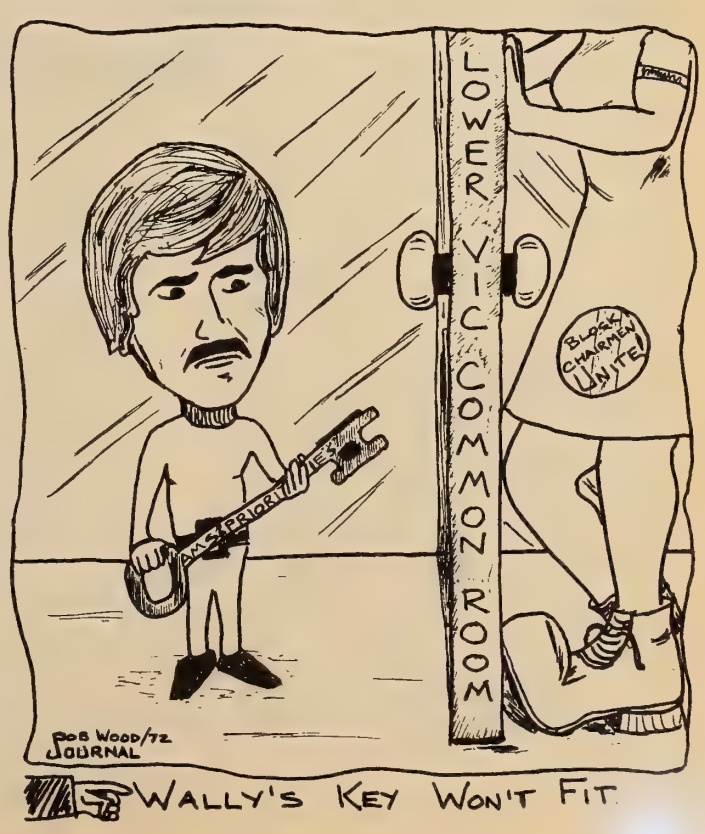
But alas, and herein lies the crux of the letter, I feel somewhat slighted. Never have I received recognition for my goodness and unselfish deeds. . Never have I been lauded from the heavens.

I do not seek great fame nor fortune. Perhaps a public washroom could be erected in my memory. Maybe all bank tellers who weigh in excess of three hundred pounds could have a half-holiday on August the second to commemorate my birth.

I abhor violence and that is why I chose to use your paper as a medium through which I express my disillusionment, for is not the printing press mightier than the tank?

If printed, this letter my generate enough heat to set the symbolic torch ablaze. If cast aside, my efforts and aspirations will have been in vain--the flame and indeed my very reason for living quelled inexorably.

With you lies my destiny.



Yours truly sincerely,
S. Creet.

Vic Hall ousts AMS

The Editor, Queen's Journal

I can't understand the women in Vic Hall. What the fuck is the matter with you? Christ you people must think you are something else. I mean, when someone says she doesn't "feel the AMS concerns women in reside ce and has no function or benefit to them" you have to start wondering. I ask all of you in your bastion of delusions whether you have any aspirations to join the human race or do you always want to have your parents and the bureaucracy decide for you? I don't expect much response from the segregants in Women's Res., just that some catty individuals will take up the banner and write an anonymous answer to the journal saying what an asshole I am without ever using the word. What the hell, do you people really think you deserve all the prissied attention you get? Can you tell me why there should be a women's residence on campus? Can anyone tell me why there should be a men's residence for that matter, cause I don't know baby?

A Polar City with Summer Weather

Only climatic conditions have delayed development of the polar regions and mining of the mineral wealth beneath them. Tomorrow, new cities may arise in these remote climes, encased in gigantic domes made of an incredible material developed by Hoechst — new Trevira high tenacity polyester fabric. Inside these artificial greenhouses, covering many square miles and held aloft by streams of air, temperature and humidity would be controlled to create a perfect environment for both working and living.

Cross-Fertilization of Ideas

New Trevira high tenacity polyester fabric and the various uses projected for it are examples of the cross-fertilization of ideas that inevitably results from the several scientific disciplines Hoechst is active in. Our chemical research and discoveries reinforce our developments in the newer fields of plastics and fibres. Research, development and product experience in many areas combine to solve specific problems.

Helping Build Canada

An affiliate of the worldwide Hoechst organization, Canadian Hoechst Limited concerns itself with supplying both the present and future needs of Canadians. The range of products and services covers the spectrum through industrial chemicals, dyestuffs, plastics, printing plates, human and veterinary medicines, pharmaceuticals, and textile fibres. Hoechst products and services, Hoechst techniques and know-how in these fields, combined with a large international fund of experience, have given the company a reputation for expertise which takes constant striving to live up to. "A Night of Realities"

by Allison Dandie and Joshua Redfield

To experience a poem by privately reading it is markedly different from the experience one has when confronted with the poem and its creator simultaneously. There is a multi-sensual heightening caused by the visual appearance of the poet, the intonation and the movement of his voice, the energy he exudes, and the eminent feeling of a shared discovery. Last Wednesday evening, Canadian poets John Newlove and Doug Fetherling provided us with this opportunity at a poetry reading at Agnes Etherington Art Centre sponsored by Quarry Press.

John Newlove is a Canadian poet from Saskatchewan who has written three books of verse in the last four or five years; The Black Widow, The Cave and Lies. The poetry he recited was thematically concerned chiefly with his search for perhaps a final, complete understanding of himself and along with this a sardonic highly emotive probe of life's traps, blindnesses and illusions. His language was informal and colloquial, the everyday words being fused powerfully to embody the varying textures of life running throughout his poetry. Newlove's imagery wasn't dramatically revolutionary, but effectively built up for truncated effect. His poetry didn't have many positive decisive conslusions thus generally enabling a listener in Newlove's words, to "ride off any horizon and let the measure fall where it may."

Newlove's poetry is a realistic view of life through eyes unclouded by romantic preconceptions: rotting teeth, blackheads, thirty six year old men who will never touch a woman again, young dreamers slowly being sucked into wine and welfare dead - ends, the word games and lies so essential to friends drinking beer. One very good poem concerned a man Newlove knew who lived with a woman whom the man had treated as a mere convenience. Newlove's phrases throughout the six stanzas spoke trenchantly of a complacent, egotistical blindness to another person, and the refrain was to the effect that the man merely wanted someone to "suffer indignities" and that's all. Newlove told of the man reading the poem and saying:"it's a great poem but who's it about?" Newlove's poetry, although it is rather pessimistic and cynical, does not necessarily condemn or satirize us, rather it becomes a shared reality between the poet and his audience - a realization of our own imperfections.

Doug Fetherling was the other poet present. He is a U.S. born Torontonian in his mid-twenties, living as a professional writer. The poems Fetherling brought with him were not spoken fluently at all to the audience because of Fetherling's partial speech stammer. He was unable to recite a number of what he called "good poems" and prematurely ended the night because of his inability to read as he knew he could.His obvious frustration and disappointment at this regretful happening was shared by most of those in attendance. He perceptively remarked that here was one time the children of the television age could not change channels for a different flavor. Those few poems he could communicate were obscured by the patched delivery; but one was a beautiful satire about a war veteran that contained disparate allusions to modern war and media for a very funny ridiculing of militaristic minds.

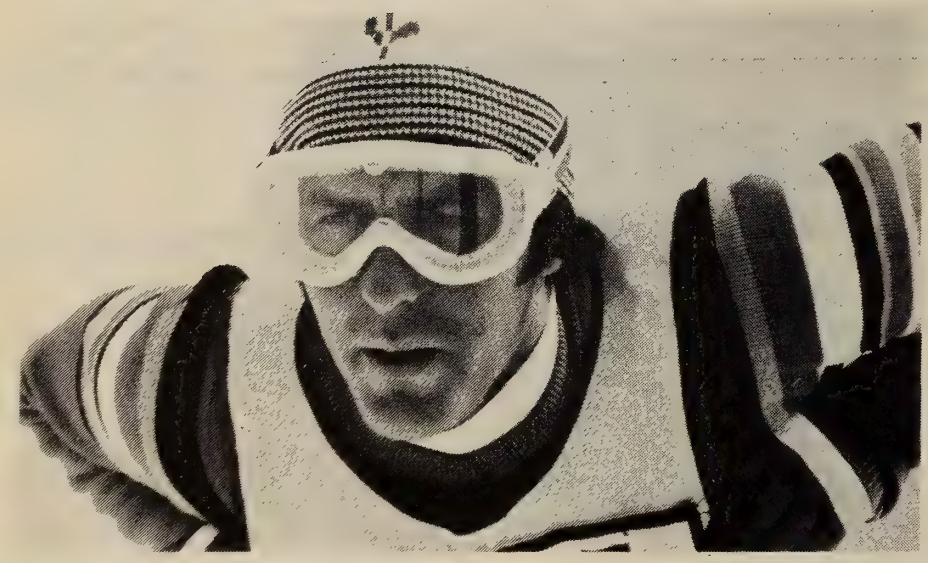
" A Child Growing Up" - the landscape of innocence

by Sandy Naiman

One of the most intriguing facets of childhood is that it slips by us before we can really appreciate it and so, whenever the opportunity for a retrospective look at this universal experince crops us, we come out en masse to reminisce, to laugh, to sigh and even to shed the odd tear.

Last Wednesday evening at McArthur College Theatre, David Kemp, Professor of Drama at Queen's and McArthur, took us back to our youth with eloquence, aplomb and highly focused command. Mr. Kemp's anthology of poetry and prose, "A Child Growing Up" began with the prenatal whisperings of hope intermingled with tremors of fear about the future of human existence and then, through the eyes of parents and their prodigy, Ogden Nash, Ben Jonson, Lee Cummings and Charles Dickens to name just a few, explored this ever changing and revolving spectrum of experience.



On a stage, subtely appointed with a leafless tree, a weather worn picket fence, an easy chair and a shelf of books, Mr. Kemp becomes a young and devilish little boy, a Selfish Giant, the master of a boys school and the protective father of infant famale children. His versatility with dialect, his smooth and relaxed carriage, his astute understanding and perception of the material, held his audience every moment. He never lost us and yet he was all alone with us. We sat at his feet as he unravelled his tales, we held onto his hand as he paced the landscape of innocence as only children can.

The subject of children has been somewhat overly exposed lately, with the whimsy of Charlie Brown and the pseudo-satire of Bill Cosby's kids, yet the material selected for "A Child Growing Up" had such a freshness to it that even though some pieces were relatively familiar, they were presented with such uncluttered simplicity and charm that familiarity posed no barrier.

It seems quite amazing that this type of unbegimmicked presentation is unfailing the type to triumph in the end. David Kemp has not only provided the Kingston community with another evening of touching theatrical entertainment, but managed to by pass the soppy sentimentality to which his subject has become prone. His behind the scenes technician and designer Larry O'Farrell and the theatre arts tudents of McArthur lit the stage with both precision and polish.

One cannot say too much about an anthology such as this one. The words of Dyland Thomas, Laurie Lee, eleven year old Stuart Widdows, say what has to be said, for more effectively and emphatically than anyone else. Professor Kemp's dedication both to the children of the world and their eternal realm of delight, however must be recognized and lauded. For those of us who have lost some of youth's wide eyed echantment, Professor Kemp gave us yet another glimpse. His dedication to the Joanne Hoobin Memorial Fund, which will endeavour to enlighten children in the art of drama and give them the opportunity to study it and experiment with it will undoubtedly continue to broaden the childhood experience and do so with innovative originality.

Queen's hosts Hockey Canada

For the second time in two years, Queen's University will play host to a Hockey Canada Tournament. This year, the Big Brothers Association of Canada is sharing in the sponsership of the event along with Hockey Canada.

The Queen's tournament will feature teams from York, University of Toronto, Trent University, of Peterborough, and McGill, along with the Queen's Golden Gaels. The tournament will be held Saturday and Sunday, November 4th and 5th at Queen's Harty Arena. Action begins on Saturday evening at 6:30 with Queen's meeting Trent University. The second game will begin about 9 p.m. and will feature York Yeoman and the McGill Redmen. The championship game will be played Sunday afternoon, at 2 p.m.

This tournament is one of nine regional tournaments involving 40 teams from across Canada. The winners will meet in Hamilton in mid-December to decide a national winner. This will be a separate tournament from the one to decide the CIAU national champion; that tournament will be played in March.

Tickets for the games in Kingston are available from members of the Big Brothers Association or from the administration office of the Queen's Physical Education Centre, daily from 11 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. Students tickets are $1.00 each and adult tickets are $1.50. Because this tournament is not a Queen's-sponsered event, students are reminded that the tickets are not included in their athletic fees and so they will require tickets to see the games.

Fencers here Saturday

Both of Queen's fencing teams - men's and women's - begin their activities this coming Saturday as they host 2 separate tournaments. The annual Queen's women's invitational fencing tournament will be held in Ross Gym all day Saturday with action getting under way at 9 a.m. Teams from the University of Toronto, York, McMaster, Western, the University of Ottawa and Queen's will take part in the competition.

The women's team is almost completely new this year. Only team captain Judy Krupanszky has returned from last year's club. However, Queen's has picked up some promising new talent and will be depending on Rosemary Knight, Mary Rowan, Sue Seto, and Erika Edelman to put on a strong showing for Queen's.

At the same time as the women's tournament, Queen's will play host to a four-city meet in Bews Gym. Teams will represent Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa with a combined team from RMC and Queen's representing Kingston. Some of Canada's top fencers including John Andru a member of Canada's Olympic team will take part in the day-long competition.

Queen's will field a fairly strong men's team this year, according to coach Jon Tondeur. A total of six men are back from last year's team including Al Keltner and John Chou in foil, Phil Buxton and Rob Petric in sabre and Wilf Backus and Murray McKay in epee. Backus placed third in last year's OUAA individual competitions.

One new player to join the team this year is Alan Christian. Christian was a member of the Canadian Fencing Team to the world Junior Championships in 1971.

Track Gaels 3rd as wind, rain, injuries take toll

bowrns

Queen's track Gaels had to settle for a third-place finish on Saturday, as cold, rainy, windy weather, injuries, and the depth of Toronto and Wester proved to be too much for the Queen's thinclads. The OUAA competition, held this year at Windsor, saw Varsity place first, with a total of 160½ points, Western second (126 pts) and the Gaels third (88 pts). Perrenial power Waterloo was fourth with 70 points.

The Gaels got a great individual performance from sprint star Hugh Fraser. Fraser tied the existing OUAA record of 21.9 seconds in the 200-m dash, then managed another first in the 100-m, clocking 10.9 seconds despite a pulled muscle in his left leg. Fraser finished in a tie with Grant McClaren of Western and Bob Tadman of Varsity for the individual scoring lead. Each has 20 points.

Team Captain Dave Jarvis set a new OUAA record in the 400-m hurdles, clocking a time of 53.6 seconds, a full four-tenths under the old marks of 54 flat. His triumph was soured slightly when George Neelands of Waterloo edged him out in the 110-m high hurdles. Jarvis, who was heavily favoured to take the event, finished second in 15 seconds flat, 2-10ths behind Neelands. Don Price, the Gaels's co-captain, was third in the time of 15.7 seconds. Price, Queen's most versatile performer, also added a pair of fourths in the high jump and triple jump.

Still with track events, Queen's relay squads contributed two surprises; the first was a win in the 4 x 100 m, where the team of Fraser, Jarvis, Jim Van Meer and newcomer Tom Dixon broke the existing OUAA mark of 43 flat with a remarkable time of 42.7 seconds. The second surprise was a little less pleasant, as the Queen's 4 x 400 squad of Berriman, Aiken, Fraser and Jarvis was edged out at the tape by a U. of T. foursome. The winners were clocked in 3:20.0, while Queen's came in with 3:020.01. A very near thing indeed!

Veteran Brian Aiken had to settle for a fourth in the 800-m run, in 1:55.7, as the winning time was a fast 1:53.8 Aikden had problems with the slippery track early in the race and couldn't recover well enough to make the top three.

The Gaels' other track point came from a sixth-place finish by Mark Field in the 3000-m steeplechase, an event marred by several injuries on Saturday.

Moving over to the field events, the Gaels got a third in shot put and a fourth in the discus from big John Ongarate, while soph Axel Becke contributed a 5th in the long jump. Larence Mitchell, a rookie competing in his first intercollegiate meet, placed 6th in the Javelin with a toss of 160'9".

Toronto's Bruce Simpson shattered the OUAA Pole Vault mark with a leap of 17'2½" Simpson was voted the meet's outstanding performer, winning the Hec Phillips trophy for his efforts.

Track Gals 5th in Ottawa

Queen's track Gals rode a strong individual effort by Brenda Beech into a fifth place finish in the OWIAA outdoor track championships in Windsor Saturday. Miss Beech finished third in the high jump with a personal-best leap of 5' 1", added a fourth in the long jump, and ran a leg on the 4 x 100m relay squad, which also finished in fourth spot in the competition.

Western won the meet with a total of 84 points, with York second, Laurentian third, and Waterloo fourth. Girls from Western set three new records, in both the 4 x 400 and 4 x 100 relays, and in shot put, while York's Jane Haist set a new discus mark.

Queen's also got a good day from Irene Harris, who recorded a 4th in the 200-m and a 6th in the 100-m sprints, as well as contributing a strong relay leg. Diane Jameson, who also placed 5th in the 100-m hurdles, and Janey O'Rourke rounded out the relay squad. Lynne Andrews picked up a sixth in the 800-m run to round out Queen's scoring.

Intermediate field hockey undefeated; Seniors not so

by Sue Moffatt

Friday and Saturday, Queen's played host to the first half of the Intermediate Championship Tournament. What's better than hosting a tournament? Winning it, of course; which is exactly what the Gals did.

Chilling temperatures and biting winds put no crimp into the Intermediates' style. Friday night Queen's met McMaster in a game marked by consistently strong defensive play. Although Mac managed to reach our defensive end only twice, one of those times they scored.

In the second half, Les Ferrari drove in two goals to put Queen's on top 2-1 at the finish. Saturday morning, Queen's challenged infamous U of T and came out number one again. During first half play, a fluke T.O. shot bounced behind our galie only to be stopped on that deciding goal line by our swiftly recovering fullbacks.

At half time the score stood 0-0 until once again, Les Ferrari scored late in the second half. T.O. had no chances to make up their side of the scoreboard and we kept them down 1-0 until the final whistle. The third and final game against Laurentian was fast and dangerous as the northerners were inexperienced and inclined to be violently eager.

As in the past two games, the Queen's gals tactics really clicked with well co-ordinated plays and a minimum of fouling. Although the offence just couldn't put it into the net, the defense made sure Laurentian hadn't a chance at our goal posts. The score remained a draw, 0-0.

Queen's enters the final part of this double round robin tournament in two weeks time at U of T. Lead by their playing coach Sharon Fiori, they stand the only undefeated team of the tourny, and have a good shot at the Number One spot.

Queen's Seniors had quite a different success story in their invitational meet. Friday night's game against Mac was typified by indifferent play and an incredible amount of fouling.

It is a tribute to the terrific work of the defence that the score stood no higher than 2-0 in Mac's favour. Immediately following this fiasco, however, Queen's got down to some serious hockey and played a relatively good game against U of T.

Although skills seemed to be lacking throughout the tournament, sheer endurance enabled our gals to run U of T intovirtual exhaustion by the second half of this, their first, game. Three goals came from T.O.'s deadly right inner, who, incidentally (not to make excuses) is a national player. The second half, however, saw the teams evenly matched, with neither forward line scoring.

Saturday morning, bright and early, Queen's tried again versus Waterloo and gradual improvement continued in the forward line co-ordination. Nevertheless, we went down again, 3-0. The fourth game saw Queen's playing almost to their potential and downing Guelph 3-0.

The goals were the work of Laney Marshall, Karen Carson and Gail McLeod, who, like the rest of the team, played their best hockey of the weekend.

Despite the unusual lack of skill exhibited by the Senior team this weekend, the players are both well-trained and physically in shape for the coming Championship starting next weekend in Toronto.

Provided they learn the necessary lessons from this weekend's game they should be in a good position to show well (dare we say first?) in the final show-down.

Waterpolo still on top

Queen's played host to the universities of Toronto, Ottawa and York in Eastern OUAA waterpolo at Queen's on Saturday. The fast-swimming Queen's squad romped to easy wins downing York University 13-3 and Ottawa 17-4. In the other games, Toronto edged York 13-9, before overpowering Ottawa 18-9.

In the first game against York, Queen's was led by the excellent shooting of forward Cane Howard who netted five goals. Other leading scorers were George Craig and Archie Nesbitt with two goals each. The Gaels started off slowly, checking tightly, with the score being tied one all at the end of the first quarter. But, a three goal outburst by Howard in the second quarter put Queen's ahead to stay. Showing superior swimming speed, and conditioning, the Gaels racked up nine goals to York's two in the second half, most coming from fast, quick breaks.

The second game pitted Queen's against Ottawa, a team they had defeated early the previous week. Ten goals by Queen's in the first half was all the insurance coach Simon Beiter needed before experimenting with line changes in the second half. Chief goal scorers for Queen's were Chris Whately, Archie Nesbitt and Tom Kewen with three goals with the remainder of the team, including defenceman Tom Kaspay who netted his first goal of the season, accounting for the rest.

These victories give Queen's a four win no loss record in OUAA competition and reaffirm their first place position. Should the Gaels win in Toronto next weekend, they would have wrapped up first place in the Eastern OUAA, and the following weekend's round robin would be in-consequential.

Swimming, diving starts

The Queen's mens intercollegiate swimming and diving team has been hard at work for over a month now under the watchful eye of coach Larry Brawley. Larry has been pleasantly surprised by the results to this point. The club has several promising rookies this year, including John Pearson, John Ireland, Jim Gillis, and Roger Rowan.

They join team veterans John Ker, Jack Muir and team captain Steve Patterson to give Queen's a fine nucleus for this years activities.

The short distance sprints will be held this Thursday, October 26 at 7:30 in the Queen's pool. All students are invited to attend.

Queen's diving coach Dr. Nelson Freedman has four divers out at the moment and all of them competed last Thursday in the club competition. A fifth diver, Larry Small, is expected to join the team this week.

Offence stalls as Gaels out of Cup race

by Tom Wright

Late on a gloomy fall afternoon, Wayne Dunkley took the snap from centre and plunged six yards for a first down, as the gun sounded to end a dismal homecoming affair. Earlier, one of the largest gatherings at the West Campus stadium had watched in horror as the visitors grabbed a commanding lead in the opening minutes of the cold, damp afternoon. Attempting to avenge the ignominious defeat in the Blues' home territory, the Gaels seemed unable to combat the often gale-force winds, while Varsity counted the majority of their points while playing into the turbulence.

The game was far from a picture of accomplished football techniques. Both squads were plagued by ill-occasioned turnovers, as interceptions and fumbles proved a determining factor in the outcome. The Gaels received the opening kickoff and John Booth returned the ball to Queen's twenty-five yard line. Two plays later a short punt into the stiff breeze gave the Blues possession on the Gaels' fifty yard line. Seven plays later Cos Donet carried the ball, on the first of many occasions, to burst across the one yard line and put the Varsity Blues in front to stay. Mike Sokovrin converted the major for a score of 7-0 with less than five minutes elapsed in the contest.

Booth returned the next kickoff to the Queen's 28, but again the team failed to mount an effective attack. The Blues were marching toward the goal-line three plays later. Dunkley relied on the power running of Duret and Sibert Castillo to advance the ball to the Queen's 15 yard line, prior to tossing a scoring pass to Estevan Andnyjowiez. With the conversion attempt wide, the lead was boosted to 13-0.

A Joe Pal interception squelched the next Blues drive, and the Gaels rolled on the ground to the Toronto 11 yard line. A touchdown seemed imminent, but the drive stalled and Doug Cozac narrowed the margin with an 18 yard field goal.

The second quarter began with the Gaels in excellent field position, wind at their backs, following a Castillo fumble. This march died on the Toronto 12, and Cozac again salvaged three points with a field goal. The next few minutes spelled doom for the Homecoming crowd. Following an interception by Alex Morris, the Gaels were once more in scoring position, only to have an errant Taylor throw kicked off by T.O.'s Doug Ball. The pressing of the defense and offense returned the Gaels to striking distance, yet Peter McNabb managed to grab another Taylor pass.

Late in the quarter, a booming 62 yard kick by Dave Compell forced the Blues to their own 10 yard line, and the Gaels appeared to be moving in for the equalizer. Seconds later Dunkley's 84 yard completion to Libert Castillo placed Varsity in scoring position. Castillo lugged the pigskin over from the 4 and the Blues led 19-6. A flurry of Raold Serebrin passes returned the Gaels to scoring territory, only to have an illegal motion penalty offset a long gain. Doug Cozac's last-second field goal attempt richocheted off the uprights into the playing field. Again, Queen's had failed to score from good field position.

The third quarter was marked by interceptions and penalties as the Gaels fought the wind. A lengthy Toronto single, resulting in an injury to John Booth, caused the quarter to end 20-6. The fate of the Gaels was sealed when Doret crashed over from the Queen's one yard line early in the fourth period. Down 27-7, the Gaels struggled for the respectability of a touchdown. With only 2:42 remaining in the spectacle, Geoff Hamlin hustled one yard into the end zone for the final touchdown of this season. End of the game and season Toronto 27 Queen's 13.

When the final gun sounded few of the once famous faithful followers of Queen's were still on the premises. As one alumunus located under the press box disgustedly announced, "Even the band left early!" In past years Toronto could be intimidated by the screaming fanatics who were a devoted part of the Queen's contingent. However, it was cold on Saturday and it was the Gaels, not the fans who lost the game. A good team but lacking the little extra that makes the Yates Cup a reality. There were no long runs, no ferocious tadkles and no exciting punt returns. The Gaels used to consistently leap to an early lead. This team appeated to be grasping for a comeback. All good teams must either improve or deteriorate, gaining confidence through the experience of hard if not always victorious seasons.

We can wait until next year. Both the faithful and the Gaels will return in September.

Soccer Gaels down Trent 1 - 0

Queen's soccer Gaels stayed in contention for league honours Saturday, as they defeated Trent 1-0 in a tightly fought match in Peterborough. Don Baragar continued his goal-a-game pace, popping in the winner mid-way through the second half. The Queen's star displayed great hustle, breaking up a goal-mouth scramble with a kick that left the Trent goalie handcuffed.

The Gaels had several opportunities to run away with the contest, played under cold, wet, windy conditions that allowed the physical Trent side to use their size to advantage. Andy Pipe missed on a breakaway less thatn a minute into the opening half, and Davy Robertson managed to bank a shot off the crossbar and over the net later in the period. In the second half, Robertson again missed a golden opportunity when his high shot caught a rising gust of wind and sailed completely over the net.

Territorially, the Gaels had an edge thoughout the game, but were unable to exploit this advantage. Questionable calls by the game officials, which favoured Trent's agressive style of play, were part of the problem, but a lack of finesse by the Gaels was the real difficulty.

On defense, the Gaels got a steady game from Peter Dickie, who made several fine stops in goal, including one spectacular save on a low ground ball early in the second half, and the usual strong game from Gerry Birks. For the most part, the Queen's side kept play in Trent's half of the field.

This win sets the stage for a soccer spectacular next Saturday, when the Gaels will host York. If Queen's wins this match, they will be in first place in the OUSS-East, and will have a good chance at the title. A loss would drop the Gaels out of contintion, with a mind to maintaining a high competitive hone, the Gaels will meet a Belleville side tonight at West Campus. Game time is 7:00 p.m. under the lights. Come out and support what could be Queen's only big winner this fall!

World: One European nation proposed for 1985

PARIS — The nine members of an enlarged European Economic Community have agreed to form a single European nation by 1980. In a summit meeting between the six present members and Britain, Ireland and Denmark, who are scheduled to enter on January 1, it was decided that the entire of the individual contries' relations would be transferred into a European union by the end of the decade. The exact nature of the union will be spelled out by 1975.

The summit conference in Paris also agreed to establish a $1.4 billion European Co-operation Fund to provide short-term loans to promote currency exchange stability for the member nations. This step toward a European central bank is expected to be the forebear of an economic and monetary unity with culmination in 1980 with a single European currency.

SEOUL — President Chung Hee Park has suspended the constitution of South Korea, dissolved the National Assembly, and declared a state of martial law. The move, he claimed, was to tighten control in the country in the face of the continuing dialogue with the Communist north and changes in the balance of power in the area.

Park gained power in a military coup in 1961 and became president in 1963. He was elected to his third four year term last year.

South Korea's universities and colleges have been ordered closed and tanks and armoured vehicles are roaming the streets of Seoul

Presidential spokesman Sung Jin Kim stated that a new president and a new assembly would be elected at the end of this year if a new constitution designed by Park is approved in a national referendum.

LONDON — British Opposition Leader Harold Wilson was re-elected unopposed in a Labour Party leadership convention. Wilson has pledged to renegotiate Britain's entry into the European Common Market.

Thieu at the same time reiterated his position that the Communist proposal for a three-party coalition government for South Vietnam was not acceptible to him.

WASHINGTON — United States short-term interest rates are starting to move above their Canadian counterparts for the first time since last year. The historical trend has been for Canadian rates to exceed American.

Canadian monetary authorities may not take action to spur a rise in domestic rates in order to relieve the upward pressure on the Canadian dollar, However, the difference may only last for a couple of months before they would have to move into line with the American rates. The prospect of even greater rises in the rates after the American presidential election also provides an effective threat to the level of the Canadian rates.

WASHINGTON — Six American scientists are to share the 1972 Nobel Prizes for Physics and Chemistry. Three were named for their work on the enzyme named ribonucleose and three for work on superconductivity.

LONDON — The pound fell to its lowest level in twenty-two months under a wave of selling orders. Inside of two hours it fell 1.5 cents. The drop is attributed to Britain's high rate of inflation and the threat of a national power strike. The pound is presently selling for $2.394.

OSLO — An end has been reached to the three week old government crisis as Premier-designate Lars Korvald announced that he has succeeded in forming a three-party centrist minority cabinet. It is to include representatives of his own party, the anti-common market faction of the split Liberal party and the anti-common market faction of the Centre Party.

The previous government came out in favour of joining the European Economic Community but was seriously defeated in a referendum.

SAIGON — Reports have been spreading that Presidential Advisor Henry Kissinger has been pushing for a partial ceasefire in Vietnam as a "goodwill" measure to lead to further agreement.

South Vietnamese President Nguyen Van Thieu and his National Security Council have announced that such an interim agreement for peace was unacceptable to them. Thieu claims that anything short of a permanent solution would not be approved by his administration.

The reports suggest that present talks are centred around arrangements for a limited peace deal followed by further negotiations. Thieu stated that such a settlement, while acceptible in the north, would fail in the south where heavy fighting is progressing near Saigon.

DUBLIN — President Eamon de Valera of the Irish Republic celebrated his ninetieth birthday last week. Now weak and almost blind, the President has survived a revolutionary war of independence against Britain and a bloody civil war, while in office. De Valera was a major force in keeping Ireland strictly neutral in World War II and ushered in a new era when he brought Ireland into the Common Market, effective January 1.

He became Prime Minister in 1932, a post he maintained with only short breaks until 1959 when he was elected to a seven year term as President. His second seven year term ends in May, at which time he must retire.

KURE, JAPAN — Ishikawajima — Harima have just launched the world's largest ship the 477,000 deadweight ton tanker Globtik Tokyo. It is one of two equal size vessels ordered from the Japanese firm by the Kashmiri shipping magnate Rabi Tikkoo to carry crude oil from the mid-east to Japanese refineries.

Looking About

by Peter Jensen

Monday Next

I write a column of political chat. Each week, I look about in search of stories which illustrate a political idea. All writing is political in some sense or other, and one can say the same of most ideas, whatever their form or occurrence of expression.

When I read in a popular newspaper, such as the Sun, a letter from a reader who writes 'One day, instead of stopping at my workplace, I'd like to keep on going, and go on and on, to nowhere in particular', I think of the strident comfortable men who assert the virtues of work in their papers and political parties. I think also of those who profess concern, who offer this and will fix that, who acknowledge that the Kingdom of Heaven has shmehow got to be brought on to the surface of this earth.

Yet what do they offer? The former wishes to dish up efficient and progressive work, the latter, a structure of society to produce human behaviour wholly moral and absolutely rational.

So we have an election in which Liberals and Conservatives offer more industry, more technology, more money, and New Democrats who say they will order such a system more efficientyly, decreasing hardship all round.

We have the blather and bombast of Mr. Trudeau's declaration of being privy to God's ear. It makes one think of Aesop's fable of the frog and the cow. A man much puffed up, one can hope he will illustrate yet again the discomfortunre which comes to the vain, especially the intellectually vain.

In sum, we have not an election. There are no choices which promise in any way to assuage the discontent of the writer to the Sun.

Covert Penetration

The Manchester Guardian Weekly reports: "the military monthly magazine of the Algerian armed forces, El-Djeich, claims the CIA recruits flies, on which are attached microscopic transmitters, to act as spies. These winged agents are able to penetrate innocently to the innermost circles of the enemy's governmental and military establishments - or at least to the kitchens and garbage. Further, after swatting, these gallant fly heroes continue to transmit from beyond the grave. We may soon see on the broad greens of the White House, President Nixon awarding the widows transistorised purple hearts."

Architect says

Must resist "expansion for its own sake"

by Susan de Stein

Raymond Moriyama, well-known architect from Toronto, gave the second presentation in this years' Dunning Trust Lecture series, on Tuesday night. His lecture was entitled "Growth: Temporal and Spiritual."

Moriyama obtained his degree in architecture from the University of Toronto and a masters in planning from McGill University. Since he began his practice in 1958, Mr. Moriyama has been the recipient of numerous awards, including one recently for his design of the Ontario Science Centre. He has been involved in several planning studies in Toronto concerning redevelopment and urban renewal. In 1969, he was appointed chairman of the government task force on Mid-Canada Development. In his introduction of Mr. Moriyama, Mr. Eric W. Thrift, campus planner and chairman of the School of Urban and Regional Planning, aptly described Moriyama as a "man of many parts and places" and as "a concerned, involved citizen."

As a supplement to his lecture Mr. Moriyama showed a film entitled, "The Great American Goose Egg Company, Ltd." The film, originally intended as a presentation to the Mid-Canada Development Conference, was a satire on modern industrialization and development and did indeed drive home the point.

Mr. Moriyama in his lecture described himself "as a man, a Canadian and lastly an architect." He sees the Canadian architect as "being caught in a real dilemma." On one hand, he may strive to be a man of action and greatly admired by the community. He enjoys considerable monetary and social status. Gradually this man comes to see himself as a hero.

He pointed out that there are some architects who realize their social responsibilities. In time the architect must face the basic problems of his basic attitudes. Moriyama said, "it is high time the architect made a statement in the context of the new ethics."

In his study of the development of Mid-Canada, an area encompassing a million square miles, Moriyama explained the aim of the study as that of exposing the motives behind the development of the area. The dominant interest in development came from foreign investors and southern Canadians. The resulting impact of development on nature and the environment was of minor importance in contrast to the prospect of new markets.

Moriyama proclaimed, "we are stumbling into the future and tinkering with the system." What we need is "a fundamental shift in the value structure", he added.

Modern industrial western society "represses the spiritual dimension, the realm of values." Society "chooses without value, acts without thinking, thinks without feeling," he said.

"I do not agree with the principle of scientific objectivity," Moriyama said. He felt that there is a new way of subjectively looking at the world. "To be active, is to be morally committed," he added.

Moriyama felt that "we are about to take a giant step in our cultural evolution in filling the vacuum of meaningless motivations. "Here he spoke of the oriental influence on many of these new ideas. The eastern religions are having a profound effect and "contributing greatly to man's spiritual renewal" he commented.

As master of the environment, man has lost perception. For Moriyama, progress and growth must mean "the enrichment of perception." Man's perception of himself, his community and society must change, he declared.

Moriyama outlined a direction for future growth. He called for the reconservation of opposites by rejecting the scientific world view. This "complementary view" would prevent the widening of the gap between science and the rest of culture.

We must "resist expansion for its own sake," he said. In the case of the architect, he must reject a project that is detrimental to man and nature.

In closing Moriyama said, "we have first to reform ourselves before our institutions."

Grads uptight about pub noise

Questionaire's have been circulated among all students on the second and third floors of the graduate residence in the Student's Union to determine whether or not noise from the pub is excessive.

Frits Pannekoek, graduate representative to the residence board told the Journal that he would make sure he had a consensus before submitting a formal complaint to the residence board.

The questionaire reads as follows.

Attention: Residents of the Third and Second Floors.

As you are probably aware within three weeks, as soon as present contracts expire, there will be no more live band entertainment in the Pub. However there appears to be some indication that this will not eliminate the noise problem altogether. Some residents, especially on the second and third floors, indicate that the noise level (i.e. loud voices etc.) is still a serious problem.

The Residences Board meets on Nov. 11. As the Graduate Residence representative I am willing to press for total elimination of Pub noise (even if this means moving or seriously limiting the size of the Pub). However I should like some indication of the seriousness of the problem. To assist in the preparation of a formal recommendation to the Board, if indeed there is to be one at all, would all second and third floor students indicate the degree of the disturbance below and return the portion to the Business Office. Make any additional comments you wish.

Noise Annoyance from Pub (Non Live Band)

Should the board be petitioned for elimination of the noise?

Yes ———

No. ———

Doug Saunders, Business Manager for the Union said that he had discussed ways to control noise emission with Physical Plant. The idea of installing therma pane glass has been rejected because of its high cost but insulated doors and heavy lined drapes are being considered as possible ways of keeping the noise down.

Jollife retires

Dr. Alfred Walton Jollife, a member of the prospecting party that made the famous Yellowknife gold discovery in 1935, and a member of Queen's University's Department of Geological Sciences since 1950 retired last month.

Dr. Jollife graduated from Queen's (B.Sc.) in 1929 with a medal in chemistry before taking postgraduate work in minerology, graduating with his M.A. in 1931. He attended Princeton University and received a Ph.D. in 1935.

From 1928 to 1945 Dr. Jollife worked for the Geological Survey of Canada on a series of summer prospecting surveys in the North West Territories. In 1935 his prospecting party made the Yellowknife discovery which later led to an important gold rush. One of the largest islands in the Yellowknife townsite, still bears his name.

During the Second World War, Dr. Jollife was one of the geologists assigned by the government for search for uranium. From 1945 to 1950 he taught at McGill University. His consulting work has taken him to most parts of Canada and to Ireland and Portugal.

Over the years Dr. Jollife has maintained a close contact with his students. He was made Honorary President of the Alma Mater Society and of the Engineering Society.

Busit worked

The office of the campus planner has just completed a week long survey on the October Busit experiment and determined it to be a great success.

Kurt Gessel, University Campus Planner, stated that the survey, begun October 20 and completed yesterday showed that the project was well used. There were two check points, one at the corner of University and Union and one on West Campus. The bus drivers also kept a running count.

"There's no question about it", Gessel stated "the experiment was well used". Actual figures have not as yet been tabulated but they will be available early next week. Gessel stated that he felt that the experiment proved that Bus-it is a service that needs to be provided.

He stated that the AMS and the Kingston Public Utilities Commission is considering providing the service on a flat rate basis, where students would pay a certain basic amount in September which would entitle them to use city buses at no extra charge for that year.

Flora praised

by Nelson Coyle

The federation of Ontario Naturalists announced last Friday that Flora MacDonald had been named one of three outstanding federal candidates emerging from an Ontario canvass of opinion on environmental issues. The other two candidates were David Bell (NDP for Sarnia-Lambton) and Ray Wilson (NDP for Niagara Falls). W. B. Draper, field representative for the F.O.N. stated that Mrs. MacDonald has original and thoughtful views on growth, population, environmental planning, protection of endangered species and preservation of natural areas. John Hazlett and Lars Thompson also replied to the questionnaire but were not rated amongst the good or outstanding candidates. The F.O.N. did not release individual replies.

On a province-wide basis, only one in four candidates and very few of the incumbents responded to the canvass. However there was 100 percent agreement among those who did reply with respect to the need for environmental impact studies prior to development of an area and for protection of endangered species.

In addition, 87 per cent of the candidates disagreed with the Federal Government's intention to proceed with the second Toronto airport proposed for Pickering Township.

UBC students lose power bid

VANCOUVER (CUP) — University of British Columbia students have been thwarted in their bid to elect students to the university's Board of Governors.

The university senate bypassed two student nominees in choosing its three reps on the Board recently, and instead named three B.C. citizens identified with Liberal Party circles. Science student senator Svend Tobinson finished sixth, while graduate student Stan Persky, the more radical of the two, finished last.

Lawyer Ben Trevino, UBC student council president in 1957-58 topped the list, Alumni Association president Beverly Field came second, and Chuck Connaughan, president of the BC Construction Labor Relations Association and 1958-59 student council president, filled out the third position.

Robinson and Persky were the first students ever nominated for board seats from the ranks of the senate. They had little chance of being elected because only 12 out of 98 senators are students.

"One of three outstanding environmental candidates."

Flora MacDonald, P. C. candidate for Kingston and the Islands, has been identified by the Federation of Ontario Naturalists as one of the three outstanding environmental candidates in Ontario.

The announcement was made today and was the result of a questionnaire sent to each provincial candidate by the federation.

"Our analysis of her questionnaire revealed that Miss MacDonald has original and thoughtful views on growth, population, environmental planning, protection of endangered species and preservation of natural areas," the release said.

"These views and her past record of involvement in enviromental issues indicate that she would make an excellent spokesman for the environmental movement in the House of Commons."

Senate reviews admissions, research and Intercession

by Jennifer Grass

A major review of admissions requirements and research policies, the role of interdisciplinary studies and the success of the Experimental Intercession were among the topics discussed at the October meeting of the Senate.

The grade 13 credit in Physics will no longer be required for admission to the Bachelor of Physical and Health Education Program. Students are urged to take Physics at the Grade 11 level and it is essential for them to have one credit in Mathematics and one in Chemistry at the grade 13 level.

A special admissions policy recommended by the Faculty of Arts and Science received approval from the senate. This experiment is designed to test the feasibility of more flexibile admissions policies. A panel of students, faculty members and admissions officers would be instructed to look for applicants who could not qualify under other admissions procedures but who evidenced qualities which in some way suggested unrealized academic potential.

Dean Watts, Dean of Arts and Science pointed out that this project was "not an attempt to look for bad students. Rather we hope to find other admissions criteria besides straight marks."

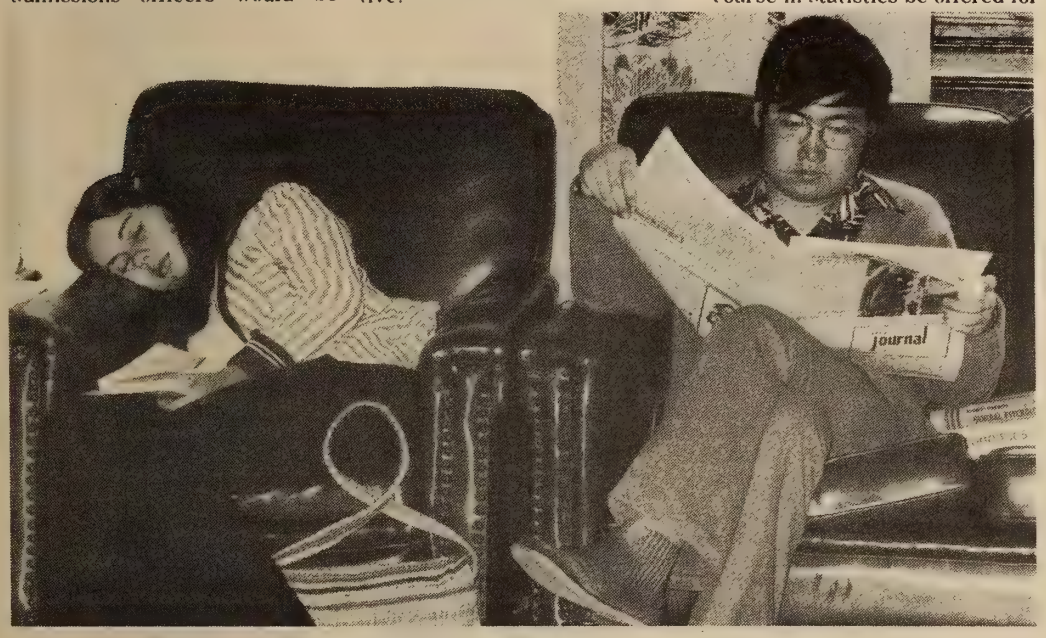
A report of the Senate Committee on Academic Development received approval from the Senate and will soon be sent to the Ministry of Colleges and Universities as a statement of university policy The report addresses itself to various university problems and plans.

It suggests that the research and teaching responsibilities of faculty members must be viewed as a whole and that individuals should place emphasis on areas in which they are most productive.

The document also states that research is an integral part of the professor's responsibilities to the university and to his discipline and that research at Queen's takes its importance from its relationship to the teaching and learning of students at all levels.

Principal John J. Deutsch pointed out the potential problems arising as a result of declining real resourses. The increase in revenue to the university was 2 per cent this past year whereas costs in terms of wages and salaries were rising at a rate between 7 and 8 per cent. Unnecessary expenditures will be curtailed, he said, but it is likely that teaching loads will have to increase and cuts may be made in research activity. There will also be increased pressure placed on the staff to student ratio.

The report recommends that a general first level introductory course in statistics be offered for students in faculties where such a course is not being offered. Special fields of concentration crossing disciplinary lines also suggested with more attention given to major human problems, such as conflict or population which would provide an overall focus for undergraduate students. The successful co-operation of department in the life sciences was noted.



The Senate also received a report from the Advisory Research Committee on Ethics Review of Research involving human subjects. This report was submitted to invite reaction and to show the university that work is being done in this area. It stresses the need for an administrative approach that delegates maximal autonomy to each discipline engaged in research involving human subjects. The need for an estimate of the physical, psychological and-or sociological risks involved in the proposed research is emphasized. An individual should generally be accepted as a research subject only after he, or his legally authorized guardian or next of kin has consented to his participation in the research. The report admits that a consent form is sometimes "unnecessary and inadvisable."

Courses will again be offered for six weeks during May and June in 1973 and 1974. The report of the Development Sub-Committee on the 1972 Experimental Intercession point out that opinions concerning the quality of the program were varied.

The courses in Economics and Biology were considered by the Instructors to be equivalent in a academic quality to those of the intramural session. In Psychology and Geography it was judged that a more accurate comparison was with the courses offered in the regular summer school. Instructors in Mathematics and English expressed the conviction that both the Intercession and the Summer School were too short to adequately cover a full course of the standard of the regular winter courses.

Other recommendations were included in the report of the Development Sub-Committee. It was suggested that a few courses be offered experimentally in the period May to August with twelve weeks of instruction of five or six hours of lectures each week. The report also recommends that reading lists for Intercession be distributed a month in advance and that the period between the last Intercession class be extended from one to at least three days.

An important suggestion to help students involves proposed representations to be made to the Ministry of University Affairs of Ontario for a change in the present rule that for students to receive aid they must register in three courses in the period May - August.

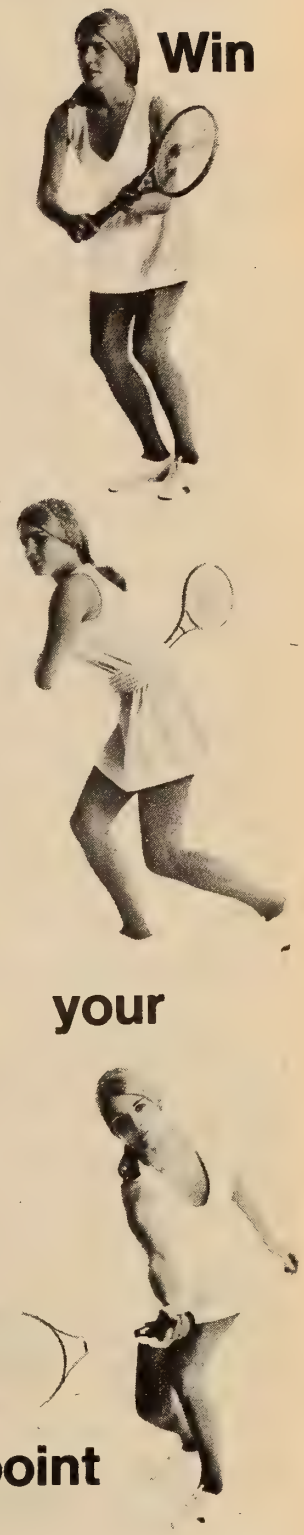
Slow growth policy a good one

Enrolment in Ontario's universities increased by only a modest 1 per cent this year. Many institutions have experienced financial embarrassments because enrolment did not measure up to their anticipations. Principal John J. Deutsch told a meeting of senate on Tuesday that the competition for students is on and that some universities are making plans to recruit students more aggressively. He warned universities not to resort to a "numbers game" in their attempts to prevent these future shortfalls.

Queen's is not experiencing these problems at the present moment because of a slow growth policy adopted several years ago.

Modest growth is expected for the rest of the decade with a leveling off at the 10,000 limit in 1980.

Deutsch called for an examination of the system of financing universities. He pointed out that the present method of granting funds to universities on the basis of the "eights" of students was appropriate during the sixties when almost all universities experienced rates of growth that exceeded plans. However, it is now evident that this rate of growth has almost ceased.



The problem of decreasing enrolment is compounded by a relatively new phenomenon of drop-outs, he said.

Deutsch expressed uncertainty as to whether or not this is a permanent thing.

He also pointed out that universities were not sure how the economic situation in Canada and unemployment would affect them.

Critic's Forum: Cabaret - the film

Divine Decadence Destroys film

by Sandy Naiman

The "divine decadence" to which Miss Liza Minnelli subscribes, as Sally Bowles, in Bill Fosse's film version of the Broadway musical, Cabaret, ironically is espoused only in the scenes which take place in the Kit Kat Klub, a divinely dinghy cabaret in Berlin in 1931. And Miss Minnelli herself never manages to live out her bespoken life style. Only Joel Grey, as the obscenely macabre Master of Ceremonies hits that pinnacle of glorious decay.

This paradox in the film, which is incredibly different to the Broadway production, is what destroys it. Miss Minnelli is irritatingly erratic as the simple minded, promiscuous Cabaret singer. One is plagued with niggling questions. Is she really as surfacy and as one dimensional as she seems to be acting? Is this just a mask she is forced to wear to protect herself, for at times a more genuine Sally Bowles slithers out? Or is she just poorly directed? Even her singing numbers (which, incidentally take place only in the cabaret, all the musical numbers, which in the stage production take place outside the Kit Kat Klub, have been cut), remain untouching.

One wonders how good an actress and performer Miss Minnelli really is, when musically she sounds like her mother, and commercially has been promoted as a super star so, that any discussion of talent is simply irrelevant to the discussion of quality in the film.

Mr. Fosse, who both directed and wrote the screen adaption, has obviously considered his public very carefully, for by confining all the musical numbers to the stage of the Kit Kat Klub and totally disintegrating the plot of the story which the original music helps to justify and augment, he has made a non-musical musical. A story about a girl who sings in a Cabaret. The story is sentimental, and the life on the stage of the Cabaret is both allegorically connected to the love story, but at the same time, much more powerful, for Joel Grey is brilliantly grotesque and really the only decadent element of the entire film, as he molests with delight, the girls in the chorus, as he courts an ape in the song If You Could See Her Through My Eyes, and as his head peaks out of every crevice and crack of the back stage. But where Mr. Grey's performance is highly polished and focused, Miss Minnelli is annoyingly overdone, and at the same time inconsistent. Her make-up is as grotesque as her demeanor yet not in a decadent way, nor in a way which befits the atmosphere of Berlin. The life she leads is perhaps pseudo-grotesque, but very pretty, filled with misshapen values in a pathetically decadent or a divinely deluded world. But you cannot construe her life as both decadent and divine. Only the crudely frightening faces of both the audience and the performers in the Cabaret ever reach into the world of divine decadence and yet because we are made so aware of the pretentiousness of that place the overall impact is never truly felt.

But the film has several technical facets which do give it impact. The editing is supberb, for by intermingling shots of street violence, with shots of stage-played violence one gets stinging insight into what was going on in the '30's in Berlin. The subtleties of the screen images do not compare to the sensitive manipulation of symbols in The Garden of the Finzi Contini, but then perhaps Fosse just wants to be decadent in his production as well as in his content, for decadent he is with his editor.

His use of a distorted mirror both at the beginning and end of the film is also very effective for it truly grotesques anything which it reflects.

And the way in which he strings the allegory of the love story between Sally Bowles and Brian, the young writer from England misplaced in Berlin, is clever and very clear. Unfortunately though, the allegory is stronger than the reality, so strong that it surpasses its role of comment and becomes the core of the film, with the other posing as a strange sort of relief. We find ourselves waiting anxiously for the next Cabaret scene because Joel Grey is so effective, so masterful, so overwhelmingly powerful. The Maximillian-Brian-Sally menage becomes not touching but terribly funny, the Fritz-Natasha relationship equally comic, except for the wedding scene which is merely fashionable in todays moneyed movies and can almost be anticipated.

It is more than merely aggravating to me when a director builds a musical around a star. Ray Stark did it to Barbra Streisand in Funny Girl, and the same thing happened in On A Clear Day You Can See Forever. Whenever a musical travels from stage to screen it somehow gets aborted in the trip. All the pleasant humable tunes are dropped, all the supporting actors lose their songs and only the big name stars get the big name tunes. Things are inevitably rewritten changed around and made, I suppose, more believable. The mistake, though, is that musicals are really not supposed to be believable. For who bursts into song on a street corner or in an elevator. Somehow directors are afraid to approach the perhaps sentimental, perhaps soapy, perhaps surrealistic side of life on screen in the same way that they will with a musical on the stage. Its probably all based on economics, but Mr. Fosse's attempt at having the best of two worlds just doesn't do his show much justice. As a stage play its impact lies in the pretension of the songs amidst the brutality. Musicals generally are geared towards this pretension and that is why they are so successful when well produced.

Unfortunately though, Cabaret simply misses its mark. If Fosse had either cut all the musical numbers out of the film and made it another Love Story, then it could have been written off as sentimental slop and nothing more. Or, on the other hand, if he had left all the original numbers in and not changed the story, as he did, and retained the genuine decadence which was apparently the core of the Broadway production, then at least we may have had something truly worth seeing. But as it is, Cabaret is not a musical, not a drama, but a ill fitting mixture of the two.

Minnelli outstanding in well directed film

by Ann Vogl

A forewarning: This is a film for Minnelliphiliacs. T here is no doubt that however emphatic the superlatives in the next few paragraphs, your money is wasted if you can't stomach Liza.

If, however, you harbour no such prejudice, I urge you to go and see the most outstanding single perfromance I have seen in my short but eventful life. Liza moves like everyone in Sandy Aiken's Modern Dance Class would like to. Her voice has the incredible power that you would expect the Garland genes to produce. But what is truly astounding is that apart from all this aforementioned talent, she can act in addition.

Liza makes of Sally Bowles, the cabaret chanteuse, a most endearing and vulnerable human being. She's thoroughly obnoxious when parading as the flamboyant woman of the world, but behind the cheap, attention-getting devices, there is a woman of incredible sensitivity. She leaves you with an impression that her departures from savoir faire do not result from distorted perception of what is expected of her, but rather from a defiance of those very expectations. Her frivolity is always weighted with an impressive instinct for self-preservation.

Contrary to the indications of this article thus far, Liza Minnelli is not the only reason to see this film. This is one of the few movies during which you'll say to yourself every once in a while "Gee, is this ever well directed". And you'll be right. The juxtaposition of Nazi terrorism with the sinister cabaret equivalents acquires a new impact under Foss' direction. The lights are always perfect in the cabaret scenes: The smoke hurts your eyes, and Liza's hands, intensified by rays of illumination, are hypnotizing. The scene at Max's country home in which the three succumb to a drunken dance demonstrates a brilliant treatment of a delicate sexual ambiguity.

All right. Joel Grey is excellent! But his part, once conceived, is not all that demanding. Nevertheless, as the singing, dancing embodiment of every imaginable perversion found in the mind or body, he does a marvelous job.

Even the credits are visually pleasing.

Oh yes, emotional impact. If it is of any relevance whatsoever, as a veteran of Gone With The Wind, Love Story, and Fiddler on the Roof, I was able to boast dry eyes until I saw this one.

Ah Ahk: The Performing Arts of Korea

The Ah Ahk Troupe, a company of 17 dancers and musicians from Korea, will perform on Friday, October, 27, 1972, at 8.30 p.m. in Grant Hall as part of the popular Grant Hall series of concerts sponsored by the Division of Concerts at Queen's University.

The Ah Ahk Troupe comes from the National Classical Music Institute (NCMI) in Seoul, a school formed in the tenth century by King Yi Taejo to organize the nearly one thousand musicians at his court and to train their replacements. The school is maintained today by the Korean government.

Although "Ah Ahk" is a name for the classical court music of Korea, the troupe performs a program representing the full history of Korean performing arts. The program is comprised of two different art forms, the art forms of dance and music. Dances from the court and the sword dance commemorating fallen warriors will be presented along with the harvest dance of the Korean peasant farmer.

The music of Korea will be presented in its many exciting, varied forms: court and chamber music (some of it originating in Sung Dynasty China and long dead on the mainland and on Taiwan), confucian music, military music, Buddhist music and folk music.

Authentic costumes and sets of Oriental screens accompany this evening's production.

The present tour of Canada by the Ah Ahk Troupe is presented by the American Society for Eastern Arts of San Francisco as part of its program to encourage the appreciation and study of the many cultures of Asia.

Tickets for this event (at $2.00 and $3.00 for students, $3.00 and $4.00 for non-students) are available from the Division of Concerts Box Office, Agnes Etherington Art Centre. Reservations will be accepted at. 547-6194. Tickets will also be available at the door.

User's committee discusses food services

Food services to be offered in the new university centre came under review this week at the meeting of the University Centre Users' Committee. A number of suggestions and questions were also tabled to be brought up in their meeting with the archetect of the new centre next Monday.

The committee examined the possibility that the pub be located elsewhere in the new centre in response to protests against noise from the adjoining graduate student residence. They pointed out that special note should be made of this to the architect and the appropriate corrective steps taken.

The needs of the Career Planning and Placement Office were discussed and it was agreed that they would receive both their core requirement of 1430 square feet and an additional 1200 square feet in interview rooms and information area which would be integrated with other areas, such as club rooms when they are not being used. It was also agreed that the information area could run along the corridors.

The committee found that the location and size of lounges in the new centre should be left up to the architect as these two factors are critical to their success. The architect, they felt would be more qualified in this matter.

They also decided that no permanent study space would be provided in the centre, but that provision would be made on a temporary basis for peak periods during December and April.

A report on past, present and future food services in the Union was presented to the committee for discussion and approval. The report showed that the percentage of the university population using the cafeteria and dining services in the Union declined from 44 per cent in 1965 to 30 per cent in 1971. The decline was attributed to overcrowding and less ease of access to quick meals.

The committee suggested that there should be satellite cafeterias or buffeterias to provide a fast turnover in addition to regular larger meal services. They also suggested that provision could be made for expansion of space in the future.

However, a definite decision could not be reached due to uncertainty as to the drawing power of the cafeteria proposed for the new Health Sciences complex. Life Sciences students may be making use of it in the future, it was suggested, so the Users' Committee decided to look deeper into the subject before reaching a definite decision.

Referendum on Open Hours

Women in residence will vote next Wednesday and Thursday on whether or not to extend open hours.

Residents will be asked two questions on the upcoming ballot which will be distributed in meal lines. Would you support extension of open hours from 12 noon to 12 midnight during the week? or are you in favour of 24 hour open hours?

Results will go to the meeting of the Ban Righ board on Saturday for final decision.

A Bold and Brilliant Man

LEADERSHIP. The quality of leadership for Canada in the next four years. That's the central issue.

Hugh MacLennan, the outstanding Canadian author, gives this assessment on Prime Minister Trudeau's first four years in office:

"His success or failure will depend to no small degree on his fellow countrymen. Will enough of us be able to understand as he does just what is involved in this challenge? Will we have the guts and tenacity to take risks which only five years ago were unthinkable because they seemed unnecessary? I have come to the conclusion that our Prime Minister is probably a genius. But Trudeau is now the target of many poeple, some hidden, some known, some naive, some professional. HE IS RESENTED BY MANY OF HIS OWN COUNTRYMEN AS BOLD AND BRILLIANT MEN HAVE ALWAYS BEEN. BUT I CANNOT BELIEVE THAT ANY OTHER LIVING MAN IS MORE LIKELY TO RELEASE IN CANADIANS THE WILL TO SURVIVE AS A NATION."

THE FUTURE OF OUR LAND.

". . . come, my friends,
'Tis not too late to seek a never world."

-- Alfred, Lord Tennyson

How have we, the youth of Canada benefited from Pierre Trudeau's four years in office?

The ceiling on student loans has been raised from $1000 to $1400. Special NHA loans at prefered rates have been provided to satisfy the needs of student housing. Here, at Queen's, Elrond is an example of a residence financed with the help of such loans.

The voting age has been lowered from 21 to 18.

National and international travel programmes have been established to enable us to see more of the world.

During the past four years, we have, watched our country gain an identity. Canada's unity and independence have been asserted in diplomacy, in commerce at home and abroad, in Arctic waters, and in broadcasting. We have begun to live the Canadian reality.

We, the youth of Canada, believe in the future of our great and beautiful land

Open letter to the campus

In November, Queen's students will elect a Rector of the University. Nominations for the rectorship will be received at the first meeting of the Alma Mater Society Outer Council in November, which this year falls on November 1. Nominations for the rectorship must be signed by 200 members of the AMS, and must be accompanied by a letter from the nominee indicating his willingness to run. These particulars are carefully outlined in the constitution of the Alma Mater Society, and in the Charter of the University, and must be adhered to. Therefore, there can be no extension to the nomination date.

R. Alan Broadbent

The position of Rector was established at Queen's in 1912, when it was included in the University's Charter. It provided students with a voice on the Board of Trustees, the body that theoretically owns Queen's. The Rector was to be elected by the students to serve a three year term.

While the position is unique in Canada, it is a tradition of Scottish universities, and was transported to Queen's along with other aspects of the University's Scottish presbyterian ancestry.

For the first 57 years of the rectorship, eminent Canadians held the position, including O.D. Skelton, former prime minister R. B. Bennett, and Leonard Brockington. While they reacted to their duty of representing students with varying degrees of effort, the position generally became honorary.

During the 1960's, students began to think that students were better able to represent their interests than were non-students. In 1969, the first student was elected to the rectorship.

I was that student, and I have served in the position for three years. I will not stand for re-election. I would like to outline the rectorship as I see it.

The position of Rector involves a couple of static functions, plus a wide range of possible areas for activity. First, there is the representative function. The Rector is an ex-officio member of the Board of Trustees, along with the Chancellor and Principal. As such, he attends all Board meetings, and represents to the Board of Trustees the views and feelings of the student body on various issues. As a voting member, the Rector takes an active part in the decision making. The Board meets six times each year. In addition, the Rector is a member of the Executive Committee of the Board, and is eligible to be elected to all Board committees.

Secondly, there is the ceremonial function of the Rectorship. As one of the top three officials of the University, the Rector is present at most official University occassions. He sits on the centre of the stage at Convocations, directly to the Chancellor's left. In addition, he is usually among the welcoming party for major visitors to Queen's.

After these two functions, the flexibility of the rectorship becomes apparent. The Rector can be an ombudsman to the campus. He can be effective in this capacity be the very nature of the position. He is not tied to any particular group in the University, the administration, the Alma Mater Society,the faculty, or the Staff, and thus can move freely between them. In addition, the prestige of the position at Queen's allows the Rector to act with authority and responsibility in the pursuit of answers to questions and solutions to problems.

There are other functions the Rector may perform. He may act as the loyal opposition to the Alma Mater Society, the administration, or the faculty, when that opposition is not coming from elsewhere. He can be a link between the University and alumni, or between Queen's and her benefactors. Certainly there are many other functions of which I am not aware.

During the past three years, I have found myself operating in all of these areas from time to time. I have found the Queen's community to be very helpful in the performance of rectorial duties. In fact, my term has been marked by co-operation from all areas of the campus, for which I am grateful.

Anyone who can get 200 members of the AMS to sign his nomination is eligible for the rectorship. To make the position more accessible to students, it has recently been agreed to reduce the Rector's term from three years to two. Thus, those standing for the rectorship this year will do so on the understanding that it will be a two year term.

People interested in running should contact the AMS office before the Outer Council meeting November 1.

Yours sincerely,
R. Alan Broadbent, Rector of Queen's University

Demonstration

Dear Editor,

At the meeting of the Ontario Federation of Students the past weekend, the majority of the member associations decided to hold a "peaceful" demonstration at Queen's Park on the opening day of the Provincial legislature. Queen's, Western, and U. of Toronto voted very strongly against this proposal for the following reasons.

The institutions advocating this action were those that did not have a mandate to support the O.F.S. demands (less than 50 per cent turnout for the referendum). It appeared, therefore, that the delegates were solely articulating their own ideas on the direction that (?) the O.F.S. should take. I fail to understand how these delegates, who could not generate enough interest for a referendum, are able to promise a monumental turnout necessary for a successful demonstration. As a result, I am seriously concerned about the competence of the organizers in implementing this controversial plan.

The demonstration was also opposed on principle. The credibility of the fee issue will be determined by public support of the OFS demands. If the non-student voters of Ontario are not in sympathy with the financial plight of post-secondary institutions, the Davis government will not consider it politically expedient to change its policy on education. I cannot be convinced that a demonstration will enhance our cause in the public eye, in fact, I maintain the manifestation of force and anger implicit in the action will alienate public sympathy.

A demonstration will be construed as an act of desperation, which is not the position of the Ontario Federation of Students.

Sincerely,

Lyn Whitman
External Affairs Commissioner

Missed the point

Dear Editor,

Although it is extremely gratifying to any writer to be read and to receive a response to ones writing, I feel obliged to issue a statement on the letter from Brian Judge, which appeared in Tuesday's Journal.

It grieves me to say that Mr. Judge has completely misunderstood the intent of my original letter, which concerned a highly questionable review that appeared some time ago in your newspaper. Perhaps this is my fault. It is very difficult to parody something ill-written, without appearing illiterate oneself. For, Mr. Judge, in my original letter I did employ parody, as well as direct cirticism, to make my point.

It is for that reason that the paragraph on Dali, and the use of such inane phrases as "limpid wrist" were included.

Now, I am well aware, Mr. Judge, that "limpid" means clear and "limp" means without energy. Obviously, the correct word to describe a surrealistic wrist would have been limp. But "limp wrist" would have spoiled the metre of the sentence, whereas "limpid" scans rather nicely. Since I was trying to show how overattention to the sound of ones own "voice" in writing, to the extent of sacrificing all meaning, results in an article worthy of ridicule, I used the word limpid. That is all.

I am sorry to have been too subtle for Mr. Judge. If he still wants to meet me, I'll be in the library, poring over a copy of Fowler's Modern English Usage.

Yours sincerely,

S. Bernstein

Here we go again

Dear Editor,

Here we go again! First it was an ill-conceived province-wide student referendum on the tuition fee increase. As well as belated, this type of response was a very risky move for a fledgling outfit like the Ontario Federation of Students. Despite some very spirited efforts by a few dedicated students groups across the province, the predictable happened, with the result that the spindly superstructure of OFS public credibility all but collapsed.

And now there is to be an OFS organized demonstration at Queen's Park. This action was proposed before OFS even attempted further negotiations with the government. There does not exist another course of action which would more certainly destroy any shred of credibility that OFS retains as a responsible body speaking for Ontario Students.

The students of Queen's University through their active participation in the OFS referendum have earned the right to make strong responsible input in decisions on OFS tactics and strategy. If this body continues to ignore the few delegates who can truly speak as representatives of their student bodies then it is doomed to the fate of its national predecessor. We must take all steps to ensure that the planned demonstration does not occur and that OFS gets down to the business of forging a strong provincial organization dedicated to negotiating with the government in a responsible fashion.

Rising Prices

Dear Editor,

We are alarmed to note that the price of beer at Grad. House is about to be raised by over 20 percent to 40c per bottle. In addition, not withstanding this indignity, the number of people allowed into Grad. House on Friday evening is to be restricted.

With regard to the first point, the originators of TGIF assure us that when Grad House was first opened, profits were substantial and regular. Figures over the last 13 weeks however indicate marginal profits and in three cases actual losses. This seems to indicate almost total lack of management. Compare for example two weekly reports issued by TGIF.

Expenses
Beverages	235.55	258.29
Overhead	64.14	66.89
Total	299.69	325.18
Revenue	292.05	395.85
Profit	-7.64	70.67

It appears that although the total expenses are comparable, the revenues (even when unsold beverages are credited) for some unexplained reason are not!!!

Secondly, if the maximum number of people at TGIF is to be limited to 120 we would like to know what the remaining one thousand graduates are going to do. Everyone supports the GSS by payment of fees and has the right to access.

Yours sincerely

AMS defended

Dear Editor,

I was surprised by your last editorial to discover that you are as incapable of describing what the AMS is doing as is the Editor of Golden Words. You claim it's a stagnant AMS. G. W. claims a stagnant AMS executive. I am under a quite different impression.

You are quite right, Madame Editor, in saying that most members of Outer Council are not doing their job. Most come to meetings unprepared. But to imply that Outer Council meetings is where everything does or doesn't get done is totally inaccurate. Maybe you should start covering more than just the meetings. Get the whole picture.

You mentioned restructuring of the AMS. You should know that is being tried. You should also realize that restructuring is not easy. It's the old problem of federal-provincial jurisdiction. Like who's going to give - the AMS or the faculty societies?

You also mentioned Queen's Student Agencies looking after the entrepreneurial arm of the AMS. Who finally gave you that piece of six-month-old news? You are about as out of date as the Rector's letter concerning our services' policy.

You should also explain how big the AMS has grown in the last few years when you start talking about its bureaucratic detail. I'll grant you that, in many ways, it's too big for it's present structure. But we're relatively bigger and better than any student government-corporation in Canada. We now spend over $1 million a year. But we're not professionals, nor claim to be. We're students and we're learning by doing. We have inefficiencies but we can still claim a less expensive form of education than what is run in a lecture hall.

Sure there are many people involved. But involvement is what it's all about. You seem to imply that too many people involved make for too much bureaucratic detail. Golden Words feels that too many people involved means they are all doing my job. Where's the sense in that? We certainly have the most active student body, to my knowledge, in Canada. Lots of people doing all sorts of things. Fortunately there are people around who don't suffer from the why-doesn't - Greg - do - it - all syndrome - though we need lots more help still. Results count, not "whodoneit". The Editor of Golden Words thought I should have run the referendum campaign. Sure thing. He also complained at having difficulty getting me to write an article That's his job.

Some people out at West Campus are beginning to blame all their sorrows on the AMS. All they have to do is get their reps off their asses and we'll give them a hand. Sitting out there complaining won't get them anywhere.

I realize you're looking for an ass to kick. But it's too easy to nucleate all your problems on the AMS. Find a real issue.

Yours very truly,
Greg LeBlanc

Palmer replies, too

Dear Editor,

As editorials by their very nature, look at an issue from only one point of view, there is a real danger that incorrect impressions will be created. With this thought in mind, I wish to comment on your editorial of Tuesday, October 24 regarding the A.M.S.

Basically I must agree that, judging from Outer Council Meetings, the A.M.S. is not doing their job. Perhaps even viewing Inner Council Meetings would give one the impression that very little is being done. However, such is not the case. Your specific example of the last Outer Council meeting demonstrates this. Three-quarters of an hour of unopposed justification for closing Heffalump was necessary because of the controversy it has sparked in the past. Unfortunately, as you commented, there was next to no discussion on the outcome of the fee referendum here at Queen's and the direction that Council members thought the O.F.S. should take. What you failed to realize, was that on Thursday evening a handful of people did get together to discuss the issue and provide Lyn Whitham with a "Queen's" position.

This approach to A.M.S. business and student concerns has been all too prevalent for the past couple of years. Two or three people have been determining policy and making the majority of the decision, not because they have thirsted for power, but because no one else would do it.

"Restructuring" you say, but is the structure the problem? I fear that your second editorial of October 24 perhaps analyzed the situation more correctly - "They Don't Care". No matter what new structure is established, it will still depend upon interested students to participate and inform themselves in order for the A.M.S. to function effectively.

In my idealism as the newly elected vice-president last Spring, I too thought that an examination of possible restructuring would be worthwhile. Realizing that it would be necessary to include people with experience under the old structure, a committee of five people was formed, four having been on previous A.M.S. Councils. However, as with all student activities, enthusiasm suffered a lingering death over the summer months and in September three of the four experienced committee members resigned. Efforts to recruit new members for this committee failed. If the students are not sufficiently concerned to even want to try to change a structure that, according to you, is so deficient, then how is a mere new structure going to increase their interest?

As much as people complain, the students here at Queen's are not that hard done by. The A.M.S. or more correctly the handful of workhorses, has continued to represent students and deal with student concerns at all levels. However, as long as complacency continues, we will have to rely on a few individuals to carry on. The A.M.S. Outer Council will likely still appear to flounder, but with any luck Queen's students will continue to prosper due to the overall efforts of A.M.S. people.

Yours very truly,

Wally Palmer
AMS VICE-PRESIDENT

More on WRC

Dear Editor,

Re: the use of residence facilities

It is the responsibility of the Women's Residence Council to ensure that those who pay to live in residence have full benefit of the facilities within the buildings. As a method of control, all room bookings are referred to the WRC for approval and decisions are made in Council as to whether the bookings are of enough interest to warrant depriving the women in residence of their facilities for any length of time. If the AMS had brought its request for a room to the WRC through the proper channels, there is no doubt that the Outer Council meeting of October 18th would have taken place in the lower Victoria common room for it is not, nor has it ever been, the policy of this council to exclude from residence an event of such universal interest and concern to students as an AMS meeting.

Unfortunately, the matter was not brought to our attention prior to our weekly meeting on October 16th and we were totally unaware of it until the AMS advertised the meeting in the Journal on October 17th. As the proper channels had obviously been disregarded and there was no chance to discuss the issue in Council, the matter was left to the discretion of the blockchairmen of Victoria Hall who decided that the proper procedure must not be ignored and that the WRC must not be disregarded when the use of a residence room is in question. This is the only basis on which that decision was made.

We encourage the AMS to make use of the residence facilities, but to do so through the proper channels.

Sincerely,
Kiloran German,
President,
Women's Residence Council.

Orange juice

In Reply-

Yes, I do agree with George Orwell's criticism of Socialists who drink orange juice. He was condemning the trendy, just as I find Socialists, who revel in the individuality of expression in making one's own crunchy granola, faddish and beside the point.

I agree with Mr. Okeh's differentiation between the social democratic parties and those who are committed to profit. My criticism of the NDP and Labour Party was not of their good intentions, rather of their befuddlement of the Socialist issue. I think that issue is most clearly defined in the quote given from Orwell's Wigan Pier.

I find Mr. Marchand's comments pointed in their intent, but sorely lacking in consideration. His statement, "the decision to vote or not to vote, is just as much a democratic privilege as the decision how to vote", I think, is true only insofar as the choice offered does not allow one to register dissent. Mr. Marchand speaks of democratic privilege. Also, he speaks of decision, the proper obligation of a democratic citizen. I submit the clarity of choice offered in the referendum renders any decision not to vote an evasion of this obligation.

Mr. Marchand's sentiments have a greater validity on occasions when one must choose between candidates who are equally poor, and whose parties are without promise. They are of even greater validity if one considers the system, which the choice of candidate or issue represents, inappropriate or harmful. Voting is affirmation- so the problem of a thinking person is to determine what it is he might affirm before any consideration of merit.

In the referendum, if one voted no, the only affirmation was of voting itself. When I spoke of those who didn't vote as having a discerning eye as keen as the eye of a potatoe', I was not thinking of the aimless and thoughtless, but of those whose decision was ill-considered. As Mr. Marchand implies, he is quite in favour of voting, I assume him among the latter.

Examining the candidates

ED NOTE: The Dormouse is a regular column of comment written by Alan Broadbent, but it has been in hibernation lately.)

On October 30, Canadians will once again sally forth to the polls to elect a new governmnet. Some will do so fervently, some defensively, and most only if the weather is fine. Sometime during the evening of the 30th, or the early morning of the 31st, Canadians will begin a long and tedious consideration of the election which will last until the spring, which will free us from the equally boring grip of winter.

In the riding of Kingston and the Islands, three candidates are contesting for the seat. Progressive Conservative Flora MacDonald, New Democrat Lars Thompson, and Liberal John Hazlett represent the three major political parties in Canada. They have been busy campaigning for the past few months, it seems like an ice age now, in an attempt to lure voters into their respective folds.

Most of the time their pleas have not risen above the usual level of political seduction in this country,but they have occassionally given an indication of who they are and what they believe in. It must be pointed out that their rhetoric often tends to become confusing, and to sift out any meaning in their campaigns, beyond that of a $25 advertisement in a newspaper, is a job for a computing gargantuan. However, for those who may think that their choice on October 30 is between McGovern and Nixon, or who simply do not have the patience to wade through acres of platitudes, following is a summation of the candidates and their platforms.

Flora MacDonald

Flora MacDonald was born on a rock and cod farm in the dense tundra jungle of Cape Breton. Upon birth, her first uterance was to demand a committee study of the status of babies, which she chaired. At the age of three, she became family secretary, and only a year later became the chief organizer of her siblings.

Flora attended school in Nova Scotia, graduating with a degree in hustling votes and organizing meetings. Her graduating thesis was a white paper on the re-organization of the Nova Scotia government, which was suppressed. She then left the maritimes to travel extensively across Canada, leaving a trail of thriving organizations behind her.

She showed up in Ottawa one day about 15 years ago, at the Conservative Party national headquarters. They hired her on the spot, and soon she owned the party. However, the conservatives were having troubles in the land. They just weren't attracting the attention they though they should be, and they thought a change might be advantageous.

Flora got together with advertising executive and party president Dalton Camp, who subsequently took a year at Queen's to write an account of those times, and they managed to vault current PC leader Bob Stanfield onto the part throne. Stanfield was known prior to this achievement as the clever master of a massive underwear empire, and as the premier of Nova Scotia. One of the interpretations now current in the PC party is that this action gave former leader John Diefenbaker the opportunity of becoming a true elder statesman. Others say he was dumped.

Five years ago, Flora came to Kingston and Queen's to organize the Political Studies Department at the University. As administrative assistant in the department, she brought reality to the world of political science. In addition, she has been active in the Kingston community, working with many citizen's groups.

One of the oddities of Flora's association with the PC party is that her personal views seem to be more in line with those of the NDP. She says that she has her own perception of the PC party, and thinks she can have a strong influence on its positions.

Her campaign is based on two major planks. She feels that government has become too distant from the average voter, and that Canadian citizens are not adequately listened to. She also feels that the present government has mismanaged national affairs, resulting in a troubled economy which places too much burden on the low and middle income groups. She vows that a PC government will rectify these inequities and concentrate on the quality of life in Canada.

John Hazlett

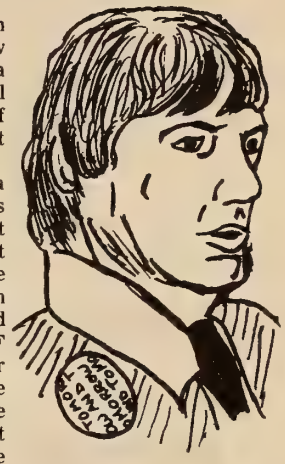
John Hazlett is a candidate of mammoth proportions. While only vague statistics are avilable, he seems to be about six and a half feet tall, and well over 220 pounds. John is a local doctor, and has lived in Kingston for considerably longer than the other two candidates. As are the other two, he is associated with Queen's, currently holding a position in the Faculty of Medicine.

John's background is vague, but indications are that he is a surgeon dealing in bones and joints. He has run in previous elections, the most recent being last year's provincial contest in which he lost narrowly to hockey ace Syl Apps. In that election, John ran strongly in many areas of the city, but did rather dismally on the Queen's campus which threw the vote to Apps, the former flashy Toronto Maple Leaf centre and captain.

However, John's strong showing in that election made him a figure of some preponderation in the community. In the time between the end of the provincial election, and the calling of this federal tally, he has kept well in the eye of the public. He was a large figure in the movement aimed at demanding that the province pay full taxes on the property it owns in Kingston. This movement started off quite well, but the results of its attempts remain vague.

John has been forced into a somewhat dicy position in that he is running for the Liberal party. In many areas of the country, the Liberal nomination is an advantage, but in Kingston it is of dubious benefit. For several reasons, the Liberals are not excessively popular currently. First, many of the groups comprising the population of the city feel they have not seen much advantage from the Liberal government. Secondly, our previous member, Mr. Edgar Benson, was saddled with massive responsibilities in Ottawa as Minister of Finance, and had less time that he would have liked for constituency affairs. Thus there is the feeling that Kingston has been neglected.

All of these things John has to counter, and in addition he has to defend the Trudeau administration, because that is the tactic the national Liberals have decided on. John has found this rather difficult, and it is vague how he has chosen to handle this.



John has developed an unfortunate habit of speaking his mind on matters before he has formulated the best rhetorical approach to the question at hand. As a result, he has come out with some real beauties which his opponents have immediately jumped on.

In debate one day, he claimed that natural resources are "like a carpet". Now whether they are or are not like a carpet, I don't really know the answer to that, is a point that his opponents leapt upon and tore to shreds. "A carpet", they raged, "a carpet that one's neighbours walk all over, tearing great chunks from, perhaps even removing from your living room. A carpet indeed, in the eyes of the Liberal government."

Again, John had the unfortunate opportunity to be asked to comment on the "silent issue" of the campaign, the Trudeau use of the War Measures Act two years ago, when the use of the criminal code of Canada would have sufficed. No, John claimed, this was not an issue. "Over 90 per cent of Canadians agreed with the use of the Act, so therefore it is not an issue." Unfortunate, for many pointed out that such attitudes are not worthy of a democratic candidate, for democracies claim to protect the rights of minorities. When John went on to point out that the Prime Minister's actions displayed the kind of leadership which Canadians were indeed yearning for, he was told that such quotes were more worthy of the German government in the late 1930's.

Essentially John's platform is that of the national Liberal party. The government has done a fine job, and there is much work left to be done. The best group to do this work in the future is the Liberal party, for they have had so much practice in the past. And, every thinking man knows that practice makes perfect.

Lars Thompson

LARS THOMPSON

Lars Thompson is an ideal candidate for the New Democratic Party. As a man, he is a superb symbol of what the NDP is, and of the current state of that party.

The NDP is not really a new party, although it has been revitalized in the past ten years. It is the direct product of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation (CCF) which was formed in 1933. In 1961, the CCF and the Canadian Labour Congress launched the NDP, which absorbed the CCF. The CLC did not directly affiliate with the new party.

NDP performance had been disappointing up until 1968, when they took control of the Manitoba legislature and formed the government. In 1972, they form the provincial governments in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and most recently in British Columbia, and seem to be gradually picking up strength federally.

The NDP has undergone severe scrutiny of its aims and directions during the past four years, moreso than any other party. Various factions within the party have asserted themselves, and made attempts to lead the rest of the party. Some interpret this tension as a sign of weakness and dissension, while many others view it as the natural and healthy debate of a true democratic party, operating in an open and reasoned way.

The most vocal faction in the party is the group which has become known as "The Waffle". The Waffle is comprised of people who are strident Canadian nationalists, who see many Canadian problems as a result of the fact that much of our economy is controlled from outside the country. They advocate the return of Canada to Canadians, with the government playing a major role in the movement.

Opposed in the NDP to this stridency is the main body of members, who thing that the Waffle goes too far, and see such radical demands as conflicting with electoral success. Less stridency, more appeal at the polls, seems to be the motto of the party.

This is not to say that the NDP is solely interested in votes. They have taken strong stands on issues, with leader David Lewis defining tax inequities as one of the major issues of the campaign. The NDP has become regarded as the party of the people, somewhat lacking in the sophistication of the other two parties, but with a deep sense of social equity.

Lars Thompson reflects many of these qualities of the NDP. He is a relative newcomer to politics. He joined the NDP in Toronto, and became an active member of the local organization when he moved to Kingston four years ago.

Lars is a professor of english literature in the Faculty of Education at Queen's. His approach to politics is reflective of the openness and debate of his party. He admits that his knowledge of politics and related topics is somewhat short of others', but he says that he is willing to learn from conflicting viewpoints.

He is obviously torn by the reality of political campaigning and his personal assumptions, and is not loathe to interpret political issues in very personal terms. His platform, which is for the most part that of the national party, also includes some of the renegade ideas of the Waffle. He counters the relative sophistication of the other candidates with a solid irreverence for traditional campaign style.

Two of Lars favorite campaign assertions, which he dramatizes at every opportunity, are that Flora MacDonald has no place in the PC party, that she is too far to the left of the party to be an effective member for Kingston, and that John Hazlett is little other than a sycophant of Pierre Trudeau, and as a member would be no different. He emphasizes this by various leapings and shoutings.

Lars has a very difficult task as a serious candidate in this riding. If he is to win, he must defy all previous election results. The NDP has never shown strongly in Kingston, some attributing this to the fact that they have never run very strong candidates. Lars must attract great chunks of the vote from both the major parties.

Bruce Cockburn - Sunwheel Dance - True North TNX7

It is about time people accorded to Mr. Cockburn a little of the recognition he has deserved for so long. He has been playing across Canada for a number of years, preferring to stay at home rather than head south in search of the big bucks. For that I respect him. Only recently, however, has Cockburn achieved "success" in Canada -- by that I mean his music has become increasingly popular (another ambiguous term, to say the least) and people are now beginning to pay attention to this very intelligent, sensitive artist. Sunwheel Dance, in exposing the creativity of his work, has strengthened Cockburn's popularity and has helped establish him as one of the leading folk-singers in Canada today.

Sunwheel Dance is the third album offered by Bruce Cockburn and it is as good, if not better, than the previous two. His songs deal with unpretentious, very real situations of the contemplation and celebration of life in a very intelligent manner. His creativity is poetic and very musical. Cockburn's experience with life and with Nature come across as vividly sincere. The man obviously feels his music; it is a product of the self, not simply a pile of inane dung that happens to rhyme like a great deal of the popular music today. Cockburn's music demands and commands respect.

The major portion of the album features rather quiet material, but one of the faster tunes, "It's going down slow", contains a fair example of the crafts of Mr. Cockburn:

God, damn the hands of glory that hold the bloody firebrand high;
close the book and end the story of how so many men have died.
Let the world retain in memory that mighty tongues tell mighty lies;
and if mankind have an enemy
Let it be his warlike pride,
Let it be his warlike pride.

Sunwheel Dance is an extremely pretty album. Cockburn is an extremely talented man. And all this is by way of requesting that you go and hear the songs of Mr. Bruce Cockburn tomorrow night, if you haven't already decided to do so. I think you'll enjoy his music.

Stevie Wonder: Signed, Sealed, Delivered

If you went to the Stevie Wonder Concert last Sunday Eve you took in a performance that sparkled with goodwill, professionalism, and class. If you missed it, I'm here to make you feel bad about it. Wonder put on a show that simply oozed with vitality. Here is a man who obviously is in love with his music; a man whose very impetus is to be found in his music. Music is Stevie Wonder's communication and he longs to communicate to and with his audience. In watching him perform you can sense that he is just bursting with an incredible creative energy - captivating to say the least.

He could have done it all himself: he could have come alone and still have provided an incredibly dynamic show, but he chose not to. He chose rather to surround himself with an entourage of musicians - vocalists who are a fantastically tight group. Wonderlove give their all and all for Steve, because they want to see their man happy. They have committed themselves to Wonder, and they give him 100 per cent during a performance. Wonderlove includes a wealth of musical talent, all blending superbly - including some vintage Motown choreography and powerful vocal harmonizing by three lovely ladies in black.

What all this amounted to was almost two hours of non-stop rythm, Wonder leading his band through Memory - Land, sampling tunes which represent a decade in the life of a superstar. "I was made to love her," "For once in my Life" - he touched on them all, exhibiting remarkable versatility and seemingly inexaustable strength.

Stevie Wonder, the man and his music: in a word - "wonderful." It was an excellent performance and I simply cannot understand why so many people would stay away from a concert featuring entertainment of this quality. As Stevie said Sunday night, "if you like it I hope you'll go out and buy it; if you don't like it, strike it." In other words, let's give it a chance - you can't dislike something without ever having been exposed to it! But I don't want to editorialize, so if you didn't go - tough shit, you missed a good experience.

See you at the Cockburn Concert.

"Motherlove" Opens Chronicles Series

by Carol Wood

The first production in the Drama Department's Chronicles series, which opened Tuesday evening in the studio Theatre of the Old Arts Buildings is a rather slight Strindberg, packing the usual themes of anti-feminism and the sins of the old visited upon the young into a brief 30 minute interlude. Thus several plot strands are flung out casually and frustratingly never picked up again, half an hour not being long enough, one presumes to develop the love interest of Helene or the tantalizingly dubious personality of her father.

The discovery of the wicked background of the righteous does not come as a great surprise. Mother has been looking guilty since the lights were first turned up, though Aunt Augusta does not

macpherson

The Mother (Norma Edwards) and Aunt Augusta (Carolyn Hetherington)

seem quite sinister enough for a procuress and the power behind the throne (not surprisingly, with so few lines in which to develop it, but she does a lot with nods and knowing glances. She and mother do clutch each other rather too much, however, and there are too many reassuring squeezes.)

Debbie Poole as Helene well expresses the arrested development of the mother-dominated daughter, vibing a clinging childlike quality with perhaps just a little too much of the Christmas tree fairy in it. She alternates vividly between a bubbling eagerness and a sudden complete withdrawal, the automatic freeze at the thought of her mother showing us that beyond this point unconscious fear takes over and rational argument is helpless. The touching up of Lisen's foot is also done very well with babyish sexuality, a lingeringly greedy admiration.

Lisen, the representative of

macpherson

Debbi Poole and Ildi Pilasti, as Helen and Lisen

goodness, reason and light from outside the claustrophobic family atmoshphere is given astonishingly irritating mannerism. Does she have to stalk about the acting area clasping her hands in an attitude of prayer, addressing her speeches into the distance with her back to Helene, wringing her face into an attitude of American earnestness reminiscent less of an angel of light than of a kind of miniature Abraham Lincoln? The discovery of identity scene is also very awkward. Both sisters seemed too embarrassed at being there at all to produce very convincing reactions to each other.

The best scenes were those in which Mother and daughter acted together producing a realistic atmosphere of poisonous magnetism using and twisting the customary phrases of love and affection which are so easily turned into weapons. Norma Edwards as the Mother was uniformly impressive, convincing us of her formidably evil control of her daughter, combined with her personal pitiable fear and guilt, and both accentuated by the latent sensuality of a Cruella de Ville reminding us of her earlier years. The play would have been worth seeing for this performance alone.

Rugby Gaels get Scrod

A fine effort by R.M.C.'s first XVI (actually, 15 players and their coach, who was refereeing) gave the Cadets a slim 10-9 win over Queen's 1st XV Wednesday night in a game played on the College grounds. The Gaels got a try from Kees Kort, converted by Dave Morley, who also added a penalty goal, but the combined efforts of the Redmen and the ref proved too much for Queen's finest. On numerous occasions, the Gaels' pack worked the ball deep into R.M.C. territory, only to have the whistle go, for yet another unusual offence.

One really must wonder a little when the only available official coaches the opposing team..... maybe Mike Booth should ref on Saturday.

October's nearly over, folks, and it's beginning to look like the soccer Gaels may be our only source of fall playoff action. Rugby and football have managed to get themselves sidelined (rugby still has a mathematical chance to make themselves competitive, but they'll have to get going soon) early, but the soccer boys have rebounced from a shaky start to win their last four games.

If they beat York here tomorrow, they'll be on top, with only one game to go; that's against last-place Carleton, who appear to be shoo-ins for the doormat trophy.

If the Gaels can get it together for a first-place finish, they'll play host for the winner in the west November 8th. A win then will mean a place in the CIAU championships in York on the 10th and 11th.

Congratulations are due to Sharon Fiori and her field hockey Intermediates for their first-place finish in part one of the OWIAA tournament; if the Gals can maintain that pace in two weeks, they could bring home the first title ever (in field hockey) for Queen's.

Their senior counterparts didn't fare quite as well last weekend, but have a chance to redeem themselves when it will count. Part one of the senior competition comes off at York this Friday, and Saturday, with the OWIAA championships being scheduled for Varsity next weekend.

If the Gals' forward line can start putting the ball in the net regularly, Queen's could have a good chance to move up. God knows they're in good shape after a full season of Donna Gallagher's practices.

The rugby Gaels will be trying to get back their winning touch here Saturday. They take on Varsity's side at 4:00 pm at the West Campus field. Man for man, the Gaels have as good or better a team than anyone in the league, and their pack is literally feared by most of the competition, but there has been a lack of coordination between the backs and the forwards.

There also has been an unholy lot of stupid penalties taken by Queen's. This lost them their first game with the Blues, and has hurt the Gaels on other occasions.

If the Firsts decide to play as a team, they could really take it to Toronto; if they don't, they'll probably lose. The seconds, on the other hand, are undefeated, and have allowed just six points this season (against T.M.R. last Saturday).

At times, there is very little to choose from between the two sides. Of course, Ron 'the Toe' Easteal helps the seconds out a little. . . you would pick this year to work, Ronald.

Simon Beitler's waterpolo squad has a chance to clinch first place in the OUAA-East this Saturday. The third round-robin competition is scheduled for the York pool.

If the Gaels can beat Varsity again (they won 9-8 on a goal with two seconds to go, last time), and continue their dominance of York and Ottawa U., they'll have the top spot pinned down.

The OUAA finals are scheduled for York on November 11th, with the first and secondplace schools from each division competing.

Both the men's and women's track squads are due some applause for their efforts on Saturday. Both showed well despite some incredibly bad weather. Also, some apologies to the Gals for what our esteemed printer did to their headline (John, how could you mistake OWIAA for Ottawa? It must have been a good party.) -- it should have read, "Track Gals 5th in OWIAA". (Sorry about that, Chris)

The basketball Gaels have been practicing for almost six weeks now, and Brian MacKenzie, who has been handling the team while Frank Tindall was busy with football, has the squad down to 16 bodies.

Andy Daugulis and Paul Howard, last year's co-captains and OUAA-East All-stars, head the list of returnees. Rob Smart, a versatile athlete who can play either guard or forward, and Bruce Hemming, the likely starter at centre, round out the Gaels' 'big four'.

The fifth starting position is still up for grabs, with John Keck, a product of Kingston high schools, having an inside track. Other names to watch for are Corky McCleary, a 6'4" rookie who looks a lot like Barry Beale did in his first season, Ken Sagadore, a transfer from Brock, Norm Hagarty, who looks like he may bring a lot of his defensive-end aggressiveness onto the b-ball court, and Don Sinclair, a young guard with a great deal of potential.

Fighting these newcomers are last year's subs, notably Stu Bridgeman, Stu Beck, Ian Rawes, and Dave Wright. Derek Swinnard and Dave Lefebure, who has returned to Queen's after an absence of several years, are also in contention for a spot on the roster.

Finally, a passing reference to the comments of John Wright, Sports Editor of GW. I think Saturday's game exactly proved my point about execution being the problem.

The Gaels actually had more offence than Toronto did, and, considering that over 160 yards of Toronto's came on two plays, they moved the ball more consistently than the Blues --- except inside the 25-yard line.

On four occasions in the second quarter, the Gaels' defence gave Queen's the ball inside the Varsity 40. The Gaels' offence moved well - until the 25 - and managed to collect exactly 6 points. The problem wasn't play selection, really.

Taylor's receivers were open. The problem was execution. Period. We didn't. T.O. did. And that, not any coaching decision was the reason we lost.

At any rate, we'll see next year if Hal McCarney's absence will have any beneficial effect. I suspect Moose may be missed.

Ringette 8 the new and better winter game for all Queen's girls - is here to stay. Pull out your skates and come on down to the arena to learn how to play this new sports (talent required is minimal - all you need to know is how to stand up on skates). Four clinics will be held, in the arena, on the 8th, 15th, 22nd, and 29th of November, from 7:00 to 8:20 pm. Regular league play will begin after Christmas.

Although the league will be for women only, there will be a co-ed night as well, so guys are welcome at the clinics. Grab your skates and come out and join us!

The synchronized swim meet and swimathon are the big events scheduled for next week. They will be held on Monday, October 30th, from 7:30 to 10:30 pm. Entries close today, October 27th, at 5:00 pm, so get yours in now.

The synchronized swimming will be judged on both figures and routines. A practice session will be held first, with members of the Intercollegiate synchronized swim team available for instruction.

In the swimathon, the idea is to swim as many lengths as you want, with any stroke, and with rest pauses if you wish. If you can float well enough to dog paddle, it's an easy way to get points for your faculty.

Both the basketball and paddleball tournaments are still under way.

Commitments:

We suffer no lack of challenges in Canada today. We do suffer, in my opinion, a serious lack of commitment on the part of government to meet these challenges. I would like to talk with you now about four I feel to be most urgent.

JOBS: Right now, more than half a million Canadians are without jobs, one of the highest unemployment rates in the industrialized world. In Quebec, one in eleven is jobless; in Newfoundland, one in nine; among young Canadians, one in five; among our native people, three in five. Well over two million people are directly affected.

Canada can do better. My government would make the creation of jobs its first priority.

My government would immediately reduce personal income taxes, to stimulate consumer demand, to create jobs. We would eliminate the 11% Federal sales tax on building materials to encourage construction, because construction means jobs. We would encourage the further processing of our raw materials here, because that means jobs.

My government would expand the retraining opportunities available through the Department of Manpower, and make that agency much more aggressive in searching out job vacancies.

My government would insist on greater long range planning of special job-creating activities—such as summer youth employment—so that the communities to be served could be involved from the outset, and so that jobs could be found for those whose need is most pressing.

Further, my government would act to strengthen our job-creating potential for the future. We would increase direct government investment in research and technology, and expedite the process by which Canadian innovations can be marketed around the world.

PRICES: What cost you five dollars four years ago right now costs you six. The poor people of Canada, the elderly and those on fixed incomes, have suffered most from this kind of inflation, but clearly it affects the earnings and savings of all Canadians. And, because it makes Canada's exports less competitive, inflation affects a good many jobs as well. The government I lead would tackle this problem directly.

First of all, my government would calculate its tax revenues in terms of constant rather than inflated dollars, so as to eliminate the Treasury Board's vested interest in inflation.

We would strengthen the role of the Auditor General, so that unproductive government spending, which contributes not a little to the inflationary cycle, might be revealed and reduced.

We would support the cost-of-living escalator formula for those receiving old age and guaranteed income security benefits.

And, should the need ever arise, my government would be prepared to use temporary wage and price controls to combat inflation.

ECONOMIC INDEPENDENCE: Fifty-eight percent of Canada's manufacturing industry is foreign controlled, and there have been almost as many foreign takeovers since Mr. Trudeau took over as in the previous ten years.

Mr. Trudeau's recent legislation does not begin to meet the problem: it fails to correct a situation in which it is easier for foreign than for domestic corporations to effect takeovers; further, it fails to increase a Canadian presence in existing subsidiaries, and fails to provide for full financial disclosure by those subsidiaries.

My government would enact the changes necessary to make this legislation truly effective. Beyond that, we would revise the Bank Act to make certain that venture capital was available for the expansion of existing Canadian firms, or the creation of new ones.

My government, in concert with the provinces, would develop new programs to ensure the rapid growth of our entrepreneurial and managerial talent pools.

And we would, again together with the provinces, establish and define key sectors of the economy which are to be considered reserved for Canadian ownership.

THE ENVIRONMENT: Half of Canada's urban centres with populations of a thousand or more lack any sewage treatment, and a further third have only the most rudimentary equipment. The Trudeau government's Ministry of the Environment is not really a ministry at all, since many of its regulations are enforced by a variety of other government agencies.

We can, and absolutely must do much more to protect Canada.

My government would first of all create an Environmental Council to monitor, and disseminate information upon the quality of our environment, and recommend measures to parliament.

My government would encourage the development of large-scale anti-pollution industries in Canada.

It would, together with the provinces, act to stiffen the penalties for all forms of environmental neglect, whether to our air, soil, or water, international waters included.

It would use a variety of financial incentives to assist industry to invest in pollution control equipment.

It would create a co-ordinated Department of the Environment.

I would say again that we face no lack of tasks, no want of challenges anywhere in this land...in our cities and towns, on our small farms, and across the open reaches of our north.

We can meet none of them if we cannot create jobs, if we cannot protect the savings of those who work, cannot assume greater control over our own economy, cannot live in harmony with nature.

I am confident that we can do these things, and a great many more, if we are wisely and honestly led.

My government will strive to provide that kind of leadership.

You have my word.

Canada: B.C. boosts minimum wage

VICTORIA- Approval has been given by all parties in the British Columbia legislature to raise the minimum wage from the present level of $1.50 to $2.00. The minimum set for those 17 years or under was raised to $1.60.

At the same time, it was announced that there would be further increases during the next eighteen months to bring the minimum wage up to $2.50.

Ontario is also considering raising their minimum wage from $1.65 to $1.80 for early next year. The increase, about nine percent, parallels the nine percent increase in the cost of living since the $1.65 level was set.

The Ontario government has been holding back because of the possible influence such an increase could have on employment.

TRAIL, B.C. + The Steelworkers of America is losing a large block of its British Columbia membership which is breaking off to join the fledgeling Canadian Aluminum Smelter and Allied Workers Union.

The 1800 member Steelworker local at Alco smelter in Kitimat has voted by a large margin to opt out of the Steelworkers of America and the 3800 Cominco membership in Trail is now deciding whether it wants to continue its alliance with the American union. One of the major factors in their decision is the maximum ten dollar per week strike pay allowance set by the Steelworkers of America.

The Canadian Aluminum Smelter and Allied Workers Union is affiliated with the Council of Canadian Unions, headed by Kent Rowley.

TORONTO- The Ontario Ministry of Labour has announced that it is planning to appoint a permanent arbitrator to deal with labour disputes in hospitals. The proposal is an attempt to speed the resolution of disputes and avoid the delays which have been occurring. It comes as a result of the illegal strike at Toronto Western Hospital which led to the firing of 350 employees.

KINGSTON - Mayor Valorie Swain has been appointed to the board of directors of the Montreal Organizing Committee for the 1976 Olympic games. The board is responsible for the planning and preparing of all the sports events.

Swain was appointed as a private citizen and not in connection with the sailing events which are to be held during the Olympics.

OTTAWA- Statistics Canada has announced that there has been a sharp increase in the use of consumer credit over the past year. The amount outstanding is presently $10.9 billion, 16.9 per cent over a year ago.

Chartered banks reported personal loans totalling $6.66 billion, up 23.7 per cent from last year. Personal loans under the Small Loans Act came to $393 million, representing an increase of 14.4 per cent. Sales finance and consumer loan companies showed an increase of 11.2 per cent in credit sales balances.

MONTREAL - A report prepared by seven university students at McGill found that, between 1967 and 1971, there were 154 Canadian companies producing war materials for the United States government. The report showed that the Canadian government awarded more than $458 million to support selected development projects, and to aid in modernizing plant and equipment for these companies. Forty-five of the companies were American owned and these received forty percent of the government grants, the report stated.

Most of the contracts covered transport aircraft, aircraft engines, airframe components, electronic navigation and communications equipment, marine equipment, vehicle components and spare parts.

LONDON- Chou En-lai, Premier of the Republic of China said that he will honour all contracts with Canada for goods which had been on order or delivered there before the Chinese Revolution in 1949, External Affairs Minister Mitchell Sharp announced. The payments would amount to several million dollars, Sharp claimed.

OTTAWA — A poll financed by the Conservative Party and run by Market Opinion Research Ltd. has indicated that the Conservatives and the New Democratic Party have halved the Liberal Party's lead since the election campaigning began.

The poll showed the Liberals with 35 per cent of the popular support, the Conservatives with 28 to 29 per cent, the New Democratic Party with 20 per cent and the Social Credit with 6 to 7 per cent. Others and undecided accounted for 17 to 18 per cent.

The significant gains made by the Conservative Party reflects disillusionment with the Liberal government after Statistics Canada announced high unemployment and consumer prices.

The Conservatives made net gains in Ontario and British Columbia.

MONTREAL — Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau pointed out that rising food costs are beneficial to farmers, but that the rate of inflation between mid-1970 and mid-1972 has actually been very low 2½ per cent. At the same time he pointed out that wages have risen 8½ per cent during that two year period.

OTTAWA — The Conservative Party has released a policy paper dealing with Canadian arctic sovereignty, a national health council and the building materials tax.

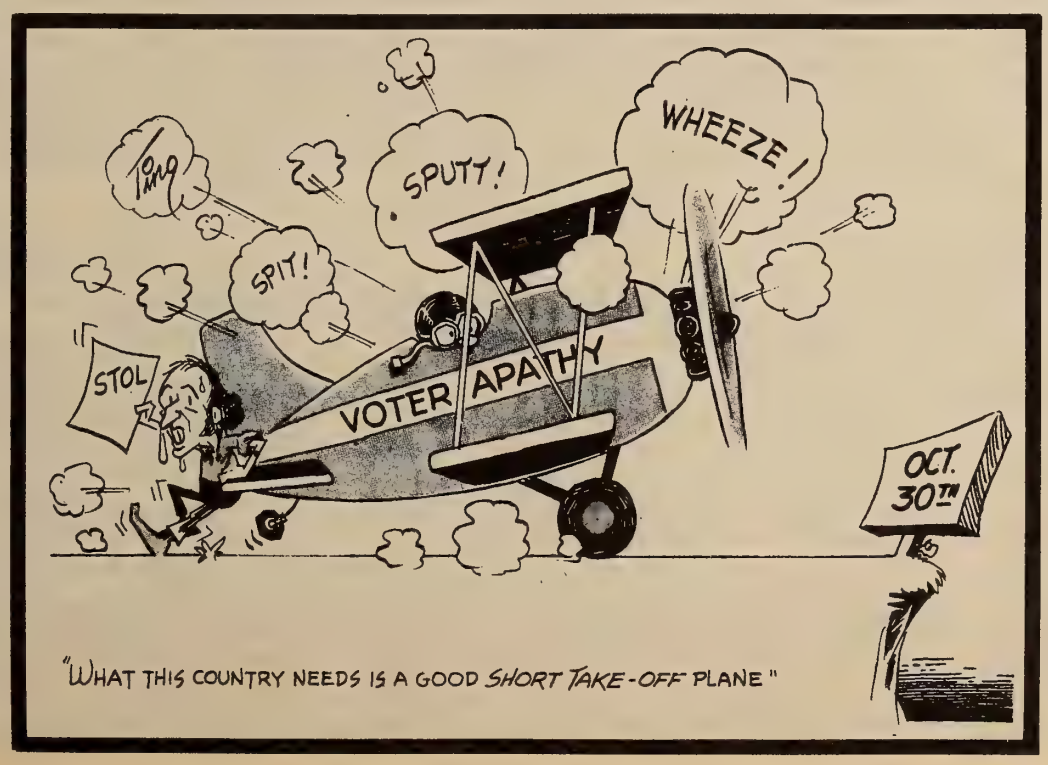
The party proposes to use the armed forces to protect Canadian sovereignty in the Arctic and to safeguard our interests again unauthorized intrusion by oil tankers that could threaten the environment.

The paper stated that continuing defence agreements with the United States should be maintained but that they should be reviewed with greater consultation on mutual defence problems.

The paper also recommends the establishment of a national health council to represent the views of the Canadian people in the development and implementation of federal health policy.

The eleven percent tax on building materials is to be removed to help relieve the high cost of housing. The paper also recommends subsidizing residential land banks with federal funds. According to the statement incentives would also be provided to encourage mass production of building materials.

While campaigning in Niagara Falls, party leader Robert Stanfield stated that a Conservative government would increase the participation of Canadians in their economy by providing income tax credits for those who invest in small businesses. This, he claimed would create new opportunities for jobs and develop a larger demand for goods and services.



OTTAWA — New Democratic Party Leader David Lewis stated that he would not agree on any forms of wage restraints unless all other forms of income are similarly regulated.

In responding to Trudeau's statement on the benefits of price increases for the farmer, Lewis claimed that although food prices have increased 42.5 per cent from 1961 to 1972, farmers' incomes only showed a 25.4 per cent rise. Their costs have increased by 40.2 per cent, he pointed out.

Lewis also attacked the disparity in prices between automobiles produced in Canada for Canadian dealers and those exported to American dealers. He claimed that the same Canadian built car is being sold to American dealers for ten per cent less than Canadians. He also accused the Canadian branches of General Motors, Chrysler and Ford of taking excess profits.

MONTREAL — Robert Laliberte, Quebec lieutenant of the federal New Democratic Party, recommended the nationalization of Bell Canada and its subsidiaries. He claimed that it is the most vorascious of Canada's corporate welfare bums. Bell Canada is not presently on the schedule for nationalization by the NDP.

TORONTO — William Kashtan, national leader of the Communist Party of Canada announced that the time is right for a coalition between the New Democratic Party and the Communist Party. He pointed out that the coalition could present a progressive block and claimed that he would create a million new jobs in two days by shortening the work week to thirty-two hours, by reducing the retirement age and by increasing pensions.

World: Agreement close on Vietnam settlement

WASHINGTON — A conciliatory statement has been issued by North Vietnamese Premier Pham Van Dong claiming that peace negotiations are in an "extremely important phase" and he "will do nothing to jeopardize a happy conclusion".

The statement outlined the North Vietnamese position which has moderated significantly. It called for a ceasefire, followed by the withdrawal of American troops, negotiations between Saigon and Viet Cong representatives for a temporary three-segment government composed of Communists, neutralists and elements from the Saigon Administration. The demands also called for a guarantee for a general election six months after the ceasefire.

The North Vietnamese statement closely parallels president Richard Nixon's policy announced last January.

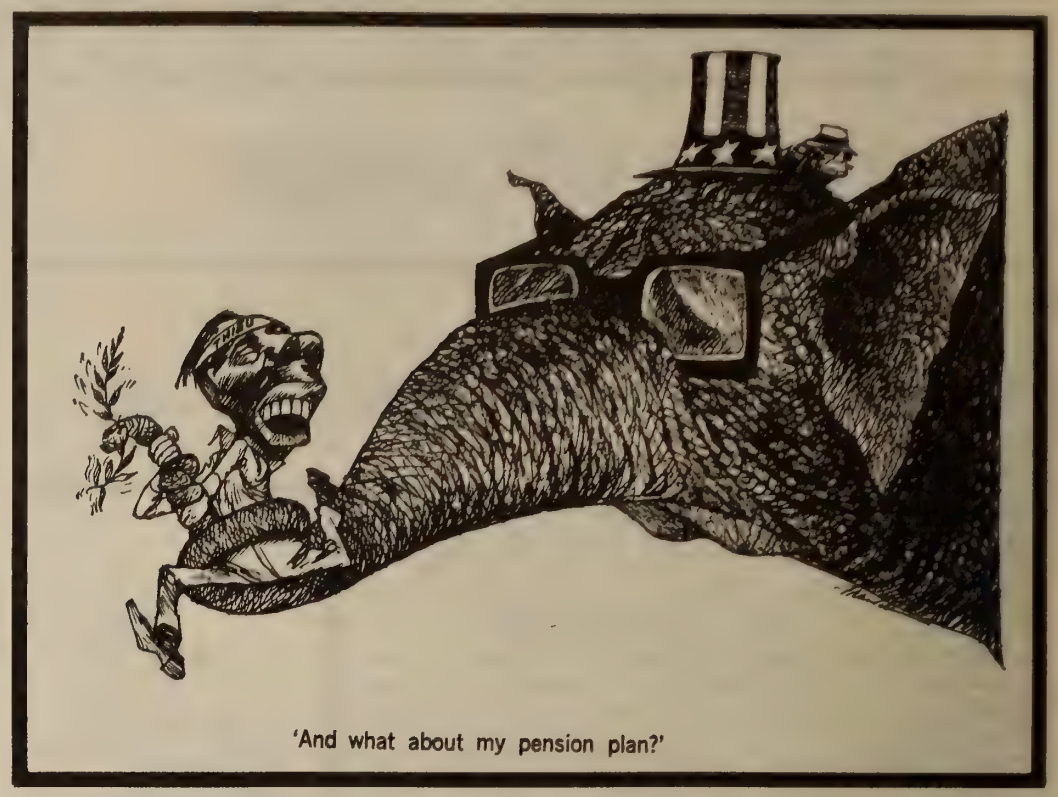
President Nguyen Van Thieu of South Vietnam has continued to show opposition to the tri-partate coalition suggested by the North Vietnamese but is making extensive inquiries into the possibility of a ceasefire. However, Thieu is stressing that a ceasefire must cover all Indochina and be internationally supervised. He also denounced any truce that lacked a satisfactory agreement on the fate of the Saigon government.

FREIBURG, WEST GERMANY — Foreign Minister Walter Scheel reaffirmed the alliance of his Free Democratic Party with Chancellor Willy Brandt's Social Democratic Party and extended it beyond the election on November 19.

However, he is presenting the party as an independent entity and stated that many of the Social Democrats views are not shared by the Free Democrats, especially in the area of taxation and worker participation in management.

As in many past West German elections the Free Democrats are expected to be the deciding factor in determining which of the two major parties are to gain control of parliament.

LONDON — Active trading placed the British pound sterling under heavy pressure and forced it to a record low level after a two day decline. By mid-day it had dropped two cents to $2.3530.



The drop has been attributed to a report by a leading West German economic institute that the pound, which has been floating since June, would be repegged as low as $2.25. The renewed strength for the U.S. dollar as a result of peace moves in Vietnam has also influenced the pound's level. South Africa also announced its lack of confidence in the pound, when it severed the link with the rand and placed their currency on the gold standard.

STOCKHOLM — The 1972 Nobel Prize in economics was awarded this year to John R. Hicks of Oxford University and Kenneth J. Arrow of Harvard for their contribution to general economic equilibrium theory and welfare economics. Begun in 1969, the prize was set up by the Swedish National Bank in connection with its 300th anniversary. The award is equivalent in value to $98,100.

HONG KONG — Peking has announced the appointment of three military officials to cabinet positions, emphasizing the continuing influence of the military in civilian affairs.

Li Chen was appointed Minister of Public Security, Cheng Wenpi Minister of Water Conservation and Power, and Yu Chui-li Director of the State Planning Commission.

In most regions of Communist China, the local commander of the armed forces is also in charge of the local government and the party apparatus.

'And what about my pension plan?'

MADRID — The strong anti-Communist feeling which has existed in Spain for over thirty years appears to be softening as the Spanish government increased its activities with Russia and China. Spain and China have been holding exploratory talks which are expected to result in the establishment of diplomatic relations. A commercial treaty with Russia was signed in Paris last year. The new Spanish-Communist relations are part of an attempt to seek new markets for Spain's expanding exports.

MOSCOW — The first formal peace treaty talks between Japan and Russia ended in deadlock over the question of four Japanese Islands held by the Soviet Union since 1945. It has been reported that Russia wants to avoid setting a precedent by conceding what is presently Soviet territory to its previous owners.

Russia and Communist China have just resumed their talks to try and resolve a border dispute in which China claims that the Czars took away certain of their territory under "unequal treaties".

WASHINGTON — Heavy melting of the polar icecap has been reported and confirmed by American flyer-explorer Brent Balchen. Volcanic activity in the Philippines, he claimed is causing rapid deterioration of the polar ice and there may be a completely open ocean in the north within another twenty years he said.

Balchen piloted Admiral Richard Byrd on the first aerial crossing of the South Pole in 1929.

WHAT, NO BEER? All kidding aside, they hadn't run out of beer, just milk, and, oh yes; cookies. The pub was also packed.

Sub-centres wanted

Claim University Centre too centralized

The planning and concept of a single large University Centre came under severe criticism last Thursday night at an open meeting of the centre's User's Committee.

Politics professor Ned Franks, a founder of Elrond College and secretary of the Arts and Social Science Complex User's Committee, led the attack charging that the committee's proposals to build another building at Union and University were "off base, since it was "not balanced", and it was "catering to a peak load" type of situation.

Franks favoured the creation of what he called a "medieval village" which would be a "personal and democratic thing combining many activities." This, according to Franks could be best accomplished through the establishment of a number of sub-centres (mini Unions) around the campus rather than the construction of another large building.

Franks was particularly concerned that the money allocated for a university centre would be used completely in the consturction of the one building, and that none would be left for the construction of the sub-centres, which he maintained should be built first. He pointed out that further funds for the project would not likely be available in future years.

Rector Alan Broadbent agreed, saying that the way to "develop the campus fabric" is to disperse activities and to provide variety at each of a number of sub-centres, so that people would move around campus. "If you build a large centre at Union and University, it will act as a drain on the campus as it is the easiest place to go. Dispersed centres would put dynamism back into the campus."

User's Committee Chairman, Math professor Dan Norman, defended the proposals saying that his committee has been asked to make recommendations for a centre not for a concept. He added that they were "kindly disposed towards sub-centres," and were installing a 3,000 square foot one in the new Arts-Science Complex.

George Perrin, president of the Alumni Association, said that the university centre should be a "community gathering place where the Alumni would have a share," and a place "to foster communications between the alumni and the students." He suggested that the offices for the Alma Mater Society, Alumni, Faculty Association, and the Placement Service should be on the first floor of the building so that they could "come together for perservation of a community relationship to better Queen's spirit". (The Alumni are contributing a million dollars to the project.")

AMS Vice-president Wally Palmer said he agreed in part with Franks and Broadbent that there should be some dispersion of facilities, but stressed the danger of students being isolated from the rest of the community, as has happened with the Law students.

Norman countered that dispersion didn't seem to make sense as it is "likely that you want something large so that you can have a big variety in one place." To this Franks replied that the Student Union at Oxford was not very large at all, and clubs and facilities were spread around the whole city.

The argument continued for an hour, with Alumnae representative on the committee Dianna Blake pointing out that there are 6000 students who live off campus who "will need a focal point."

Marney Cousins, User's Committee member, said that the union was an unattractive

Jobs good for MBA grads

The job market remains healthy for Queen's MBA graduates. This was the consensus of Mr. MacIntosh Professor of Business, Mr. Jim Leech, president of the MBA class, and Mr. David Wroe, Director of Career Planning and Placement, at the seventh Planning and Placement Career Seminar, held Thursday night in the second floor common room at the Union.

MacIntosh, in an introductory talk on the nature of the MBA programme, said that Queen's had no problem in placing its graduates, and the future looked very bright. Canada is now seventh in the world in GNP, is overtaking the U.K., and with its natural resources has a tremendous potential--hence, growing, ever more complex business organizations will require managerial technology.

Mr. Wroe said that information from Statistics Canada and from Manpower indicates that the MBA market in the 1970's will be quite strong. The demand for MBA's was extremely strong in the 1960's; in fact, there was a tendency to stockpile them even when they were not needed. Since then some companies have become dissatisfied, as have some MBA's with some companies--the result was a fall in demand since 1969. But Queen's MBA graduates have not met with this unemployment problem.

The types of jobs held by MBA's included university teaching, computer analyst, market research, foreign service, management consulting, etc. The majority went into secondary, not primary, industry; the second largest group entered government, the third teaching.

The normal starting salary now for an MBA in Canada is $10,400.

There are few women in the MBA programme-not by exclusion, but by choice. Last year, 6 women were accepted, 2 said they would come, and one showed up. The largest number of MBA women was 5 out of 60 three years ago.

Open hours again

The controversial subject of whether or not men should be allowed to invade women's residence has again been raised.

At present open hours extend from 5 pm to 11 pm during the week and from noon on Friday until midnight on Sunday.

On Wednesday and Thursday women residents will vote in meal lines on whether to extend these hours. The referendum is being held as a result of a petition handed to the WRC asking for longer open hours.

Students will be asked two questions on the upcoming ballot. Are you in favour of extending the present open hours to the period between 12 noon and 12 midnight on week nights? Would you be in favour of further extending open hours to 24 hours a day, seven days a week?

The WRC asks all residents to vote on both questions. This is not an either-or referendum.

Five students overseas

Operation Beaver and Canadian Crossroads International provide the opportunity for students to encounter other people and their cultures. This past summer five Queen's students were sent to the Caribbean, Africa and India.

Anne MacDonald A Beaver volunteer on the island of St. Kitts was part of an eight member work team renovating a school house, while living with a West Indian Family.

Elizabeth Rathbun, one of two Crossroaders in Grenada, the West Indies planned programmes for Grenadian children and teenagers in a local YWCA.

Elizabeth Gardner was faced with very different medical practices while nursing in a Malawian hospital in Africa. Harry Crosby, now at Queen's Law School, spent the summer of 1969 in Ethiopia. The other two 1972 volunteers have not returned yet from Lesotha, Africa, and India

Those interested in overseas work of this kind are welcome to come to a presentation by these volunteers in the lower lounge of the International Center of Wednesday, November 1 at 8 p.m.

Queen's debating team

More Canadian content in universities urged

by Bob Mutrie

A panel from Queen's clashed with one from Royal Military College last week in a formal debate on Canadian content in universities, their first such meeting of the year.

Warren Chapman and Dave Riddell of Queen's supported an increase in Canadian content in institutions of higher education against RMC cadets Wayne Freitag and Dave Taylor's allegation that such a move would not be desirable.

Chapman, who began the debate, stated that only 49 per cent of the faculty in our universities and colleges are Canadian and that 25 per cent of all new faculty hired tend to be from other countries.

While we are pursuing this "international flavour" he pointed out that there were thirteen thousand Canadian Ph.-D.'s without jobs last year.

Chapman claimed that this could lead to a decrease in the quality of Canadian graduates if too many became discouraged. It would also encourage more hiring abroad.

He pointed specifically to Lakehead where he claims that non-Canadians hold a great deal of power and that these people are advancing their compatriots at the expense of Canadians.

His second point was that universities "lack courses with an interest in Canadian affairs". He pointed out that, at McMaster, a course on Canadian International Studies is in a department headed by an American.

Freitag of RMC called Chapman's arguments a simplistic solution representing "mindless patriotism." He claimed that this was actually a non-problem.

"Canadian universities", he stated, "should not be a dumping place for Canadian graduates" and he pointed out that there were too many graduating with doctorates for the size of this country.

Freitag pointed out the pitfalls of a nationlist behaviour in the extreme case of Hitler Germany. Nationalism, he said, is an "artificial stimulus in a natural environment."

Riddell, the second member of the Queen's team called for more Canadian texts in our universities, pointing to studies done at McGill in 1969-70 showing that of 128 texts used in the freshman year, only three were Canadian. A similar study done at Sir George Williams, he said, showed that not one of the tests used in the freshman year was Canadian.

Riddell outlined three outcomes from such a policy. One, he claimed, was the adoption of American values in Canada, notably the "melting pot" and "grow-grow-grow" ideologies.

Secondly, he said, Canadian problems will go undiscussed and such social problems as French-English, White-Indian and such economic problems as foreign ownership and the multi-national corporation will be ignored.

Thirdly, Riddell claimed that a feeling of cultural inferiority could develop with an attitude that "our textbooks are not worth reading."

Taylor, the second on the RMC panel suggested that the question of "What is a Canadian?" should be examined. A Canadian claimed, is merely a perso can wave a piece of p showing that his birth place was in Canada.

He stated that the fact that graduates that cannot find jobs reflects on their competency. Unemployment of graduates is not a problem unique to Canada, he said, but it also exists in the United States. He pointed out that 1200 astro-physicists in the Seattle area are out of work, yet "the United States is not closing the door to Canadians."

Taylor pointed out the advantages of academic internationalism and concluded that students are intelligent enough to pick out bias in what they are taught.

The second part of the debate allowed the expression of rebuttals to previous argument and Taylor of RMC led off.

He questioned the validity of the Queen's team's statistics and pointed out that the world is too small for the petty ideals of nationalism. Problems in human relations, he claims, are international and involves "living with your fellow man" whatever their origin or nationality. Taylor said that he speaks as a "citizen of the world".

Riddell of Queen's pointed out that the definition of a Canadian has nothing to do with the original resolution. He decried the "academic incest" idea claiming that American professors were hiring more American professors over Canadian. We are coming to accept the American standard of excellence which is the Ph.D., he said, and this does not reflect on whether they can teach.

Freitag of RMC rebutted the argument against defining a Canadian claiming "we must know what it is if we are going to hire it". He stressed that we must look for the best source as possible when hiring, whether Canadian or foreign.

In his final statement Queen's panelist Chapman called for the forgetting of ideals and a return to facts. "We must make available the courses that students want," he said. Chapman stressed that radical swings in either direction are dangerous, that a majority of Canadian content is desirable while total Canadian content could be just as detrimental.

The debate was won by RMC.

Architect criticises man's conception of self

by Steven Winnett

Dunning Trust lecturer Mr. Ian McHarg, a landscape architect and Chairman of the Department of Landscape Architecture and Regional Planning at the University of Pennsylvania, was subject to some critical remarks and questions from his audience at the conclusion of his Wednesday night talk on "Design with Nature." In particular, he was rebuked by a young man (who later declined to give his name to this reporter) for superficially interpreting the Biblical and Christian message for man's rélation to his environment.

Mr. McHarg was introduced to his audience as the holder of "gorgeously radical and provoking" views. One of his more radical ideas put forward some years ago at a meeting of the Candian Audobon Society, was that conventional conservation organizations, by themselves, were not enough and that the proper study of conservationists in man.

Mr. McHarg began (in his rich, rapid-fire Scottish emigrant's accent) by warning his listeners that his style was "antiquely Prsbyterian", seeking to provoke guilt, then contrition, then salvation. "I am simply a polemicist, with no reputation to lose, so I take extreme positions to provoke people.".

Mr. McHarg began with a catalogue of "planetary diseases", environmental blemishes that are throttling the life of this green earth. Man is more than just a disease in the earth's environment; he is an epidemic because of his overproliferation.

First on the list is man's "general overkill of the world"--a wide-ranging term which even embraces "the users of underarm deodorants". The biggest cohorts of this general overkill are:

1. The mutational warriors of the Atomic Energy Commission, especially the Dr. Strangeloves engaged in bio-chemical warfare research.

2. Those who transform agriculture into pollution, forestry into deforestation--and especially "the captains of industry", whom he had addressed at, of all things, a 40th anniversary meeting of Fortune magaizine in New York: "Your personal hygiene is impeccable, with shower and change of underpants once, if not twice, a day. Hundreds of thousands of tons of your excellent excrement are dumped into our environment--which is intolerable. In the automobile industry, your only measure of efficiency is the unit of consumption. Your advertisements, with nymphs ravagging recovered men behind the wheel of a new car, tell us that you are not in the transportation but in the aphrodisiac business."

3. The fiends of Madison Avenue, who insist that the gluttony of America is not enough and who terrorize and rob the rest of the world to feed this ever-growing gluttony.

4. The western view of man and nature, which is implicit in all western religions and is based on three "horrifying lines from Genesis I:

"And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness.

And let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth.

And God blessed them, and God said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it."

There is not rebuttal of this, said Mr. McHarg, in either the New Testament, nor in any western artist, not even in men like Hopkins and Wordsworth. Such a harsh view of man's relationship to his environment has no survival value; "it does not correspond to reality."

5. Finally, there is the secular form of this view: economic determinism, which has no place for love, compassion, beauty, justice, the moon, the stars. It is a "risibly inadequate secular religion." And there is man himself, who, pulled by the scruff of the neck and questioned by a celestial wanderer as to his efficacy in the environment as compared with, say, algae, responds: "Me! I'm a man, don't you know? Brains must be put back into man, and man must be put back into nature.

One can imagine the algae getting together after an atomic war and deciding, "Next time, no brains."

So where do we go from here?

"Ten years ago," said Mr. McHarg, "I met the biological cousin of Wernher von Brann, who had set up a closed cycle, between a man and some algae. It's not a bad cycle and that's the way the world works, and intelligence which is denied in our education. Are there any monuments to algae?"

This experiment allows us to establish two useful fables

1. Educate very very young children to design elegent closed eco-systems. Imagine a beautiful little girl who learns to understand what the stystem is and then learns that it's possible for her to intervene for the benefit of the system and of herself.

2. Or, "fireworks at Cape Canaveral. Imagine every general, every slender-maniac Dr. Strangelover, every captain of industry, each in his capsule on a Saturn rocket with algae whose bio-mass equals that of each General Overkill. Once in space, the only differences between them are in apertures and DNA-RNA combinations. Now who's divine? Algae and bacteria might reply, "In this capsule, if there's divinity, everything is divine." But bacteria can accomplish photosyntheses and decomposition which man can't--he is dependent. All General Overkill can come to say is, "Algae, I love you." An attitude of deference and of prayer is needed: "Plants, live, breathe, and grow, that we may eat, breathe, and live.". With this deference "your interventions will be towards the maintenance of our survival and the promise of our fulfillment."

Mr. McHarg then proposed three essential concepts we need to understand:

1. Creativity: This is the employment of energy and matter

Arts Orientation Committee chosen

In a gruelling eight hour meeting last Thursday, six members were selected for Arts and Science Orientation Committee. The six, from among thirteen applications include Sue Harper, Brent Seymour, Eleanor Crowder, Sue Meech, Bill Fallis and Kathy Turner.

The selection was made amidst much debate. Procedures were changed in mid stream because the committee was worried about the number of males on the committee, according to Bruce Trotter, AMS rep at large and Internal Affairs Commissioner. After several ballots two males had been knocked off the ballot because they received less than three votes. The change in procedures occured because ASUS and the past orientation committee did not get the members they wanted on the new committee, Trotter told the Journal. "It was a constitutional move but there is the question of whether it was ethical," he added.

AMS rep at large Kathy Turner was elected to the committee after procedures had been changed.

Kathy McSweeney, ex-AMS rep and past member of the orientation committee pointed out at the meeting and later to the Journal that by electing Kathy Turner to the orientation committee ASUS was placing an added burden on someone who already had responsibilities as an AMS rep.

Many universities face budgetary crises

by Bob Mutrie

Students leaving campuses in disillusionment with a too highly advertised educational system, higher tuition fees, smaller provincial grants and the lack of jobs available for degree holders have thrown a monkey wrench into university enrolment projections causing multi-million dollar deficits and heavy freezes in university spending.

Nine thousand fewer students than actually expected turned up on Ontario campuses this fall with a resultant budgetary crisis as universities and colleges across the province were faced with declining government grants.

With enrolment increasing at astronomical rates all through the 1960's, universities began making more and more optimistic projections and started major building and expansion projects. When finally the number of new entrants began to dwindle starting in Western Canada two years ago, and spreading rapidly in Ontario ever since, campus after campus was caught in the midst of a building and hiring boom.

Last year, the Ontario government had to inject $1.82 million into the system to support five of the smaller universities and campuses. The figure for required government aid this year is far above that amount.

According to government figures, the universities budgeted overall for an eight per cent increase in enrolment this year but a rise of only one per cent was actually experienced.

When asked what assistance the government would give this year to help alleviate campus deficits, Universities and Colleges Minister Jack McNie stated, "we have no policy on that at the moment....we prefer that they handle it themselves."

One major point that came out of the crisis stresses the inadequacy of the present system of projecting enrolments for the next year. They may work well in times of increases but actually become a hindrance during static and declining periods.

York University in Toronto has had to cut $4.1 million from its $42 million budget as it was faced with an enrolment 2347 smaller than projected. York President David Slater called for employees to cut spending as far as possible. He stated that regular staff and faculty would be held if possible at least for 1973-1974.

Carleton academic staff may not find themselves in as good a position. In the face of an expected $1.3 million budget deficit, a special senate committee set up to deal with the problem has called for sabaticals, leaves with partial or no pay, early retirement and half pay for those nearing retirement for their professors. If all else fails, the committee claims, they will have no choice but to start firing staff outright.

Trent University which experienced a $250,000 deficit last year is expecting to go into the red this year by $310,000 on a $6.8 million budget. Last year's deficit was trimmed to $30,000 by stringent cost cutting but there are fewer opportunities for cutbacks this year.

Three million dollars in building projects at Trent have been shelved and President T.E. W. Nind pointed out that the university will innovate with their present departments before adding new ones. The university has a "moral obligation to keep its employees" he said but added that no new staff would be hired.

Ryerson Polytechnical Institute is experiencing a deficit totalling $1,250,000 this year as a result of actual enrolment falling 600 short of the expected 7800. As a result, fifty faculty members may not be returning next year. A total of 190 students paid deposits of $60 each but failed to register. Six hundred in upper years expected to return did not do so.

The University of Western Ontario, despite a freeze last spring of $1.2 million when a $743,000 deficit was expected has now to cut an additional $1.9 million dollars from their operational budget. Some $3.2 million in additions to the art gallery, library and athletic buildings had to be cut when enrolment was found to be 1400 fewer than expected.

Queen's University was one of the few to be caught by surprise in the wake on enrolment drops. Plans have been made for some time to level off enrolment and the university, after experiencing a small budget surplus last year, anticipates only a slight loss this year.

The University of Guelph was one of only two campuses in Ontario to exceed its budget projections with a 144 student increase in enrolment. However they are experiencing a budget squeeze with fast increasing costs and on only slowly increasing provincial grants.

Waterloo Lutheran is also doing well, but only because of their long experience with stringent budgets and the availability of a $300,000 reserve fund. When the university drops its religious affiliation, a move expected next May, their government grants will double.

Laurentian University is experiencing their second major deficit in two years and is having difficulty in finding more areas to cut. Heading for a $500,000 deficit after experiencing a deficit of $125,000 with government help last year. Laurentian finds it may have to begin dropping programmes.

The University of Windsor is in an equally bad position and has been forced to freeze a major long range building programme. Beginning last year they stopped replacing most non-teaching staff who left.

Ottawa has been caught in the trap of shifting emphasis from graduate to undergraduate enrolment and the resulting lower government grants have forced them to leave vacancies open as staff leave.

Waterloo achieved their projected increase of 400 students, but expect only 200 more next year. They too are faced with making cutbacks in the operating budget and suggest that some teaching staff will have to shift jobs to meet requirements in more popular courses.

Both Brock and Lakehead face major decreases in enrolment, but Brock at least claims that there will be no firing of teaching, administrative or operating staff. Brock President James Gibson claims that the university can manage "With scrupulous economies".

Some western universities are actually experiencing overall declines in enrolment, notably the University of Alberta, where the number of students registered this year dropped three per cent.

The decrease which totalled about 850 was felt mainly in the faculties of education, arts, graduate studies and engineering. The Alberta Legislature increased their grants to universities by 12 per cent this year to help offset deficits experienced in this trend.

Real gut issue

Dear Editor:

Finally, a real gut issue has arrived to occupy the time of the GSS - the price of beer. In the Oct. 27 issue of the Journal Messrs. Chowaniec and Pannekock expressed their alarm over recent Grad House policy changes approved at the GSS meeting of Oct. 5, namely a 40 cent price for a bottle of beer, and a limit on the members at TGIF.

On the first question, on the first point, the alarmists' charges of "total lack of management" are uninformed and completely unsupportable. In fact, the figures they quote are from reports prepared by our House management people and these reports have provided the best insights ever into TGIF. We have identified two contributing factors for profit variations such as those in Friday's letter:

1. cyclical nature of beer ticket purchases-not all tickets purchased at one TGIF are necessarily used that night and are carried over to later nights. Counts at various TGIF's have indicated this can account for $40 profit swings from one TGIF to another.

2. drunken barmen- operating as we do with volunteers organized by individual departments, we have always tolerated people behind the bar volunteering themselves one or two beer. On the night referred to, when the TGIF profit was $7.64, the volunteers behind the bar and several of their close friends were more than usually drunk. And probably not no beer they'd purchased themselves.

The easy solution to this latter problem is to hire professional barmen, but this would cost about $20 a night or $1000 for the year. At present, this would be no saving since excessive drinking behind the bar occurs only in isolated instances and does not appear to cost us anything like $1000 a year.

The work involved in preparing these very comprehensive TGIF reports has led to the identification of a number of hidden costs which have not heretofore been charged against TGIF. For instance, most of the House cleaning supplies are used for mopping up after TGIF and these supples cost $40-week or $2000-year. Also the $6000 in lounge furniture, rugs and drapes on the ground floor is still being paid for by each GSS member at the rate of $2.50 a year, only to be demolished by the crowds at TGIF. After little more than two years, much of this furniture has been soiled or damaged beyond repair and needs replacement. Then, last year, $1000 in air-conditioning equipment was installed by the GSS solely for the comfort of summer TGIF patrons. These are all expenses incurred by TGIF and will be included as such in all future weekly reports. On this basis a price increase was identified as long overdue. An interim report on House finances has been prepared by a special committee under past-President Bob Boulton and will be presented at the regular GSS meeting on Thurs., Nov. 2 at 7:30 p.m. in Grad House. Messrs. Chowaniec and Pannekock are invited to attend as are all GSS member to all meetings.

On their second point, the suggestion that all one thousand GSS members should be allowed into TGIF at once hardly deserves an answer. The liquor licence under which TGIF operates limits attendance to 120 people including turnover. Thus we are bound by law to enforce this limit or also shut down. Furthermore, larger crowds will only accelarate the destruction of the soft furniture in the House and result in higher beer prices yet. The House management team is however concerned that so much of the House layout and activities is geared to this one, all-consuming event, TGIF. In their search for ways to involve more GSS members at more functions within Grad House, they are interested in all suggestions as to how this might be accomplished.

TGIF still offers the cheapest beer in town and this is only because many GSS members have given freely of their time in running the event and we are pleased that they continue to do so.

Yours sincerely,
Doug Pritchard
President, Graduate Student Society

Ed note: draft beer at some places is cheaper, than that at Grad House.

Open hours

To the women of Queen's residences:

This week you will be asked your opinion on the extension of the present open hours.

Why vote for anything less than for the full extension of the present hours to 24 open hours?

The days when university women need their decisions made for them and when they need rules and regulations to guide them are, hopefully, long gone. Are you not just falling back on the rules rather than exercising self-control in voting for anything less than for 24 open hours? Must you base your behaviour on the rules that have been set down before you?

One argument against open hours is that our "Ivory Tower" will become a mad house and that our privacy will be invaded. "Quiet hours" can be observed if you want them observed. Respect and consideration for others can be exercised.

I contend that it is our right to entertain in our "home" whenever we would like to.

The rule has been protecting you--but only from yourself. It's high time you relied on your own judgment and on your own "rules".

Yours sincerely,
Susan de Stein

OFS demonstration killed at U of T

The Ontario Federation of Students demonstration to protest the fee situation will probably be called off following the refusal of the student governments at the University of Toronto, Waterloo and Ryerson Polytech to back the proposal.

The demonstration had been called at the OFS meeting two weeks ago but needed ratification by member student bodies. York University was the only one to do so.

Eric Miglin, president of SAC at Toronto said that the demonstration would hurt the federation's public image and be logistically a hard job. At the same meeting Craig Heron, general co-ordinator of OFS, warned that if U of T dropped out of the demonstration it would cause a lot of damage to OFS.

He wouldn't comment further on the U of T decision but did say that the OFS executive would meet early this week to discuss the situation and probably call off the demonstration.

The decision came a week after an OFS delegation met with colleges and universities minister Jack McNie to seek a definitive government stand on fee increases.

McNie was "non-commital" and delegates described his reaction as having no intention to say anything. Earlier in the fall McNie had been more positive that there would be no fee increases.

Enumeration for municipal elections ended yesterday

Enumerations for the municipal elections ended yesterday when the final day for registering complaints could be filed. This year the enumeration list was compiled by the provincial tax assessment office from their taxation data. This means that many students are left off the local lists due either to their not being assessed for property taxes or their not being in the municipality where they were assessed. Revision is being completed today and will be run until all corrections made by yesterday are recorded.

There have been many complaints about the lists from across Ontario, notably Toronto, where gross errors were found in the voters' lists.

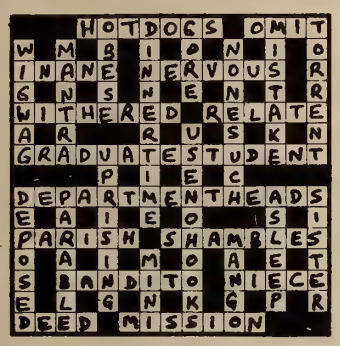
place to go as the "rooms are too large, poor furnishings, and that a map is needed to get through the maze." She stated that the "User's Committee is very concerned about atmosphere." The centre would be "somewhere to go alone but not be alone." She was concerned about the people off campus.

Gary Gannage ex-AMS rep doubted the success of the centre as "the huge building would be only an expanded union." He felt that "the community should exist within, not in a central place." He believed that to "expand the physical plant without an overall philosophy is basically wrong." He also expressed the concern that Queen's "should have community relations with the city of Kingston." To the committee proposal of having shopping services, Gannage said that the purpose was "not to build a shopping mall, but to build a university centre."

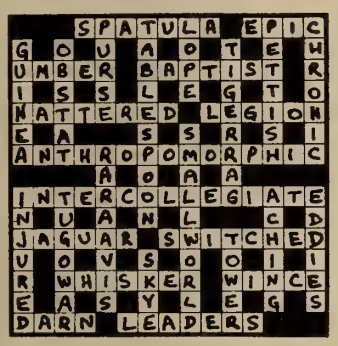
One member of the User's Committee, Godfrey Spragg, suggested that perhaps the sub-centres should be done, and that any money left over go to the construction of a main centre.

Queen's Vice-Principal (administration) Russ Kennedy said that he was behind the idea of the medieval village but was worried that the sub-centres would lack something to "bring it all together". On the other hand, he was also worried about a large centre. "The present Union was built with the same object in mind (as the centre proposal), but it didn't work."



He said that a number of rooms in the present Union have been empty since it was built, yet the building is now being used better than in the past twenty years. Kennedy was worried, however, what would happen if a building were built and no one came. He stressed that the committee would have to convince people that their proposals will work before they will be implemented and anything built.

The meeting degenerated over a discussion of the relative moralities of commercial space in the University Centre, and interaction with the community.



At the beginning of the meeting, Norman said that the committee felt comfortable about its recommendations, but at the end, admitted that it would study the proposals brought forward, and admitted that there was a possibility of starting planning from scratch.

Architect's criticism continued for a higher end, as opposed to reduction. It is a principle of thermodynamics, and of evolution: evolution is creative. Such is the activity of the little chloroplast, using the energy of the sun.

2. Aperception: The energy that falls on the plants and on us is the same energy. Man, too, has a latent creative ability, like the little chloroplast: he can transmute energy through information into meaning.

3. Symbiosis: Specialization of cells means that cooperation between the differing life forms is essential. "A profoundly important theological consideration is at work here", namely that "the golden rule is indespensable to survival."

Put in a shorter fashion, "Fitting the environment (the fittest survive) is a creative process in thermodynmamic terms, as opposed to reductive misfitting."

Mr. McHarg argued that this leads us to a simple problem: "Are you healthy? This is the ability first to answer insults, and secondly to help others to solve and seek problems. Creativity, not reductive misfitting, is necessary."

The task of ecological planning, then, is not to call for man's elimination or to bemoan his fate but "to find fit environments. There is a place for a deferential man or woman to interpose to maximize the system."

After comments by Dr. Garrett Hardin and Mr. Raymond Moriyama, the other Dunning lecturers, a young man rose from the floor to challenge Mr. McHarg:

"We're not insulted. You're not progressing. You are attacking things you haven't searched into in depth. It's easy to attack the captains of industry. Why waste your time on this"

"You should re-examine the religious aspects of what you've said: this is fundamental. You could find greater depths in the Bible than you have. One of the great messages of Christianity is to look into yourself first, rather than correcting others."

Mr. McHarg replied that he wan't a scientist or a scholar, and that he found a certain utility in being outrageous--you have effects. "No one has pursued this theological matter more throughly than I," he said, and proceeded to give a lengthy list of the many theologians whom he had consulted concerning the Biblical passage. "I'm deadly serious. This text is a calamitous text."

Dr. John Livingstone, observing that a "can of worms" had been opened here, tried to divert that attack by suggesting that the blame should be laid, not on the scientist, but on the liberal humanists, who see nature as a natural resources, or as scenery "but forget they are part of it." These congealed and fossilized misapprehensions in the humanities" have permeated our educational system.

But an elderly gentleman in the audience brought the panel back to theology, and asked if Mr. McHarg were familiar with the work of Raymond Schaeffer, who argues for man's "stewardship", not dominion over earth Mr. McHarg said he was not familiar with Schaeffer's work Dr. Livingstone was.

A sense of futility pervaded the remaining questions, and the evening closed, the audience diminishing, with a plea for "change in the social order."

A Concise History

In early 1960, Keith Spicer, a graduate student at the University of Toronto, became interested in Canada's external aid programme and in the idea of voluntary service overseas for young Canadians. In that year, he travelled to Southeast Asia to collect material for his doctoral thesis on Canada's Colombo Plan programmes. He made a number of contacts during his travels and discussed plans for the establishment of a volunteer organization.

As a result, Canadian Overseas Volunteers (COV) was formed in 1961 with Spicer as Secretary and Fred C. Stinson, Toronto lawyer and Conservative Member of Parliament for York Centre, as President. Lectures were arranged at the University of Toronto to interest possible volunteers; financial support was solicited from businesses, service clubs and church organizations. The first group of 15 volunteers left for their one-year assignments in India, Ceylon and Sarawak in August, and all but two were from Ontario. The volunteers made arrangements for their own orientation and assisted with fundraising. In 1962, a further group of 16 volunteers was selected for service in India and Ceylon.

At the same time that COV was being founded, Canadian Voluntary Commonwealth Service (CVCS) came into operation led by Guy Arnold, an Englishman teaching in Canada, who had undertaken a visit to British Guiana with two under-graduates from the University of Toronto in the summer of 1960. In addition to sending university graduates, under-graduates and recent high school graduates to the Caribbean for both short-term service and service for one year, Arnold was interested in arranging for youth of the Caribbean to visit Ontario during the summer.

Also, in 1960 the President's Committee on overseas Service was formed at the University of British Columbia by two students, Brian Marson and Michael Clague, with the help of other students and interested faculty members. Prior to the full development of CUSO, the UBC Committee selected two home economics graduates for two-year assignments in Ghana in September, 1961, and two teachers for assignments in January, 1962. The full costs were provided by the Ghanian government although the Committee secured additional salary support for the teachers. Four teachers were sent to Sarawak in the summer of 1962 by the UBC Committee.

In Quebec, Le centre de fromation pour l'envoi de techiciens en pays sous-developpes was founded in September, 1959. This group arranged for discussion groups and seminars concerning development problems but did not realize its plans to send volunteers overseas.

However, a successor organization known as Laval Missionaires was founded which did develop an overseas programme. Similar groups grew up at the Universite de Montreal and the Universite d'Ottawa. These groups came together in August, 1961, to form Le movement universitaire national pour le development outre-mer (MUNDO). The objectives of the organization are to promote an increased Christian concern for the problems of developing countries, to aid missionaries departing for and returning from their missions, and to prepare lay missionaries for overseas service. Commencing overseas operations in 1961, MUNDO had sent 19 teachers, doctors and nurses abroad for one-year terms by January 1964. MUNDO has always had an interest in programmes for service in Canada as well. Members have undertaken assignments in communities in Ontario, the Northwest Territories and Quebec during the summer months as well as for one or two years.

Dorothy Friesen, a graduate nurse from Vancouver General is now a nursing tutor in India.

Avoiding charging rhinos are just some of the aspects of Art Klassen's job working for CUSO in Tanzania.

As interest in overseas service was increasing and there were indications of organizations developing in several parts of the country, it became obvious that there was a need for a national organization for long-term service overseas, but also to secure wide support from the various groups in Canada as well as sufficient financial support to meet the aspirations of all concerned.

On March 20, 1961, the Canadian National Commission for UNESCO convened a meeting at the request of several individuals and organizations in order to discuss the possibility of establishing a national non-denominational organization for overseas service. In addition to Dr. J. Francis Leddy, President of the UNESCO Commission, Lewis Perinbam, Associate Secretary, and representatives from COV and the UBC Committee, there were also representatives or observers from the then External Aid Office and several university-oriented organizations.

As a result of this and subsequent meetings, it was decided to draft a constitution for a national organization which would provide for a strong national executive committee and a national staff operating through its chief administrative officer, the Executive Secretary. On June 6, 1961, during the annual meeting of the National Conference of Canadian Universities and Colleges at McGill, a special meeting held under the chairmanship of Dr. Leddy was attended by representatives of 22 organizations with interests related to overseas service. After considerable discussion, the draft constitution was adopted and CUSO came into being as a national organization. Dr. Claude Bissel, President of the Uniersity of Toronto, was elected as Honorary President of the organization and the Very Reverend Father G. H. Levesque, O.P., Vice-Chairman of the Canada Council, was elected as Vice-President. An Executive Committee of even members was chosen under the chairmanship of Monsignor H.J. Somers, President of St. .Francis Xavier University.

During its first year of operation CUSO was administered from the office of the UNESCO Commission, with Lewis Perinbam serving as the Acting Executive Secretary. The Executive Committee assumed responsibility for the implementation of policies to develop contacts with various governments and agencies overseas as well as to establish CUSO committees across Canada. More than 40 such committees were set up in the 1961-1962 academic year. The first 17 CUSO volunteers were sent to four overseas countries on two-year assignments in the summer of 1962 and the basic administrative structure was established during this first year.

On October 1, 1963, the Canadian Universities Foundation assumed the administrative responsibility for CUSO which became an associate committee of the foundation. Dr. Leddy succeeded Monsignor Somers as Chairman of the Executive Committee and held this position until October, 1965, when he was succeeded by Professor J. King Gordon. Dr. Geoffrey Andrew, then Executive Director of CUF, was instrumental in making arrangements for a permanent home for CUSO and in securing the universities support for CUSO's expansion.

CUF provided the administrative budget for CUSO from October 1, 1962, until March 31, 1963, after which CUSO assumed the responsibility for securing its own finances, launching its first national fund raising campaign in 1963.

Support by the federal government started in the summer of 1964 when it provided Royal Canadian Air Force transportation for all outgoing volunteers. The next year it added direct financial assistance. Growing over the years as the CUSO programme expanded, this federal grant in 1970-71 reached the sum of $4,250,000 provided through the Canadian International Development Agency. For the same year, overseas governments and agencies contributed in excess of $3,500,000 in the form of salaries and housing supplements to CUSO personnel in their employ.

Indirect financial support comes from a wide range of participating organizations in Canada. Universities and colleges supply staff man hours, office space and equipment for local committees. Operating both on and off campus, these committees form the basis of CUSO's recruitment and selection system. Members of the advertising industry have voluntarily assisted in the preparation of recruitment advertising which is carried free of charge by newspaper, magazine, radio and television media as a public service. Pharamaceutical and other companies donate drugs and medical supplies for medical kits packaged for CUSO personnel by the Department of National Health and Welfare. In 1970-71 the total cost to the donors of all such indirect assistance was estimated at more than $700,000. The cost to CUSO of replacing this support would be in excess of $2,500,000.

The developing countries where CUSO operates are making progress. The changes in the CUSO programme reflect that progress. But one thing remains unchanged after ten years: there is still an urgent need for the type of personnel CUSO can provide.

WHO qualifies?

CUSO provides professionally and technically competent Canadians to meet the changing manpower requirements of developing countries. An independent, non-profit organization, it operates as a "middle-level manpower" technical assistance programme.

CUSO personnel work for two-year assignments under contract to overseas governments and agencies. Assigned in response to specific requests, they represent a wide variety of professional and technical skills. In greatest demand are teachers - especially maths and science - nurses, doctors, physiotherapists, medical technicians, technologists and tradesmen. Other job requests range from architects to stenographers, journalists to zoologists.

Applicants with a degree, diploma, tradesmen's papers or equivalent for which CUSO has a job request qualify as a CUSO worker.

CUSO assignments call for qualities of initiative, common sense, adaptability, sensitivity, and an ability to relate to different values and conditions.

Married couples are eligible provided suitable placements can be made for both husband and wife. Couples with small children may be accepted if children will remain below school age for duration of assignment.

Age is not a factor provided you have good health. CUSO's oldest was 80; the youngest 19.

You must be a Canadian citizen or a landed immigrant who intends to take out Canadian citizenship.

Terms of service are flexible in cases of extremely high priority requests.

WHY the need?

Two-thirds of the world's people - millions of them in former colonies - live under social and economic conditions far below the standards taken for granted in industrialized nations. The gap is widening.

The effort to close it - through international development - is seen by many as the world's No. 1 problem. The solution lies both in the development and developing nations.

Developing countries want to be self-sufficient, not dependent. Money and materials alone are not a total solution. Equally essential is the transfer of technical skills - enabling developing nations to make maximum use of their own manpower and natural resources.

As a middle-level manpower technical assistance programme, CUSO plays a small but practical part. Helping to speed the development process has been the CUSO objective since its inception in 1961.

CUSO sees its role as been complementary to the development efforts of the countries concerned, filling the gap which cannot yet be covered by their local manpower resources. Self-help programmes in the countries where CUSO personnel work should make such assistance a temporary instrument, offered in a millieu of equality and international co-operation.

How does a developing nation view this kind of co-operation? To quote President Nyerere of Tanzania: "The question, therefore, is whether we are prepared to make our plans wait until we have educated and trained a Tanzanian for every job which has to be done. And we long ago decided that this would not only be absurd, it would also be unnecessary. An accountant is an accountant, whether he is a citizen or not; a doctor is a doctor; a manager is either efficient or not efficient. What really matters in relation to such people - whether they be citizens or not citizens - is that they loyally and efficiently carry out the decisions made by our government and our people."

WHAT are terms of service?

Assignments are for two years, but may be extended one or two years by mutual agreement.

You are paid at approximately local - not Canadian - rates by your host country employer, to whom you are directly responsible. These rates will vary considerably from one country to another, but related to the local cost of living, your salary will be sufficient to maintain a modest but comfortable standard of living.

Types of accommodation vary; you may live in a hostel or an apartment, rent a bungalow or live with a local family.

Employers are asked to provide, wherever possible, tools, materials, equipment and transportation needed for efficient job performance.

CUSO pays transportation costs from your home to training centre in Canada, and then directly overseas. At the end of assignment you are provided with an air ticket to Canada or equivalent in cash enabling you to return by any means and route you wish.

Depending on your posting, you may receive a modest settling-in allowance on arrival, and a re-establishment allowance on completion of assignment.

CUSO provides free life insurance coverage ($10,000 for single persons; $25,000 for heads of families) and a comprehensive health plan which covers most doctor, hospital, drug and dental bills. This coverage extends from the day you first attend orientation until five months after you complete your overseas assignment.

CUSO can arrange to defer Canada Student Loans by paying interest during your assignment.

WHEN should you apply?

CUSO is represented across Canada by a network of 90 local committees at universities, colleges, institutes of technology and community colleges. They will give you all necessary information, application form if you are eligible, and arrange selection interview.

Contact the committee nearest you. In Kingston, Kasper Pold, Overseas Student Advisor at the International Students Centre and Executive Secretary of the International Centre Management Committee is also Chairman of the Kingston Local CUSO Committee, which is the Queen's campus arm of CUSO, Ottawa.

Recruitment activity is concentrated in the fall and early winter. It is in our own interest to apply as soon as possible. However, it is never too early or too late.

If you are recommended by local committee, your dossier is sent to National Selection Committee in Ottawa which - usually within one month - decides on your personal, physical and professional suitability for overseas assignment.

Details of approved applicants are then submitted by CUSO field staff overseas to the government or agency concerned who, as your future employer must be allowed sufficient time to make the final decision on your acceptance and placement. You should not leave your present employment until this final confirmation is received.

All outgoing personnel must attend an orientation and training course before proceeding to assignment. Courses cover area studies plus language and specialized professional instruction where necessary. Lasting six to eight weeks, these take place in Canada and in country of assignment between June and August. You travel to your assignment direct from your course.

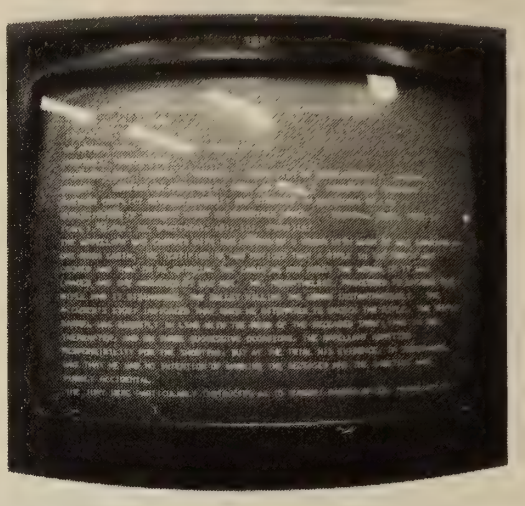
Queen's University Investigation of Computing & Law

by Martin Jones

Wandering into the house on 140 Beverly Street is a bit like stumbling upon the headquarters of a fanatical political movement. There is nothing on the dignified exterior of the rambling old house to prepare one for the vigorous confusion inside. Meetings, gatherings and coffee-breaks emerge suspiciously from one room and disappear into the next. A constant parade of anxious-looking individuals tear up and down staircases and everywhere there are machines that seem to produce nothing but paper - paper that overflows filing cabinets, crawls out of cardboard boxes, submerges work desks and creeps across floor space.

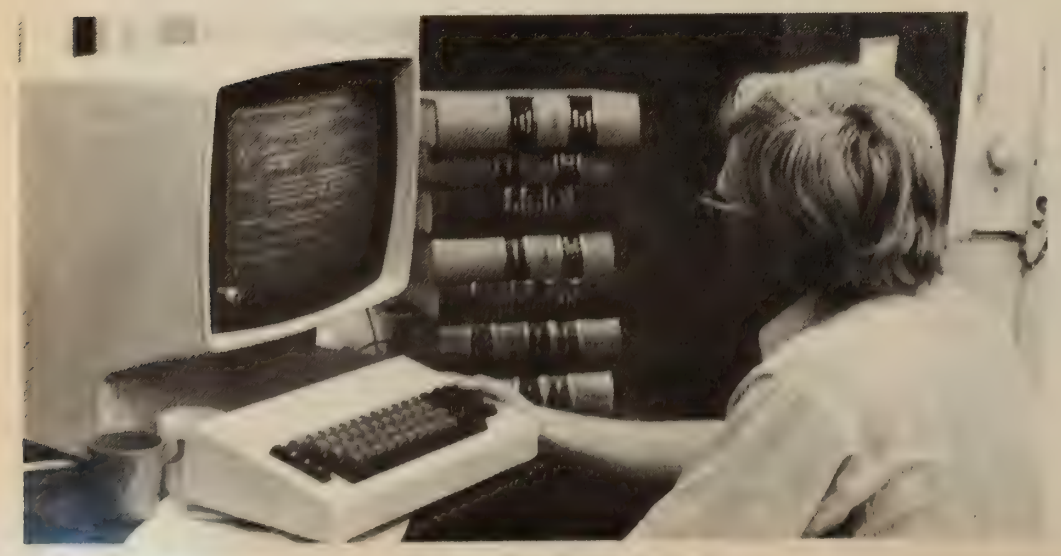
But out of this chaos is emerging a unique and significant project that promises to improve the quality of legal services through out the world. It is the QUIC-LAW project, conducted by the University, and involving the use of computers for editing, storing, and retreiving billions of words of legal statutes, regulations, cases, and other documents. When the system is completed, it is expected that every Canadian lawyer will have instant access to all the necessary texts and statutes. The developing project has already proved its value to a number of government and judicial agencies.



Equalize Legal Services

The QUIC-LAW project was instituted in early 1969 to solve the problem posed by the increasing mass of case and statute law which has made conventional methods of searching awkward and time-consuming. By eliminating much of the time spent on legal drudgery, the new retreival system should also result in lower costs for clients. It is also expected to equalize the access to legal services between the rich and the poor and between large urban centres and small towns. At present, small town lawyers do not enjoy the availability of large libraries and university law faculties that city firms do. Once all lawyers have equal access to a central data bank, the gap between the quality of legal services available in different regions of the country should be significantly reduced.

The QUIC-LAW project is not the first to explore the use of computers for legal practice, but it is managing to avoid the cumbersome limitations which previous retrieval systems encountered. Other operations demanded the user learn codes or special computer language for posing questions. They were designed as batch-processing systems in which questions were gathered and then submitted as a group at the computer centre, rather than at a terminal point, permitting a dialogue between the user and the data centre. The structured form in which documents were recorded was far too rigid and there were limits upon the size of the data base. Earlier systems proved far too slow - requiring minutes rather than seconds to produce information. One of the most prohibitive factors was high cost which limited the service to law firms with no less than twenty lawyers.



The programmers and analysts working for QUIC-LAW have managed to solve most of these problems. The new system is designed to respond to simple English sentences within thirty seconds. The operator will simply type out his question and the required information will appear on the screen of the small terminal unit. And it is to be inexpensive enough to enable all lawyers to make use of it. Search costs are estimated to be between three and five dollars for those who use a central terminal and about two dollars for firms which rent their own, at a cost of about $250 a month.

QUIC/LAW

Up until now, testing has been conducted through a number of terminals located at various law schools across the country. At the moment, about twenty terminals are being connected in law offices in order to discover how often the service will be used, what the cost will be, what information will be requested and who will use it.

Law enters the computer age

A Number of Accomplishments

The project already has a number of achievements to its credit. It is presently operating a test network of terminals stretching from Vancouver to the University of Ottawa Computer Centre where millions of words have been recorded for quick retreival. It is advising the House of Commons on the use of computers for handling parliamentary documents and assisting the governments of British Columbia and New Brunswick in similar enterprises. A computerized text-editing system is being developed in conjunction with the Printing Operations Branch of the Federal Supply and Services Department for the proofreading and editing of Canadian government documents. It is placing other documents totalling over three-hundred million characters in data bases for the National Science Library's "Pollution Information Project" and Environment Canada's Resources Branch.

The association between Queen's University, law, and computers goes back to 1967 when a programme was begun to edit bibliographic records concerning treaties. This was followed by a conference on Computers and the Law, sponsored by the University and the Federal Department of Justice in 1968.

An agreement with IBM to conduct a joint study of legal information retrieval in late 1968 launched Queen's on its QUIC-LAW project. During the first year of testing, IBM provided the equipment and personnel as well as access to unreleased computer programmes which had been developed for internal corporate use. The University put up all overhead costs and provided for restricted use of its computer: the legal talent came from the Law faculty.

QUIC-LAW initially received enough machine-readable texts to test the developing retrieval system programs through contracts with Federal government agencies and some provincial governments. The University shared the costs of converting a collection of statutes, judicial decisions, or regulations with the various government agencies. This series of contracts benefitted all parties for in return for enabling the project to acquire a data base, government is able to use its machine-readable texts in recording its printed statutes on computer.

Future Problems

Obviously, QUIC-LAW is not a small-time operation struggling along on a shoelace. It employs sixty full-time personnel working two shifts a day and works with a budget of almost a million dollars a year. Besides conducting the programme from the main office on Beverly Street, the project uses the basement of John A. Macdonald Hall for proof-reading and treaty research. But all the testing is conducted from Beverly Street to the University of Ottawa Computer Centre.

While most of the personnel are proofreaders, terminal operators, and administrators, the QUIC-LAW project is held together by a core of ten analysts and programers under the direction of Professor Richard von Briesen, a Harvard trained linguist and lawyer whose hobby is riding a unicycle.

But the organizing talent and leadership for the whole project comes from Professor Hugh Lawford. A quiet, business-like man who gives the appearance of struggling with a vast resevoir of internal energy, Lawford has been a special assistant to the President of the Privy Council and Prime Minister Pearson. It was his research on the responsibility of Canada and other Commonwealth countries to the treaties concluded for them by Great Britain that led to the QUIC-LAW project.

Although technical problems are being surmounted, Professor Lawford does see financial and political obstacles to the completion of the project. The University has been receiving a great deal of support from IBM Canada and the Trans-Canada Telephone system but a enormous amount of financial investment is going to be necessary in the future. The government is not efficient at operating an information service and would prefer to have private enterprise handle it.

There is also a potential conflict between the federal and provincial governments over control of the data base. Furthermore it does feel that it could justify the expense to the public at the moment.

Experience has shown that a university is also not adept at operating a commercial venture. Consequently, Queen's has begun looking for a large and reputable private organization capable of serving the whole country. If Canadian law firms are to have access to all necessary legal material, then an organization serving the whole nation is going to be required.

And in case you were wondering: QUIC-LAW stands for Queen's University Investigation of Computing and Law.

Free kicks sink soccer Gaels

by Dave Cottee

In a game that was dominated by free kicks, it was sadly appropriate that it was a free kick that started the soccer Gaels on their way to a 4-1 defeat at the hands of the York Yeoman Saturday afternoon at the west Campus.

The contest was scoreless until the latter part of the first half when a York attacker penetrated the Gaels right side and was upset just outside the penalty area. York was given a direct free kick and they executed a hard accurate shot just under the crossbar and beyond the outstretched hands of goalie Peter Dickee.

York continued to apply pressure and not long after, they gained a corner kick. Once again they took full advantage of their opportunity. A good long kick was headed cleanly into the goal by a York player who had moved quickly into position with little opposition from the Gaels.

Down two goals now, Queen's fought back strongly. A fine effort by Gord Taylor drew a foul by a York defender and gave the Gaels a free kick in the Yeoman territory. Gerry Birks took it and sent a good kick into the goal area. York failed to clear properly and Davy Robertson had a chance. His attempt was blocked but the ball went to Don Baragar who did not hesitate and kicked the ball into the corner of the goal.

Spurred on by Baragar's goal, the Gaels had several good chances to tie the score, both late in the first half and early in the second. At this point in the game, Queen's were running their best particularly on lead passes up the right side to Baragar.

Soon after Baragar's goal, Gordon Howard took a short pass from Gerry Birks off an indirect free kick but his scoring attempt was missed. The rest of the Gael's chances went to the same way as they failed to finish off their plays. Robertson was unable to catch a pass that would have put him in the clear, and he made a fine attempt to head in a corner kick but it was too high for him. Gord Taylor made an excellent individual effort but his kick was wide.

As the second half continued the York Yeoman took control. They had most of the play concentrated in Queen's end of the field throughout the second half. Their numerous fouls on both sides, and the resulting free kicks, seemed to suit their pattern of play. York continually kicked into the Queen's goal area and kept up a strong attack.

d wood

Peter Dickie made the save on this free kick, but then York took advantage of Queen's alert play to score on the rebound.

Finally the pressure paid off as York got a penalty kick when Dickie interfered with a York player. Dickie stopped the almost automatic goal with a diving save but could not handle the rebound and York beat the Gaels to the loose ball to make the score 3-1 in York's favour.

The rain fell heavier and so did the Gaels' hopes. The Gaels failed to intercept a pass into their goal area and gave one of the Yeoman an unobstructed path the goal to close the scoring, giving York a 4-1 victory.

One of the best crowds of the year was on hand for the last home game of the season. Next Saturday the Gaels close out the season at Carleton.

Hockey season opens Saturday

For the second consecutive year, Queen's will play host to one of nine regional Hockey Canada tournaments, sponsored jointly by Hockey Canada and the Big Brothers Association of Canada. Play will get under way at 6:30 p.m. on Saturday, November 4th, when Queen's takes on Trent University in the Harty Arena. That game will be followed at 9 p.m. by a match between McGill and York. The two winners will meet at 2 p.m. Sunday afternoon in the championship game. This year, the regional winners will meet in Hamilton in mid-December to decide a national champion.

In preparation for their opening match with Trent, the hockey Gaels have been hard at work under the watchful eyes of coach Bob Carnegie and his assistants Dave Field and Graham Closs. An initial turnout of 78 rookies and 20 veterans has been trimmed down to 30 hopefuls from which a 17 man squad will be picked for Saturday's encounter.

Leading the list of returnees is goalie Clyde Harris, now in his third season with the Gaels. Harris is joined by last year's backup man Bill Minnis, and three newcomers: Don Hall from the University of Lethbridge, Raj Annand, a Winnipeg product; and Kingston native Dave Dungey. The situation in goal looks solid.

On defence, the five year rule has struck again, moving Graham Closs to his new coaching role. However, the return of Steve Gross, last year's rookie of the year, and veterans Mike Lynch and Stu Lang make the loss bearable. The rookies to watch here are Toronto native John Jeffrey, and Chris Clark, a former Upper Canada Star who is also a member of the soccer Gaels. The defensive corps could be better than last year despite the absence of Closs.

Up front, however, the Gaels have suffered some big losses. Morris Mott has taken his goal scoring and leadership to the California Golden Seals of the NHL, and Murray Douglas, winner of the Jenkins Trophy last season, has graduated. Also gone are steady veterans Bruce Cameron, Dave Nuttall, Doug Barton, and Stan Galt. All is not bad news, however. Colin Loudon, who scored 19 goals to lead the club last season is back along with John Smith, Bob Kindon, Norm Goulet, and Bill White. Jim Adair, a former star with Oklahoma City of the Central Pro League, has joined the club, as have Jim Sunstrum, late of Loyola University, and Dick Dorion, who played with Mount Royal College in Calgary last year. Craig Shannon, Sandy McDonald, and Jim Tittemore are the newcomers to look for among the forwards.

Tickets for the Hockey Canada tournament are now on sale weekdays from 11 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. at the administration office of the Queen's Physical Education Centre. Adult tickets are $1.50 and student tickets are $1.00. Student green cards DO NOT entitle the holder to free tickets to these games.

Rugby 1sts drop another

For the fifth time this season, Queen's rugby Gaels managed to lose a game they could have easily dominated. The Varsity side edged the Queen's contingent 18-11 in a game played under conditions reminiscent of the 1962 Grey Cup (the Fog Bowl, for those who don't remember) at Queen's West Campus field. The Gaels enjoyed an immense territorial advantage throughout the match, but were unable to finish off their penetrations, permitting Varsity to kick the ball to safety on many occasions. The Gaels' disorganisation was encouraged by the crisp tackling of the Toronto side, which permitted the Gaels' backs no leeway for bad timing.

Typically, for a game with a notable lack of team effort, there were outstanding individuals. Lee Doney provided the Gaels with several dazzling rushes, while Bob Common's ball control and passing was nearly flawless. Veteran scrum-half Terry Graham played a tremendous game, one of his best ever for Queen's, and Mike Dyer proved a tower of strength for the Gaels, controlling line-outs throughout the match.

When the Gaels did put some teamwork together, Dave Walters and Warren Smith punched the ball across for tries. Dave Murley added a penalty goal to complete Queen's scoring.

The Rugby Gaels play their remaining league matches this week, meeting Trent in Peterborough tomorrow, and entertaining York here on Saturday. It looks like a short season.

X-C 3rd in OUAA tuneup

The Queen's cross country team placed third in the University of Western Ontario Open invitational Meet held in London on Saturday. The Gaels were behind Western and Waterloo in team standings, although coach Walter Eadie finished first in the individual competition, covering the five mile course in a time of 25:09.0. Bruce Elliot placed 8th, Bob McLeod 11th, Bill Bryden 12th, Dieter Stein 16th, Peter Robinson 19th, and Jim Dee 25th.

Next weekend, the Gaels will compete in the OUAA cross country finals at Guelph. Although unable to compete himself, coach Eadie has high hopes that his charges will finish high enough to qualify for the CIAU competition at RMC on November 11th.

Gals don't win but Tondeur happy

The women's fencing team didn't win the Queen's Invitational Tournament held here Saturday, but their coach, Jon Tondeur, was smiling. His charges had shown every indication of being a force to be reckoned with in OWIAA fencing this season. Sue Seto and Erika Adelmann, both of whom were in their first intercollegiate competition, fared very well in tough competition. McMaster won the six-team competition, with Ottawa U. second.

With the exception of team captain Judy Krupanszky, Queen's team is composed entirely of rookies. If these girls improve as Jon expects them to, Queen's could challenge for the title in the league competition in early February.

Waterpolo in 1st-place tie

Queen's Golden Gaels waterpolo team went down to their first defeat of the season on Saturday as they lost 5-3 to the University of Toronto in one of their three games in the tournament in Toronto last weekend. The other two games saw Queen's win easily: 15-3 over York and 14-0 over the University of Ottawa. The win for Toronto moved them into a first place tie with Queen's with a 5-1 won lost mark. This means that first place will be decided next Saturday in Toronto when the two teams will again meet.

In the York game, Queen's outswam their opponents with captain George Craig and defenseman Rich Zajchowski accounting for three goals each. Chris Whately, Archie Nesbitt, and Jack Muir scored two goals apiece and Kewan, Howard, and Steve Patterson added singles.

It was much the same story in the Ottawa game with goalie John Earle getting his first shutout of the season. Scorers were Dave Howard with fur, Chris Whately with 3, Jack Muir, Steve Patterson and George Craig, 2 each, and Archie Nesbitt with 1.

The final game of the tournament saw Queen's pitted against the University of Toronto. The Blues won the game 5-3, although one of their goals came on a very questionable ruling by the officials. The Toronto player picked up a ball that had gone out of bounds, and passed it to a teammate who fired past a surprised Queen's goalie. The goal was allowed. Later in the game, Queen's had a goal disallowed on a late offside call. Chris Whately, Rich Zajchowski and Jack Muir were the marksmen for Queen's.

On Sunday, Queen's played an exhibition game against Laval University, leaders in the Quebec Conference. The Gaels won the game 11-3 dispite playing without several regulars. Coach Simon Beitler credited backups Brian Everenden, Dave Kay and Martin Marchyshyn with strong performances in the game.

Rugby 2nds still undefeated

Unlike their senior counterparts, the 2nd XV have chalked up an undefeated (and unscored-upon, in league play) record this season. They dumped the Varsity Seconds 24-0 on Saturday, and displayed considerable better team play than the 1sts could muster. The Gaels got tries from Kees Kort, on a lovely set-up by Herman Jilesen out of a loose ruck, and Phil Hamilton, on a long driving rush, to open up a 12-0 first-half lead, then matched this output in the second period, when good play by the back line broke Jim Oppen into the clear for one major and Jim Ferguson for the other. Ron Easteal converted all four scores, despite the difficult angles required of him.

Team fencers here

Queen's University hosted one of Canada's few team fencing competitions this past weekend, with the Cordier- Rome Inter-City Tournament taking place in the Bews Gymnasium. Teams from Toronto, Ottawa, Kingston, and Montreal took part, with the Kingston contingent being drawn from the ranks of the Queen's and RMC intercollegiate teams. Several of the participants were members of the Canadian Olympic Fencing Team at Munich, including Gerry Weidel, past Canadian foil and epee champion, Melba Woolcott, a former Chilean women's foil titleholder, and Darlene Larsen one of Canada's best young fencers, who is regarded as a good hope for Canada in the 1976 Olympics.

Although the Kingston team finished in fourth spot in the competition, both the Queen's and RMC coaches were pleased with the performances of their teams. Queen's in particular should do well in OUAA competition later in the season.

Marcel Duchamp Apropos of "Readymades"

Boite en valise by Marcel Duchamp, National, Gallery of Canada.

by Paula David

"In 1913, I had the happy idea to fasten a bicycle wheel to a kitchen stool and watch it turn.

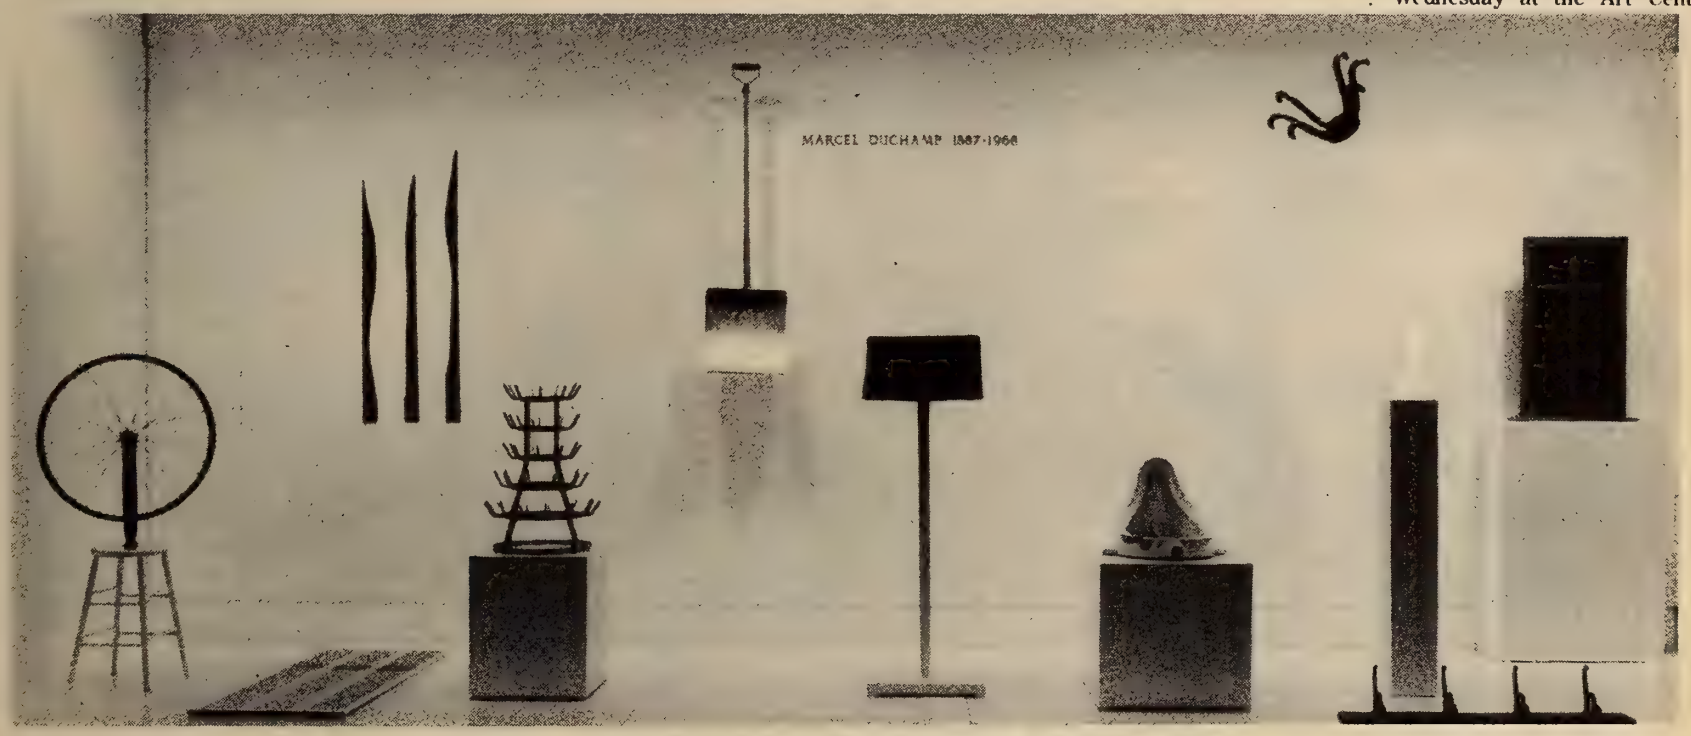
In New York in 1915 I bought at a hardware store a snow shovel on which I wrote "In Advance of the Broken Arm".

It was around that time that the word 'Ready-made' came to mind to designate this form of manifestation.

...I realized very soon the danger of repeating indiscriminately this form of expression and decided to limit the production of 'Readymades' to a small number yearly. I was aware at that time, that for the spectator even more than for the artist, Art is a habit forming drug, and I wanted to protect my 'Readymade' against such contamination."

Marcel Duchamp 1961

Now showing at the Agnes, a set of Duchamp's Readymades, belonging to the National Gallery of Canada, was first exhibited in Paris and New York between 1913 and 1921. Brydon Smith, Curator of Contemporary Art at the National Gallery of Canada, has assembled the show to portray the dadaist wit of Marcel Duchamp, and includes statements by the artist and other photographic documentation.



Initially, Duchamp was affiliated with the Puteaux Cubists, and his work also contained elements of Futurism. Duchamp's phenomenal sensitivity, his desire for personal freedom, and his diabolical paradoxical humour eventually led him to Dadaism. All of these eccentric exhibits, reflect the invention of taking a common object out of its customary setting and placing, it, verbally, visually and-or vicariously in a new and different setting. In an exhibition in the Bourgeois Gallery in New York in 1916, Duchamp insisted that his Readymades be unceremoniously hung on a coatrack near the door, and was delighted when they went unnoticed.

This will hardly be the case at the Agnes in the following weeks, as the Readymades are given the place of honour in the main gallery. Ironically, this defeats Duchamp's pleasure in an anti-art, but will definitely afford the viewer, with an open mind and a sense of humour, an opportunity to study the ideas of one of the most versatile artists of the twentieth century.

An interesting aspect of the spirit lying behind the Readymades can be found in the history of the work titled "Fountain". The Society of Independent Artists, which Duchamp had helped to found in New York, held an exhibition in 1917 in which any artist who paid the $6.00 fee was eligible to enter. There was no jury, and theoretically no restrictions. Duchamp, in order to test the reality of this artistic freedom, purchased a porcelain urinal, designated it "Fountain" and entered it in the show, under the name of "R. Mutt". When the work was indignantly refused, Duchamp defended it in an independent magazine; "The Blind Man", in which he effectively defended and articulated his philosophy of art. "Whether Mr. Mutt with his own hands made the fountain or not has no importance. He CHOSE it. He took an ordinary article of life, placed it so that its useful significance disappeared under a new title and point of view . . . (he) created a new thought for that object." In defense of the moral objections to his Readymades, Duchamp said that "the only works of art America has given us are her plumbing and her bridges." The Fountain is part of the collection of Readymades at the Art Centre, and it should be interesting to see if R. Mutt is still capable of the strong reactions he created in 1917.

As well as the group of Readymades and printed visual material, the show also offers a bonus for the ever-present connoisseur of erotica. A group of delightfully titillating drawings, are sensuously and sexily executed so to leave no doubt as to Duchamp's rendering skills, or his awareness of an art that is definitely not an anti-art. The tenderness, wantoness, softness, and sheer lustiness, that can all be found in these drawings, present a less publicized aspect of the artist's work, as well as the perfect foil to the Readymades.

This collection is highly recommended to any curious mind, and is guaranteed to provoke a reaction. For those who are interested in pursuing Duchamp and his Readymades, Brydon Smith will give an illustrated talk at 4:00 p.m. this Wednesday at the Art Centre.

Duchamp Installation by Marcel Duchamp, National Gallery of Canada

Fifty Years Bauhaus

Last Wednesday night, the Art Centre, in co-operation with the Goethe Institute, presented Dr. W. Herzogenrath, in a public lecture on the Bauhaus, 1919-1933. Dr. Herzogenrath is now the curator of the Folkwang Museum in Essen, Germany, and assisted in the assembly and cataloguing of the exhibition "50 Years Bauhaus", which was shown internationally, and which some of us had the pleasure of viewing in Toronto in 1969.

The Bauhaus was founded in Germany in 1919, and ended in that country in 1933 with the first German republic. It taught fine arts, crafts, design, theory, architecture and material arts, and lasted through a period of constant political change in Europe. Its members were dedicated to an open-minded approach, new innovations, freedom in creativity, and the service of the individual to humanity, society and democracy. In the words of Walter Gropius, the founder of the Bauhaus, in his 1919 manifesto: "let us create a new guild of craftsmen, without the class distinctions which raise an arrogant barrier between craftsman and artist. Together let us conceive and create the new building of the future, which will embrace architecture and sculpture and painting in one unity and which will rise one day towards heaven from the hands of a million workers like the crystal symbol of a new faith."

With this almost heroic idealism, the Bauhaus spent the next sixteen years going through periods of volatile creativity with dynamic results. Dr. Herzogenrath led us through its five major stages under the guidance of such renowned faculty members as Walter Gropius, Johannes Itten, Oskar Schlemmer, Paul Klee, Wassily Kandinsky, Marcel Breuer, Ludwig Mies Van der Rohe and many others. In spite of constant political pressure, the school functioned as an artistic community, and produced prototypes for such currently popular items as colour field paintings, minimal architecture, global lamps, lower-case lettering and poster design, functional design in kitchen utensils, high intensity reading lamps, one-piece stacking chairs, and cube-like furniture modules. Perhaps the most important contribution of the Bauhaus was their comprehensive method of education, which has since influenced theories and practice of art education today. The impact of the Bauhaus philosophy of combining "form and function" is just beginning to be realized in our society, thereby reactivating an interest in, and appreciation of the Bauhaus aesthetic.

This most likely explains the fact that Stirling Hall D was filled to capacity, although the lecture obviously did not come up to par with audience expectations. The language barrier presented a problem for Dr. Herzogenrath, and an overtired projectionist coaxing an indifferent projector, did not improve the situation. The lecture was informative, and the slides did add a visual dimension, but this Bauhaus devotee feels Dr. Herzogenrath could have saved us all some time by recommending a reading of his outstanding Bauhaus catalogue in lieu of the presentation.

Ah Ahk

by Sue Denim

The Ah Ahk Troupe of Korea presented a multi faceted spectrum of cultural modes in dance, music and song, last Friday evening, in the second of the Grant Hall series of concerts. Ah Ahk is from the National Classical Music Institute of Seoul, a school formed in the tenth century by King Yi Taejo and is maintained today by the Korean Government.

The programme began with a selection by the Wind Ensemble called Sujech'on, which means "long life is as everlasting as the sky". The musicians sat on the floor as they played music which was rather discordant to our ears initially, but it was fascinating to watch the graceful movements of their hands as they manipulated their instruments, and their costumes, long flowing gowns in gorgeous vivid colours provided a magnificent picture in itself.

Although the musical selections became more and more enjoyable to listen to as we became accustomed to them and as we could pick out the rhythms and melodies, the most exciting part of the evening was the dance.

The first one, a sitire on the aristocracy and the decadent Buddhist monks, was performed in masks and long flowing dresses. Surprizingly the movement of the dancers is not concentrated on leg movement but on the upper part of the body, the arms and the hands. Everything is delicate and calm, the ahnds and arms of the dancers moving gracefully and smoothly like flowers in the wind. Even the Farmer's Dance, which closed the first segment of the evening and which was a slight departure both in costume and mood from other selections, again emphasized arm and hand movement. This dance in its spontaneity and joyous celebration of the harvest feast coupled with the use of small drums by each of the eight dancers was one of the highlights of the evening and resembled in rhythm, a rock beat.

Another, the Nightingale Dance, featured a dancer wearing an elaborate costume of a Yi Dynasty courtesan, with long flowing multicoloured sleeves which concealed her hands and which she used to soften their movement. The dancer's movements were limited to a small area inside a flower patterned mat. This dance looked deceptively simple but the way in which she used those sleeves, the way she swayed so smoothly to the offstage accompaniment is in fact much more difficult than it appeared. As she flicked her hands the long sleeves gracefully fell back and forth in time to her steps. This delicacy encompassed the overall mood of the court dances performed.

The Sword Dance, which differed again and is said to commemorate a young soldier who died in a battle in the mid seventeenth century featured eight dancers using swords which gave a metallic rhythm to the performance and which as well, with their reflective quality gave again another visual image.

Another highlight was a folk dance, Seung Mu, in which the soloist performed a drum solo which best displayed the versatility of the troupe. Most of the sixteen musicians and dancers both play instruments and perform in some capacity in the dance numbers.

The Ah Ahk presentation was both a visual and auditory treat. There was almost no set, except the use of a large upright drum in some selections, but the costumes and the masks were more and more magnificient as the evening progressed.

It is almost impossible to discuss the quality of the music since it differs so completely in sound to the type of music to which we are accustomed.

However, Ah Ahk was both in its versatility and its oriental splendour, a fascinating spectacle and one which unless we are visiting Seoul, Korea, will probably never get another chance to see.

Slaughterhouse Five highly recommended

by Paul Gompertz

Two people on my left got up and walked out, while the girl sitting behind me muttered "Jeez, this is a stoopid movie." These reactions are in a way understandable. Not to have read Kurt Vonnegut's novel, on which the movie is pretty faithfully based, leaves the time scheme of the movie confusing and even annoying at first. But if you can accept the strange logic, then the power and precision of the action become compelling. The presentation is not random, even though it darts about with amazing frequency, for the three time threads themselves are all brought, with chronological fidelity, to a climax, which is revealing it is multiplicity.

This temporal logic is a concession to the audience, for as far as the hero is concerned, there is not time. Billy Pilgrim's vacillations between war-time Dresden, post-war suburbia and the planet Tralfariadore are all static and omnipresent moments in time. This is a Tralfariadorian philosophy, and it is applied to the action of the war and of suburban life in an attempt to make "extra-terrestrial" sense of it. Earth is the only planet with mistaken notions of free will, and the incompatibility between this notion and the horrors of war-time destruction is carefully delineated.

The main aim of the movie is to question the point of view of the audience, and to do so it makes use of a particle which relies for its effect upon juxtaposition, antithesis and counterpoint. It also contains many movie cliches which, because they are cliches, can anticipate the audience's reaction, and deliberately establish a tension between reaction and the original action upon which it is based. Thus the soldiers march through Dresden accompanied by scenes of architectural beauty, a stirring soundtrack of classical music, and the innocence of the local children, all prior to the annihilation of the city. Billy's wife's grief is viciously undercut by the hilarity of her driving, as the movie seeks to illustrate a sensibility which it does not espouse. Even the death of Billy's best friend Edgar is made faintly ridiculous; but the fact it is ridiculous amidst the destruction and the burning bodies is a comment on attituded rather than action. There is throughout a constant vacillation between the sublime and the ridiculous, as honesty is played off aginst "normality". There are no answers to the questions raised (unless you happen to be a forth dimensional Tralfariadorian), but the movie is nevertheless a powerful evocation of the strictives of human existence.

The acting is uniformaly good, and Michael Sacks, with the help of some excellent make-up, gives an impressive performance as Billy Pilgrim. In fact, the overall standard of the movie is very high. The direction is clever but always sensitive, and the filming and the sets are always convincing and even delightfully imaginative. At face value the movie may seem light, even frivolous on occasion. But this is a controlled and intended effect, and the fusion of all its elements gives Slaughterhouse Five an integrity which makes it a fascinating experience to be highly recommended.

What is Festival '73?

The Arts Festival is a yearly event which has become a winter-time tradition at Queen's. This four day long celebration from January 24 - 27 encompasses a display of student talent in various areas of the creative media whether it be films, music, crafts, drama, or art.

It has a two-fold purpose. It gives students the opportunity to share, participate and appreciate first as an audience and secondly as a performer, the talents which abound unknown on the Queen's campus. It provides the student with the opportunity to explore the multiple facets of today's artistic and musical experiences which he might not do so on his own. Financial support is available for such things as sound systems, film production and arts and craft materials.

During Festival there will be feature-length films, classical, folk, blues and jazz musicians performing, art displays and photographic exhibitions. Also, there will be craft demonstrations from members of the Kingston community. As well everyone will have the chance to dabble with different materials themselves as an outlet for their own creative "frustrations"!

Anyone interested in any of the above areas involved in Festival '73 or with advertising or graphics, please contact Hildi Adelhelm c-o the AMS Office or phone 542-1816.

Motherlove, again

by Paul Gompertz

This year's chronicles opened last Tuesday with a production of Stindberg's Motherlove: one can only wish that it hadn't. It's sole redeeming feature may prove to be that it provided a starting point from which things can only get better. If they don't. . .

This isn't the easiest play to perform, and it isn't the greatest when it is done well. But that doesn't explain the shambolic and lack-lustre nature of this production. Destructive criticism would only require a few pithy epithets such as flaccid, abject, disastrous, or pathetic, accompanied by a large wreath and a small well-wishers card saying "Rest in Peace". But it would still remain to ask what went wrong.

The performances of all four characters were uniformly flat and drab, though Carolyn Hetherington and Norma Edwards had more sheer technical virtuosity to fall back on. Nevertheless, both were completely bemused and lacked any faith or conviction in what they were doing. Both went through their parts mechanically, and Norma Edwards, who had the more demanding and varied part, was forced to resort to acting by role, stringing together a series of desperate stock responses which were painfully transparent.

Ildi Palasty and Debbie Poole have both developed bad and annoying acting habits. The former talks too fast, and as a result too montonously, and is awkward with her hands which she holds clenched in a hostile attitude most of the time. The latter tries to add dramatic emphasis to what she is saying by leaning towards the person she is talking to, and although this at times gave her an appropriately abject and beaten air, it was so persistent as to become awkward.

Not only were the individual performances exceedingly weak, but there was no interaction between the characters other than demanded verbally by the script. All four looked as if they had been rehearsed in separate rooms and had been brought together as a special concession to opening night. Any active responses they made (horror, surprise, resignation) were awkward and vacuous because no matter how appropriate they were, they simply came mechanically on cue, and did not emanate from the ethos of the action.

Much of the blame must lie with the director, Peter Lichtenfels, for bad acting habits and phoney reactions should never be allowed to persist. His direction was only evident negatively -- both in the things he shouldn't have allowed to happen, and in the things he simply didn't do. There was no organization of movements, no control of pace, no attempt to blend the elements into any sort of cohesive whole. In short, the direction was conspicuous only by its absence.

It is not surprising, in the face of all this, that the play also lacked feeling and conviction. The actors simply did not know what they were trying to do, and even a far greater degree of technical and formal control would not ultimately have saved this production from being flat and colourless. The play was part-way up a blind alley, and only a completely fresh start could have given it any chance of getting anywhere.

World: US backs out of Monday peace signing

WASHINGTON — The United States has announced that it will not sign a previously agreed upon treaty to end the war in Vietnam today as was previously planned. Difficulty in getting President Thieu in Saigon to go along was sited as a major factor for the decision.

The Nixon Administration was caught by surprise when a Hanoi radio broadcast outlined the treaty that was agreed upon and stated that the American government had agreed to sign on October 31.

President Nguyen Van Thieu of South Vietnam is still holding out, insisting that he must also sign any treaty for the war to end.

The United States called for a new set of negotiations before the treaty is signed. Hanoi has accused them of bad faith and claimed that they had put off the signing three times now. North Vietnam now claims that there will be no further talks unless the United States signs the nine point peace proposal.

The points of the proposal include a ceasefire within twenty-four hours of signing, a complete withdrawal of U.S. troops within sixty days, a reciprocal exchange of prisoners, free democratic elections under international supervision with no American interference of any kind, a step by step peaceful reunification of Vietnam, and an international peacekeeping force.

LONDON — The British pound sterling has continued a four day decline and is reaching record lows causing chaos in the major world money markets and weakening other currencies' positions.

The pound was unpegged at a value of $2.60 last June and since fell to around $2.40. During the past week it has fallen eight cents to $2.32

The Bank of England is reported to be intervening with support buying and Prime Minister Edward Heath has called for emergency talks to deal with the deteriorating situation.

Support has also been given by the Bank of Japan whose own currency has been strengthened by the downward pressure on the pound. They bought over $35 million in pounds on the Tokyo market.

The Paris exchange market is in a state of chaos as the French franc is weakening against the United States dollar which is gaining strength with the peace talk hopes and the devaluation of the British pound.

The possibility that more key currencies will be allowed to float in response to this revaluation pressure could jeopardize the complex system of exchange rates worked out by the International Monetary Fund last December and touch off another world monetary crisis.

COTONOU, DAHOMEY — This small west African republic was faced with its fifth major coup since it gained independence from France in 1960.

The Army seized power last week, headed by paratroop Major Mathieu Kerekou, deputy chief of the armed forces and a leading figure in the 1967 coup.

The ousted President, Justine Ahomadegbe Tometin was a former French Army sergeant.

PEKING — The Chinese government is nearing completion of a vast system of underground bomb shelters beneath Peking and other major cities. These shelters are designed to allow maximum protection for the entire population of the cities, in Peking's case 4,000,000 people, in the event of a nuclear or conventional arms attack.

Every public place of importance, including schools, restaurants and theatres have entrances to the shelters which sit twenty-six feet below street level.

WELLINGTON, NEW ZEALAND — This country will be going to the polls on November 25 to choose between a National Party and a Labour Party government. These two parties, according to polls have an equal chance of winning.

Sir Kieth Holyoakes' long lived National government rule ended last year with his resignation after eleven years as the country's Prime Minister. The new party leader is John Marshall.

SANTIAGO, CHILE — Renewed distrubances rocked the capital as Chile enters its third week of general strikes in protest to President Allende's socialist policies. Santiago businessmen blocked intersections in the heart of the capital's business section. Allende is presently meeting with strike leaders to attempt to end the protests which during the two week period cost Chile $100 million.

KAMPALA — The United Nations has established a centre in Uganda to assist expatriated Uganda Asians in obtaining vital documents and in making travel arrangements as the November 8 deadline for their emigration approaches.

An estimate has claimed that there are 2,000 to 5,000 Asians who cannot find any country to accept them.

Uganda President Amin has also ordered a broadening of those to be expulsed to any person of Indian, Pakistan and Bangladesh origin, notwithstanding their present citizenship.

Looking About

The Revolving door

The following are shorts, both absurd and disheartening.

The President of San Marino recently visited China. After a state dinner, equal in size and effusiveness to President Nixon's earlier this year, Signor Chironzi assured China that San Marino would remain neutral. The Chinese foreign minister said San Marino's neutrality and struggle against agression would be supported. Such are the Lilliputian niceties of the diplomatic game.

As reported in the Globe, here is what Dr. Roger Payne said in a BBC radio programme. "Humped-backed whales change their song each year. The songs we played last time I was here were recorded in about 1963 or 1964, but since then the song has been changing each year. . . . .And I frankly agree that the ones sung in the Sixties were more beautiful than the ones which are sung right now."

Last week, Prime Minister Heath of Britain introduced to Parliament a white paper on the Commonwealth and immigration. The policy advocated was to eliminate all the present rights and privileges of Commonwealth citizens existing in British law. Henceforth all are to be treated as aliens, the rights and privileges formerly enjoyed being transfered to citizens of the Common Market. So much for the Commonwealth.

Dunning Trust

Last weeks Dunning Trust lectures ended with an entertaining and thoughtful speech, given in Grant Hall by Dr. McHarg. At times, his illustration of Man's relationship with his environment was almost poetic. The allegory of the little girl in the conservatory, where all nature is reproduced, illustrates again the theme of the fall from innocence. However, this girl comes to understand that the human attempt to impose form in the worl contains its' own failure. Therefore, she understands that Man must live as a child in nature.

What I found discouraging in the talks of these distinguished men was their lack of action taken in view of a clearly discerned replacement to the unreponsive technological society they spoke of.

Claim prison badly administered

Canada: Millhaven guards protest new rules

KINGSTON — At least half of the guards on day duty at Millhaven Penitentiary booked off sick last week. They were protesting the permissive measures which the Canadian government has been instituting for penal reform without improving prison security and working conditions.

All but twenty-five of two hundred employees are participating in the protest, leaving as few as ten to fifteen guards on the shifts to handle 365 prisoners. Supervisory personnel are working double shifts.

The demonstration comes in response to director of prisons Paul Faguy's orders to permit prisoners to move freely within their living units from 6 pm to 11 pm. The guards are also complaining that Millhaven is badly built and that it is easy to escape from, and that it is badly administered.

OTTAWA — Foreign Affairs Minister Mitchell Sharp announced that Canada may be called upon to act as peacekeeper in Vietnam if the treaty is signed. A senior official in the department stated that while Canada was willing to perform the function it was not eager. He sited the eighteen years of frustration as a member of the now defunct International Controls Commission in Vietnam as a major factor.

TORONTO — Bell Canada has announced that it wants to stretch the Toronto centred local calling area west to Oakville, east to Pickering and north to Bolton and Stouffville with a correspondingly higher monthly charge.

The new system, Bell claims, would increase the number of telephones within local calling range from Stouffville from 20,000 to 1,000,000 and that their present rate would accordingly be increased from the present $4.80 to $8.00. The proposal is now contingent to approval from the Canadian Transport Commission.

KINGSTON — The Royal Canadian Horse Artillery Brigade Association and William Teron have resolved their land dispute and Teron will be able to proceed with his $30 million residential and commercial complex on the Kingston waterfront.

The RCHA were given the adjoining property to their present club quarters as well as a sum of money for the property demanded by Teron. The agreement put an end to three years of controvercy over the project which also resulted from its by-passing of several city by-laws. All that now remains is submission of the building plans for municipal approval.

TORONTO — Thirty Metro Toronto area candidates in yesterday's election indicated dissatisfaction with their respective parties' policies regarding foreign ownership of Canadian industry last week when they joined the Committee for an Independent Canada.

Those joining included fifteen Progressive Conservatives, seven New Democratic Party candidates, seven Liberals and one Independent. The CIC's position on the subject is that Canadian ownership is more likely to produce more and better jobs, a better standard of living and lower taxes.

EDMONTON — Former Premier of Alberta Harry Strom has announced that he plans to retire from the leadership of the Social Credit Party which now forms the Official Opposition in the Alberta legislature. First elected to the Legislature in 1955, Strom became leader of the Socreds after Premier E. C. Manning announced his retirement in December 1968.

Five running for rector; Queen's votes down OFS demonstration, as AMS fights itself

During one of the longest meetings in recent AMS history, outer council discussed the rectorship, student entrepreneurs, and a miscellaneous list of OFS recommendations.

Nominations for rector were received on behalf of Brian Copeland, Peter Crickmore, Victoria Kemseley, Gary Gannage and Eric Salsbury. This election is to occur on November 21.

Tempers flaired when ASUS president Ted Cape moved that candidates be requested not to post any leaflets, posters or flyers. He said, "we must prevent this from degenerating into a neanderthal poster competition".

The present rector, Alan Broadbent pointed out that, "seeing as it is an election, it would not be wise to set up restraints."

Services Commissioner Andy Pipe agreed that formal stipulations of this kind should not be made but suggested that members of the AMS "speak to the candidates in good faith and work out ground rules for the campaign".

Lyne Whitham, External Affairs Commissioner proposed a watered down version of the motion. She said, "we should suggest to the candidates that they not indulge in poster warfare".

This precipitated a report from Education Commissioner Ross Dunsmore who accused council of adopting a "goddamn paternal attitude".

Pipe then stated that, "we must trust the candidates to decide for themselves and realize that the electorate may take a dim view of a poster campaign anyway."

"There is a qualitative difference between flashy posters and informative flyers", Kiloran German, WRC president pointed out.

All agreed that the campus must be aware of the serious nature of the rectorship. Cape's motion was finally defeated after more backstabbing.

Vice President Wally Palmer introduced the subject of student entrepreneurs who request permission to organize events for their own profit. He asked council to make some policy statement on this matter.

Dunsmore outlined his proposal for a licensing scheme which would enable the AMS to retain control over these people. He also suggested that a percentage of profits be taken as licensing fee.

Allan Cruess, Junior Meds rep said, "we should support individuals who have the energy and the initiative to do this but we must review the types of activities that are organized."

Several council members expressed concern that students activities not become mere individual profit motivated efforts.

The subject was then passed on to a group of outer council members for study.

AMS was asked to vote on what Miss Whitham labeled "an utterly ridiculous list of OFS recommendations" concerning an anti qar demonstration, National Abortion Day and 10 other demands.

Cape moved that these motions be tabled because he considered them inappropriate at this time. "After the immediate problem of fees has been dealt with we can worry about what sort of role the OFS should paly in society," he said.

Palmer argued that by tabling the motion "we will be abstaining and soon the OFS wlill be coming out with all sorts of such legislation."

"Wishy washy liberals - that's exactly how we'd appear in the OFS if we tabled this" Pipe commented and added "it is irresponsible to dismiss these items."

When the motion to table was defeated Cape suggested that the AMS register a no vote along with a memo commenting that it is outside the immediate concern of the OFS until the fee issue has been settled.

Steve Brereton, IRC chairman pointed out that "outside groups have supported us, yet we turn around and say we're not concerned with them."

In reply to Miss Whitham's claim that the demise of the national student organization (CUS) was based on motions such as these, Pipe retorted "the demise of CUS resulted because councils such as ours washed our hands on these issues and wouldn't take a stand."

The motion to attach a qualifying memo was passed, and later recinded after some members objected that the memo would be "putting words in member's mouths" concerning their voting rational. A letter will be sent to the OFS expressing Queen's' position that the OFS should not conern itself with worldly problems, just yet.

A great deal of attention was given to an OFS motion calling a demonstration at Queen's Park to protest the fee increase and educational cutbacks.

Miss Whitham was vehemently opposed to the demonstration because "it will alienate the public." She also indicated that those schools who were advocating the demonstration did not have a mandate to do so. After further deliberations, outer council unanimously defeated the motion to hold a demonstration.

After working its way through a number of other OFS motions, the quorum was challenged in the middle of debate on an OFS motion regarding strikebreaking. There were fifteen members present. The meeting was ended.

Western will penalize fee strikers

University of Western Ontario (CUP). Western is the first Ontario University to publicly adknowledge that students will be penalized for participating in a second term fee strike.

University president Carleton Williams announced to last Friday's senate meeting that students witholding fees in January as proposed by the OFS and approved by the province-wide referendum in October, would suffer "academic penalty".

Although vice president of finance A. K. Adlington has stated that the sanctions would go only as far as witholding transcripts, student leaders fear the psychological affect on hesitant students may seriously affect support for a possible fee strike. Academic sanctions could extend to expelling a student from university. Tuesday, Williams denied rumours that COU (the Council of Ontario Universities) plans to advocate witholding students' second installment OSAP cheques pending full payment of their fees.

In addition Williams complained that the universities "have no defenses" against either the government's unilateral fee boost or the students' strike threat. He said the university's position was like "the ham in the sandwich. This is not a problem of the university's choosing - they're the body that stands to lose". He estimated that more than two million dollars will be involved if all the students who have not yet paid their second fee installment withhold it in January.

Williams claimed that the fee increase has been carefully discussed and that although the loan portion of AOSAP has increased, "it is still a bargain". Other provinces do not contribute any funds to the federal awards programme and students just receive loans of up to $1400 peryear.

Adlington said that a fee strike would cause even greater problems than normal this year because of the university's defecit budget. He explained that not only would the university lose interest on the funds, but that they might even have to borrow money to meet current expenses.

"Are students going to fight the government until the last university" Williams asked. He concluded that it was about time that students started thinking about that aspect of the situation.

Student leaders have conceeded that the university is in a poor position, but that the only weapon they have in their dispute with the government is the witholding of fees.

Meszaros to sue immigration authorities

DOWNSVIEW (CUP) — Istvan Meszaros, the Marxist scholar hired by York University and now charged with illegal entry to Canada is suing Zavie Levine, assistant to immigration minister Bryce Mackasey.

Levine was quoted in the Globe and Mail as having said "this is no golden-haired boy" in answer to a question as to why the federal government had refused Meszaros' application for an entry visa. There are unsubstantiated rumours that Meszaros is a spy for the KGB.

"Such a remark is highly slanderous and I intend to prosecute," Meszaros said Oct. 25.

The Hungarian-born professor was rejected by Canadian authorities when he applied for landed immigrant status last June, after accepting a teaching post at York University.

The immigration board inquiry to determine whether or not Meszaros is legally in the country began Tuesday, Oct. 24, at which time it was adjourned until Oct. 31. The immigration department, if it can prove that Mexzaros did enter the country illegally, could begin actions to have the professor deported.

Meszaros entered the country on Sept. 19, unknown to York and government officials. On Sept. 22, Mackasey made his review decision known--the answer was no, and a telegram to that effect was ent to Meszaros' home in Brighton, England from York dean of arts John Sayweli.

Subsequently, Mackasey offered Meszaros a one-year certificate to stay in Canada. Mexaros refused on the grounds that it did not clear his name.

Since then, Mackasey has said he would review the case one more time--on condition that Meszaros return to England first. Meszaros has again refused, stating that if he left the country, he would lose his recourse to appeal.

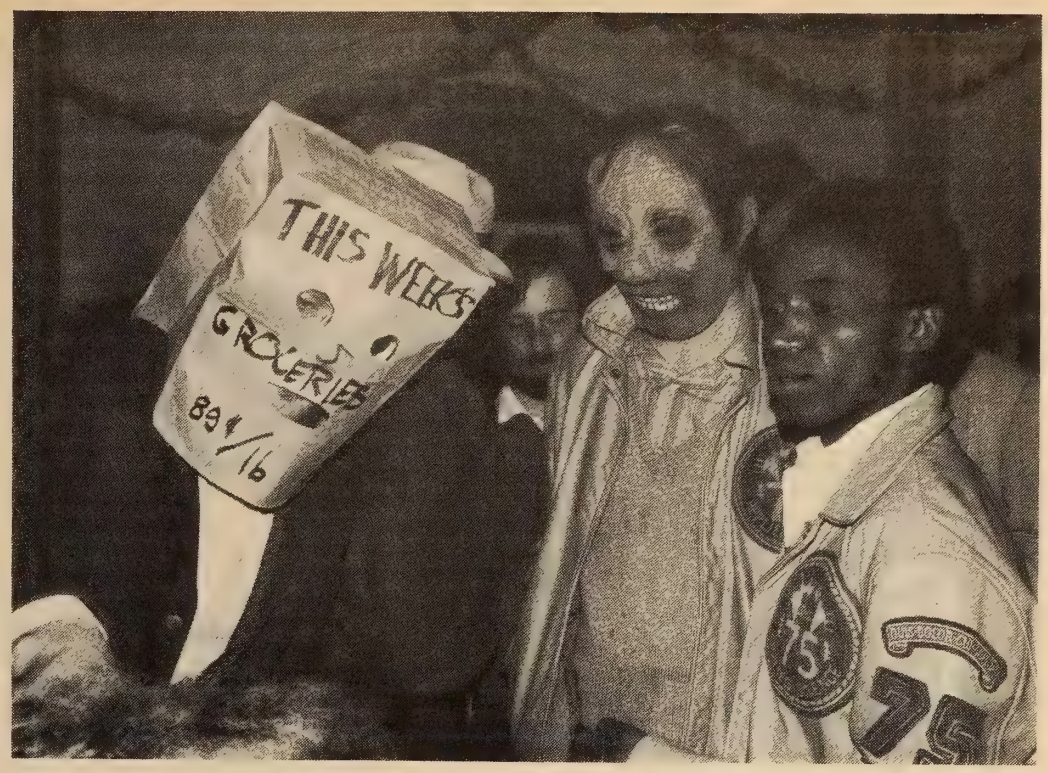
Evaluation programs in professional schools

by Bob Wood



Despite a largely standized curriculum, the professional schools at Queen's have fairly active evaluation programs. Students in the Medical Faculty are pressing for change in examinations and in general presentation of their courses, and the Engineering Faculty will soon be under examinations and in general presentation of their courses, and the Engineering Faculty will soon be under examination by the Engineering Advisory Council.

Widespread disatisfaction, among meds students, with the ranking and A, B, C method of evaluation was shown in a survey taken a year ago. Only 17.5 per cent of the medical students were satisfied with the present system; 50.6 per cent would prefer a pass, fail, honours system. Sarah Prichard, a fourth year Medical student, estimated that this attitude is even more pronounced now. She was co-organizer of a student-faculty retreat held recently at which this and other issues were discussed. Although very willing to listen to student views, faculty was hesitant about a different marking system since it is used to separate the very good students from the poor ones, assuring help for a spur to those who need it. At present more than 50 per cent of Canadian medical schools are using the pass-fail system.

Recommendations were also suggested to co-ordinate the teaching program. Departments now set separate exams on their own particular part of the basic or clinical sciences and students claim that many interrelated aspects between them are poorly covered. They called for the departments to co-ordinate their teaching and set comprehensive exams that would realistically test these areas.

The introduction to the Education Students' Society "A Student Guide" said, "Evaluation is both necessary and desirable for studnets at a university; an unexamined life is precisely what they are learning to avoid." Dr. Uffen, Dean of the Engineering Faculty, said this was "of paramount importance" in his school while Dr. Waugh, Dean of the Medical Faculty, pointed out that criticism must be constructive and fairly presented to achieve student objectives. A real trap in student course evaluation, Dr. Waugh added, was that it could degenerate into a popularity contest.

Dr. Uffen receives the "unfiltered views" of the engineering students from a writeen brief submitted by the Engineering Advisory Council. This group of 35 practising engineers spends three days per year talking with students and evaluating the performance of the faculty.

Canadian research scene questioned

OTTAWA (CUP) — The study Commissioned by the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada (AUCC) to formulate a university research policy appears to be little more than a public relations job for the present mess in the Canadian research scene.

The report submitted to the AUCC convention held in Toronto NWednesday and Thursday, claims that undergraduate teaching is the primary function of the university. Although research could be done elsewhere, only universities can transmit "the knowledge and traditions inherited from the past". The report appears to be prepared in defense of the present research establishment in universities.

Although one part of the document says basic research is not essential to undergraduate teaching it also recommends that the universities are best suited to conducting basic research.

The most important recommendation calls for the establishment of "centres of excellence" across the country. These centres would specialize in areas of research to develop "first class research competence".

Final Wright report

TORONTO (CUP) — The final report of the Wright Commission on Post Secondary Education in Ontario will have few changes from the draft report on the subject of university financing, the Varsity (student newspaper at U. of T.) has learned.

The Commission still advocates "awards large enough to pay the student's tuition fees and to provide his maintenance while at school". The final report restricts eligible students to those whose parents earn up to a maximum of $15,000 a year (by 1972 standards).

It also recommends that the loan be forgiven only after 30 years instead of the 15 called for in the draft report.

Government to pay expenses

Students hired by federal government departments and agencies next year for career-oriented summer employment will be reimbursed for their actual and reasonable round-trip transportation expenses incurred while travelling from educational centres to their work location, provided they plan to resume their studies following summer employment. Previous policy had included a $30 deductible clause on round-trip transportation, with the students being required to pay the first $15 for each one-way fare.

Coming into effect Jan. 1, 1973, the new policy applies to work assignments which use or compliment the student's academic training, as a means of introducing the students to the prospect of careers in the Public Service of Canada.

The policy also provides that students at educational centres located outside of Canada who accept career-oriented summer ejmployment with the federal government can be compensated for actual transportation expenses up to the equivalent of the standard rail fare between Ottawa and Victoria, B.C. Previously, such students were reimbursed for only the transportation cost from the port of entry to their work location.

International Affairs Committee

by Ted Pidgeon

The International Affairs Committe offers a wide range of activities for those interested in international issues - especially those issues concerning developing nations. Its future events, be they seminars, discussions, slide shows, or debates are open to all. People can keep themselves posted of these events by either checking with "Ten Days" in the Journal, or inquiry at the International Centre Office.

If anyone has had, or is willing to gain experience in co-ordinating such activites, they are welcome to contact the International Centre or myself as the Queen's CUSO representative.

The resources of the Committee are quite substancial. We have liason with many organizations which are specifically concerned with development issues. CUSO and the World University Services Committee (WUSC) are a few which are able to provide good films and informed speakers.

For the immediate future, returned WUSC students are going to relate their experiences this past summer in Peru at an upcoming meeting. There is a series of seminars on development under consideration, and one of the members is quite entusiastic about a "cross cultural" weekend. This latter project would involve a number of students and staff of different ethnic backgrounds in a retreat in which there will be variety of fairly intense discussions.

Finally as a note: as the present CUSO representative is graduating this year, there is a need for someone to take his place next year. If interested, please leave your name at the International Centre.

The teams entered in the tournament this weekend are from Toronto, York, Waterloo, McMaster, Guelph, Ottawa, Carleton and Queen's. This tournamnet is a pre-season affair and the regular season which consists of home and home series will not begin until later this month. The season winds up with the OWIAA championships in February at the University of Waterloo. The OWIAA volleyball title was won last year by Western.

Conservatives 109, Liberals 108

Election seasaw finally ends in Conservative win

by Bob Mutrie

Monday night was the scene of a seesaw battle between the Liberals and Conservatives which ultimately resulted in a Conservative win, but only after a serious doubt had been cast on it by the early returns, especially from Quebec and the Maritimes. Ontario marked the beginning of the tide which was ultimately to result in a Conservative victory as the returns moved farther west. After Alberta more than boosted the Conservative party's chances, the fate of the government was in the hands of the British Columbia electorate where many close battles were fought before the Conservatives were finally elected.

With all the returns finally in the Conservatives hold 109 seats, the Liberals 108, the New Democratic Party 30, the Social Credit 15 and Independents two.

In the Maritimes it became readily apparent that the Conservatives were losing ground this election, when they lost four seats to the Liberals: two in Newfoundland, and one each in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. Both parties managed to maintain their previously held seats in New Brunswick. The New Democratic Party made only a poor showing in the two ridings where they felt that they had a chance.

Quebec went almost solidly Liberal and Social Credit, the Conservatives only managing to hold onto two of their four seats. Fifty-six seats went to the Liberals, ultimately representing over one-half of their parliamentary seats.

As results began flooding in from Ontario, it became apparent that the Liberals had lost the momentum they had gained in the eastern provinces, caught up in close and bitter battles from the Conservatives. The latter party swept through eastern Ontario and made important gains in the Metro Toronto area. Winning 64 of the 88 seats in Ontario in 1968, the Liberals managed to escape this time with only 35. The Conservatives swept traditionally Liberal ridings and managed to come up from the 17 seats held in the 1968 election to 41.

The NDP also showed strong gains in the popular vote and pulled four new seats from Liberal control, bringing their Ontario holdings to eleven seats. There was a strong reversal trend in the Ottawa area over the bilingualism issue which sent many seats over to the Conservatives.

However, even with the Ontario victory for the Conservatives, it was still expected that with their important eastern gains, the Liberals would form a minority government, but as the election returns moved farther and farther west the fate of the Trudeau government became increasingly doubtful.

The Conservatives won eight of Manitoba's thirteen seats, three more than in 1968 while the Liberals were knocked back to two. The province was expected to go strongly New Democrat but surprisingly, the party only held steady with three seats.

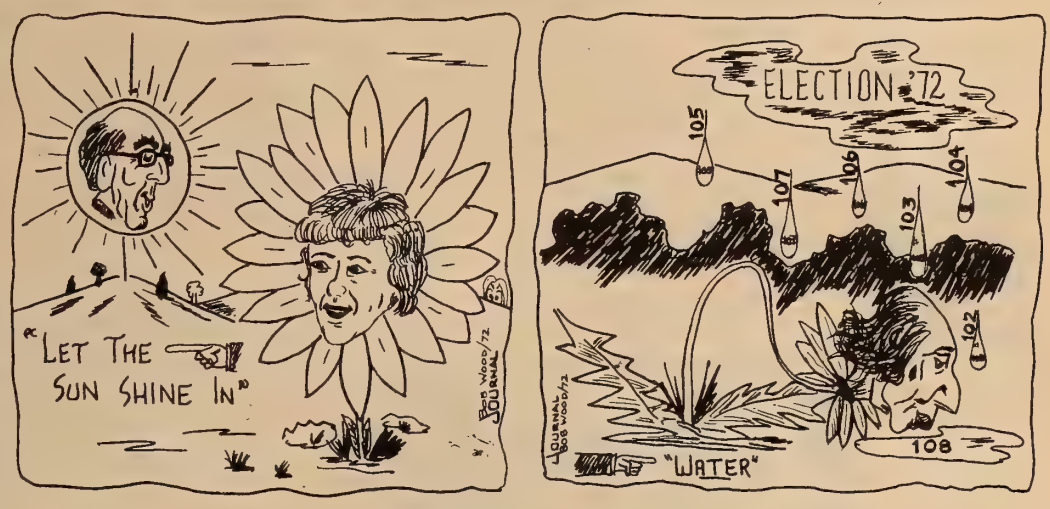
In Saskatchewan, there were again extensive Conservative gains and both the NDP and the Liberals recorded losses.

Alberta ultimately restored Tory hopes and was the province to put them in a possible winning position as all nineteen of their seats elected Conservative MP's. The Northwest Territories elected another Conservative.

The real seasawing began as the returns from British Columbia began to arrive. The elected and leading totals started swinging wildly between 106 and 111 for the Liberals and 100 and 108 for the Conservatives.

The Liberals finally elected four members in the province, the Conservatives, 8 and the NDP 11. No one knew who actually had won the election until the next morning when the late polls finally were counted. The Conservatives had snatched two more from the NDP in these results to put them one ahead of the Liberals.

With 97.8 per cent of the votes counted, the Liberals had 38.3 per cent, the Conservatives 35.2 per cent, the New Democratic Party 17.8 per cent, the Social Credit 7.5 per cent and the Independents 1.2 per cent.



Among those returned for the Liberals were Gerard Pelletier, Jean Marchand, Jean Pierre Goyer, Jean Chretien, Bryce Mackasey, Charles Drury, Don Jamieson and James Richardson. Trade Minister Jean-Luc Pepin, Labour Minister Martin O'Connell, Agricultural Minister H.A. Olsen, and Minister of State Pat Mahoney were defeated in their ridings.

When it became apparent that the Conservatives were close to winning Monday night, Conservative Party Leader Robert Stanfield stated that he was ready to form a government but that he felt it was too soon to make any definitive statements.

In Ottawa, Mr. Trudeau stated that it is too early yet and that he would also wait for more complete returns before making any comment.

New Democratic Party Leader David Lewis who, with a block of thirty seats now holds the balance of power, was ecstatic as the results came in. However, he stated that he would support a minority government if it deals with unemployment, high living costs and "corporate ripoff".

Social Credit Leader, Real Caouette, whose party is now entirely Quebec based, stated that he would support either the Liberals or Conservatives. He pointed out that whoever forms the government, they would have to compose with the Social Credit Party. Social Credit showed important gains in popularity in Quebec and ended in second place in 32 ridings in the province, ten of them on Montreal Island, where traditionally they have been third or fourth.

MacDonald sweeps Kingston polls

Flora MacDonald was elected in Kingston and the Islands in a landslide victory unprecedented in this traditionally Liberal Riding. She was returned with a total of 22,820 votes to Liberal John Hazlett's 14,094 and New Democratic Party candidate Lars Thompson's 5,848. It is Hazlett's second defeat in this riding in just over a year.

MacDonald toppled that was for a long time solid Liberal stronghold and her decisive sweep left even her surprised. In less than forty minutes after the polls had closed she had gained a five thousand vote majority.

One hour after the polls' closing, Lars Thompson conceded defeat, but claimed a personal victory for the New Democratic Party for polling more votes in the riding than ever before.

At nine o'clock, just two hours after the polls closed MacDonald was already outlining her basic plans in an interview. First on her agenda will be "town hall meetings, radio open-line shows, and extensive use of cable television to reach people", she said.

"Being a politician means being in touch with people. That's been my platform and that's what I intend to keep doing", she said. MacDonald also stated that she will continue to live in Kingston and commute to and from Ottawa.

MacDonald was involved indirectly in twenty-nine elections while she was in Nova Scotia and was a driving force behind Stanfield's victory as Premier in Nova Scotia in 1956.

She came to Kingston in 1967 and took a position as administrative officer at Queen's. She has been extensively involved in local affairs here.

MacDonald was elected only by a narrow margin in the four Queen's polls. She received 380 votes to Hazlett's 359 and Thompson's 101.

Eastern Ontario is presenting a solid Conservative front along Lake Ontario and the St. Lawrence River with eight ridings in the area returning MP's of that party.

In Hastings Riding, P.C. Jack Ellis, a former mayor of Belleville was returned by over a 5,000 vote majority.

In Lanark-Renfrew Paul Dick captured the seat formerly held by Liberal Murray McBride for the Conservative Party with a plurality of over 4,000.

Walter Baker of the Conservative Party defeated Liberal Gordon Blair in Grenville-Carleton primarilly on a protest vote over the issue of bilingualism.

In Frontenac, Lennox and Addington, A. Doug Alkenbrack gained his sixth election victory on a stand on increased prison security.

Former Conservative Trade Minister George Hees will be representing Prince Edward Hastings Riding after sweeping every poll in his riding.

In Leeds P.C. Tom Cossitt swept to victory with a plurality of over 7,000 votes. He was the former president of the Leeds Liberal Associations but resigned after a disagreement with Trudeau.

Concert fund boondogle

Dear Editor,

Queen's students do you know who is administering your concert money?

The AMS Concert Committee reps appointed by your faculties, you say.

No, contrary to popular belief and to the AMS By-Law 3, Section 9, representatives nominated from each faculty to sit on the Concert Committee in order to manage and administer the AMS Concert Fund" are now simply going to "function as a policy body to determine such matters as the total number of concerts to hold; when they occur; the type of entertainment that will be involved (rock, folk, jazz, or classical); and the amount of money to be allocated to each concert." Who is going to administer the Concert Fund?

"An administrative committee will absorb the responsibilities of organizing and presenting each concert." Members of this committee will "be hired by the concert committee chairman and paid the salaries indicated below."

Who are these individuals? Ask your nearest Concert Committee Chairman.

Are these members of the new "Administrative Committee" nominated by representative faculties or appointed by the AMS Outer Council. NO.

What are their salaries?

Promotion:	$30 per concert
Technical:	$40"
House manager:	$10"
Finance:	$15"
Chairman:	$25"

Are these jobs going to be advertized?

Who knows? Do you need any extra cash.

Isn't it wonderful what disregarding a Constitution and its amending procedure can do for one's moral and pocket book.

Clever bunch on that Concert Committee -- there wasn't one peep from anyone at the Outer Council Meeting.

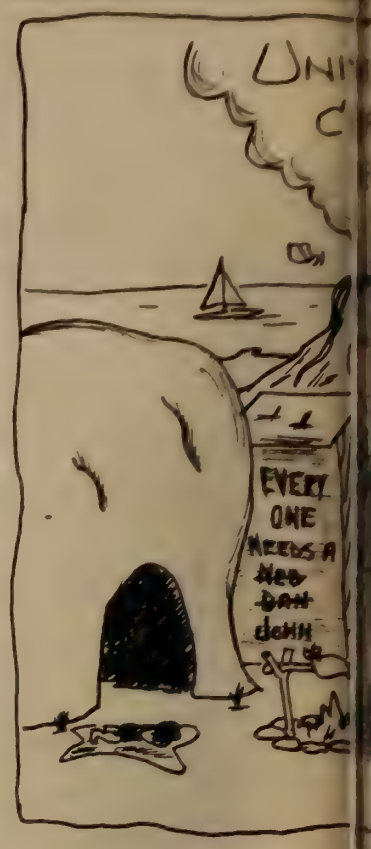
ED NOTE: The matter to which Mrs. Merrick refers was contained in a document circulated at Wednesday's AMS meeting, which said that the concert committee would be an advisory committee, and that the actual administration of the concerts would be done by a paid group of administrators. There was no vote, and no one seems to know if the proposals were presented as information on a fait accomplie, or as proposals to be approved.

Turner replys

Dear Editor,



This letter is being written with respect to "Arts Orientation Committee Chosen" (Journal, Oct. 31, 1972). I feel strongly that a few points brought up in the article be clarified.

First of all, the "constitutional move" that occured during the meeting took place on the second ballot. Three members (2 female and 1 male) were elected to the committee after the first ballot – a three way tie. On the second ballot, apparently all remaining male applicants were eliminated. The feeling at that time was that there should be more than one male on the (Orientation 73) Committee. In order to remedy the situation a constitutional change was effected invalidating the second ballot. The question of ethics occurs because the winner of that ballot (who was therefore the fourth member of the Committee) would have to run again (that person is none the less still on the Committee). As a result, the THREE remaining candidates were selected after the constitutional change - and not just myself, which, I feel, is intimated in the Journal article.

My second point stems from Kathy McSweeny's comment that the appointment was an "added burden" in light of my present responsibilities as AMS rep at large.

I personally feel that I can handle the two commitments. If I had felt otherwise I would never have applied to be a member of the Orientation 73 Committee. I would als like to point out that Kathy hersel while she was co-ordinator of th Orientation 71 Committee and AM rep managed to perform all fun tions quite satisfactorily.

Let's build the medieval village

At the open meeting of the University Centre User's Committee several students and faculty members challenged the concept of a single large university centre. Serious problems were pointed out in relation to this proposed new university "living room."

Fiscal restraints on the project must be considered. If we place all our eggs in one basket there will not be enough money remaining to develop smaller centres at other locations on campus. It is evident that much of the present union will become dead space. Vice Principal (Administration) Russell Kennedy pointed out that a number of rooms have not been used since the building was opened. Surely we can not afford to waste space in the face of the university's already declining financial resources.

Documented evidence from other schools indicates that the large community center approach is not a viable solution and will not provide adequate facilities and meeting places.

The present Union was built with the same principles in mind as the proposed centre - it didn't work. We must learn from these mistak and explore the alternatives.

A vague proposal by the User's Committee f subcentres met with some enthusiasm. Politi professor Ned Franks favoured the creation of "medieval village" through the establishment mini unions scattered around the campus. Ma students are isolated in various areas of t university by choice or because of their timetab restrictions. Subcentres in these areas would doubt have a much better drawing power than large complex.

Many students complain of the inadequa facilities in the union. We suggest that a ministrative and student offices now in the uni could be moved to the Arts and Science building 131 Union which is soon to be vacated. Significa renovations in the union can be made to provi more attractive and adequate accommodatio for other services. Our remaining resources a energies would be well spent developing su centres. We want no more university "livi rooms." Let's build the "medieval village."

first time voter in a federal n, and an otherwise proud er of the Kingston com- , I can only wish that I could een better impressed by the e at the polling stations. They t least pretend to know what ties were. I don't suppose I ally the first voter to arrive, so heaven help the ones before me, for by 8:25 a.m. the little old ladies doting on their printed lists had still to make a conscious effort to come awake.

The significant point though, as I saunter by each of their tables simply showing them which line they were supposed to be stroking out, was that no one there really knew (or had cared to validate) who I really was. I mean, normally random opinions would hardly even set me as being at the eligible age, to begin with. So there I was with my hand near my wallet, ready to produce scads of cards that might in unison be able to grant me, my own great opportunity to exercise a personal democratic right.

Needless to say, the climax of all one's concern and effort over the past few hectic weeks, the individual's constant reassessment of the person he had finally decided upon for representation -- suddenly slaps him in the face, and he realizes that it's just another farce.

And this is hardly the only occasion on which the individual's intelligence has been so distinctly insulted, especially over the weeks of pre-election campaigning.

Boorish announcer

Dear Editor,

On October 21 I was in Kingston and attended the inglorious football game between Queen's and Varsity. In addition to the sad spectable of the game itself, the occasion was marred by the loutish behaviour of the public address announcer at half-time. This boorish ass, obviously infatuated with the sound of his own voice, boomed out an unbroken string of minor announcements during the performance of the Queen's Pipe Band and highland dancers -- thus ruining the spectacle for the Homecoming crowd. The voice of this cretin did not sound to me like that of Max ("If You Can't Be a Sport, Play One") Jackson, so I can only hope that worthy gentleman has found his reward in that Great Announcer's Booth in the Sky. Whoever was responsible for the atrocity, however, should be barred from inflicting himself upon fans on future occasions. And given a good swift kick in the rear for good measure.

Ignorant frosh

Dear Editor,

While strolling about the campus one scintillating fall day last week my eyes were struck, nay, outraged by the habiliments of a certain freshman. It seems this particular "frosh" had been a victim of misinformation. Either this is the case or else his gaels failed to inform their group during orientation concerning the clothing customs of this sinless institution. You see, this freshman (and there's more like him) displayed (shock, gasp) most illegitimately the famed Queen's University PASS crest on his sleeve. I am sure the pitiable sight I observed last week was the victim of ignorance and truly did not want to corrupt one of our attire traditions. Therefore, enlighten I must: one does not have the privilege of flashing the saltire azure on which rests an open book of the first order bordered by those light ancient crowns gold until one has survived the initiatory year of academic ordeal.

Yours disconcertingly,
a vexed upperclassman

Craps on crap

Sirs,

How dare you? Is their no censorship? Is the Queen's Journal now an open forum for buffoons to air their whimsical brand of nonsense; yes, I refer to the letter (?) of one S. Creet. (if this character exists he is not registered as a Queen's student. I beseech you, what is happening gentlemen? This piece of animal excrement is merely the tip of the iceberg. This once exclusive bastion of solid Canadian stock is now besieged by seedy hippies, noisy roughneck greaseballs and intruders from foreign lands. (due to forced gov't expansion? or even communists?)

No longer am I proud to call Queen's my university. I believe steps must be taken to rectify the downward trend in the quality of students attending this once magnificent educational institute.

A Friend.

Ed. Note: This is a reply to the letter entitled crap in memoriam.

Shafted in print

Dear Editor,

Sincerest apologies to Sandra Bernstein, and congratulations for an excellently written, admirably restrained, and soundly deserved put-down. I am indeed to blame for not having more carefully read the original article she criticized. Perhaps I would then have realized she was writing parody. As it happened, my nasty letter had already been delivered when I learned of her true intentions.

Ironically, after reading my own letter in Tuesday's Journal, I started composing an apology, but for wrong reasons. I strongly suspected that Mrs. Bernstein's letter had been like countless others, a victim of the cruel and grotesque mutilations inflicted by the Queen's Gerbil, as had mine. When I shoved that latest missile (sic) under your door it contained 82 words and 4 paragraphs, and to the best of my knowledge, no spelling mistakes, punctuative errors, or other blatant gaffes. In short, I believe it was written in English. However, when it emerged from processing:

1. It had shrunk to 81 words by having "to wield my bloody incisive pen" changed to "wields my bloody . . ." thus rendering this parenthetic comment even more non-sensical than when born (incredible as that may seem.) If you have a dictionary down there at the Journal, you might look up "to wield". I think you'll find something like "to use or handle", as a weapon or instrument," to quote Funk and Wagnalls Standard Dictionary, International Edition. Quite obviously the pen must be wielded by some active agent, presumably a writer, and certainly cannot do the wielding itself.
2. Two paragraphs had somehow merged.
3. A comma had been spontaneously generated.
4. A statement had become a question by transposition of words.
5. Most heinous of all, you had misspelled not once, but twice, the word around which my whole tirade revolved. Now, my hand-writing is not the best, but I thought I had been very careful to neatly and legibly spell "limpid" with two i's, not one. If I really wrote "limped", then I submit myself for suitable punishment. Perhaps forty lashes, physical or verbal, with a (limp, limpid limped; choose one) Queen's Urinal would be meet.

Other beauties I have caught include several recent consecutive notices that a "referenda" was being held, and in last Tuesday's issue, an ad stating that "The Student Councilling (sic) Office is alive and well," and a headline lauding the distinguished destruction of our environment. That's right folks. Read it in the Journal. "Destruction of our environment eminent."

Thank you for enduring my pharisaic blasts of outrage. May I now make a positive suggestion? I should be more than willing to devote an hour or two per week to proof-reading copy, in the hope that at least the more glaring of these solecisms might be apprehended before getting the chance to publicly and indecently expose themselves. I can be reached at 544-9196 or 544-1737.

Sincerely,
Brian H. Judge

Ed Note - at times our printer can't spell any better than we can, but you're hired anyway.

Art centre elitism

Dear Editor,

Apparently it has escaped Gail Bebee's attention (Journal Oct. 20) that several desk copies of the catalogue -- not "guide book" -- "Realism: Emulsion and Omission" were available for those visitors who, for some reason, were unable to buy a copy of this catalogue.

Furthemore, the names of the artists in the exhibition of "German Expressionist Prints" are stated on the walls. To have labels next to the works as well as a specially designed Poster-catalogue, which only costs 25c, seems a bit superfluous.

Usually it is the policy of the Art Centre to print catalogues as cheaply as possible, to make them available to the public at practically no cost at all, and-or to have labels with the exhibited works.

Sometimes, however, it is considered desirable to compile a more extensive catalogue with background information concerning the ideas and principles underlying the organisation of the exhibition, often with an extensive bibliography. It is hoped that anyone, really interested, will be curious enough to read the gallery copy provided or even to pay the amount of $2 or $1, so easily spent on booze, to acquire a copy of the catalogue.

The Kraft Boycott

by Frank Okoh
and Judy Smith

Kraft is the largest private dairy-related industry in the world. It is a truly multi-national corporation with interests in more than one-hundred different countries. Between 1929 and 1970 its sales rose from $300,021,000 to almost three billion dollars. Fortune magazine, in its annual salute to big business noted that Kraft had moved from thirty-second to twenty-eighth place among the largest corporations in North America. Its sales for 1970 produced a net income of eighty-two million dollars. However its fantastic growth also created problems for the company. The Federal Trade Commission of the United States clamped restrictions on Kraft's acquisitions. This happened in 1963, and had an effect on the company of particular significance for Canada.

With its monopolistic growth curtailed at home, Kraft decided to extend its operations elsewhere. Six of its corporate aquisitions after 1963 were beyond the U.S. border; two of the companies were in Canada. Contrary to myth this expansion was scarcely financed by the parent corporation. The host company usually obliged by lending money. Taxpayers in Canada subsidise the Kraft Company plant at Ingleside, Ontario to the tune of $250,000 in the form of an interest free forgivable government loan - a clear example of corporate welfare. But in this instance, there is more than corporate welfare involved.The domination of the Canadian food market by Kraft threatens a whole way of life - the rural way of life in Canada. We shall see why this is the case. The Kraft Company dominates the cheese market in North America. They are the "price leader" of the industry and have more influence on the wholesale price of cheese than any other organization. This price, in turn, affects the price paid to shippers of industrial milk. Kraft is always willing to oblige by offering to buy out any farmer who complains that the price paid for his milk is too small to enable him to make ends meet. "If you do not like the price sell your farm to us", Kraft, in effect, says to the farmer. It is no coincidence that in the same year that fortune Magazine was patting Kraft on the back for its foregin expansion, seven thousand dairy farmers went out of business in Canada. These people were uprooted from their farms and forced by government agricultural policy to seek jobs in the cities. Kraft can expand in Canada without hindrance even though it is prevented by law from expanding on its own home base.

Form Union

The individual farmer is hardly in a position to resist Kraft's expansion. Unfortunately, there are over ten thousand farm organizations in Canada. The biggest of these is probably the Canadian Federation of Agriculture (CFA). It is a well-healed organization of big farmers. Being a federation, it is constantly reconciling the diverse and sometimes conflicting views of its affiliates. If can hardly be said to represent the interests of the family farmer.

The family farm is one run by the owner-proprieter and employs little or no help outside the family. The CFA regards it an obstacle to progress (ie, progress towards the corporate farm. In this respect the CFA is in total agreement with Ottawa bureaucrats. Fortunately, small farmers have not tried to reform the CFA from within - such a task would have proved Hurclean to say the least. They have instead formed their own union, The National Farmers Union. The NFU is an association of farmers who have joined together voluntarily to save their own way of life and is the only farm organization with a cross-Canada community--oriented local structure. Together, the membership has joined battle with campanies like Kraft and the government to save the family farm from what many regard as the cartain future of Canadian Agriculture: corporate farming. The NFU members are in the words of an Ottawa civil servant, "people whose whole way of life is threatened and who are damned mad about it."

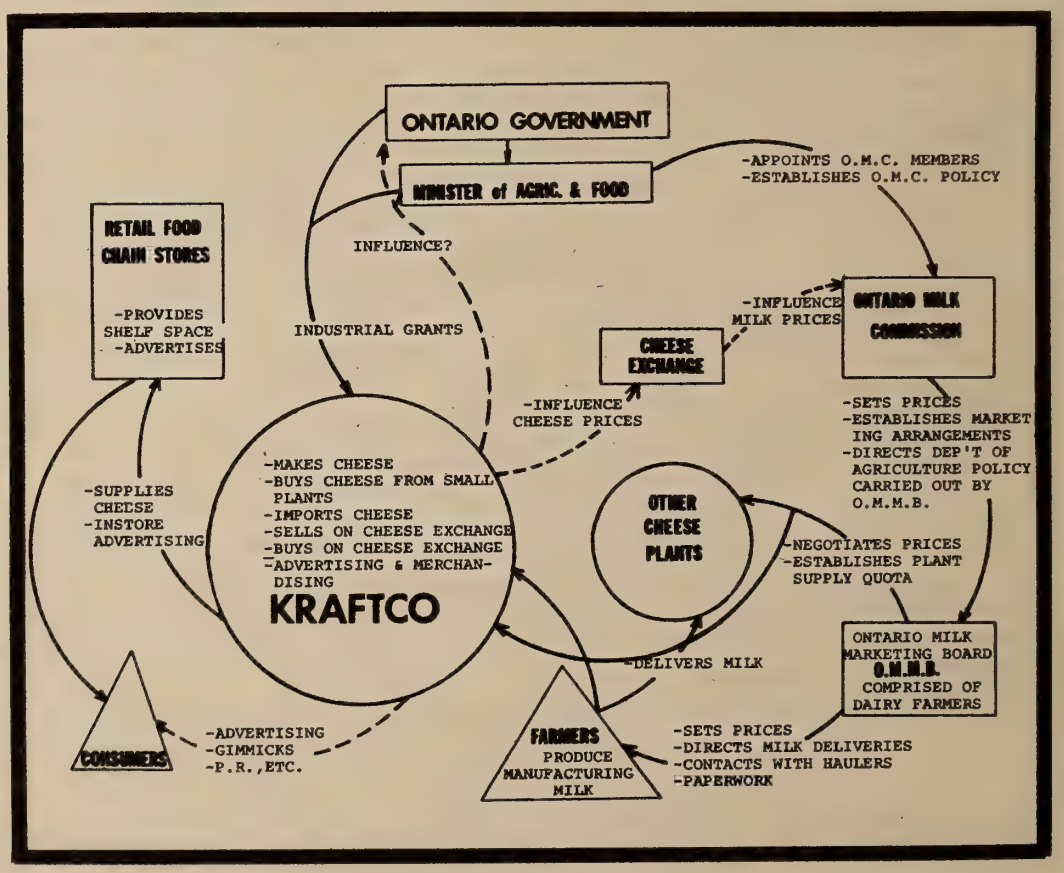
These are signs that the NFU is not fighting a losing battle. In the brief period between the foundnding of the NFU and now, the Union has undertaken many programs and actions which have brought beneficial results oto the farmers. It has provided leadership in the development of alternatives to government policies.

Not very long ago the Prince Edward Island government with the support of the Federal government, brought out a "development plan" designed to remove most of the farmers from the land and replace them with industrial corporate farms. The farmers demanded the right to be consulted in a matter that threatened their very existence but were majestically ignored by the government.

Militant Action

The NFU decided that militant action was necessary to draw the attention of the public to their plight. In a well publicized protest, farmers blocked the roads of the island with tractors and other equipment. Roy Atkinson, the President of the NFU, and Evelyn Potter, Women's President, were arrested and charged with "conspiracy to intimidate". It turned out in court that they had "conspired to intimidate the road". They were found not guilty, presumably because the road was not able to testify.

Although the issue is not settled, it is already clear that the "development plan" for the island has been discredited and shown to be unacceptable to the people. The NFU has no illusions about their struggle; they expect repression but believe that solidarity in their ranks will help them win.



From the brief account we have given of Kraft and the NFU, it is not hard to see that the two groups represent opposite points of view. To large-scale farmers and to Kraft, the NFU representes an obstacle to the corporate farm. A staff member of an inportant Prairie organization, when asked what he thought of Atkinson, snarled, "hat son of a bitch".

The NFU has a more temperate case against the big farmers, the government and Kraft. The biggest threat to the family farm is not inefficiency or the reluctance of young people to stay on the land. These farms are dying out because of the intolerable prices paid by corporations like Kraft. The factory worker has collective bargaining rights but the farmer who faces an adversary just as formidable and just as reluctant to tamper with profits has no such right. The NFU believes that the farmer should have a say through his Union in the prices he is paid for his products.

In September 1971, the NFU approached Kraft and another big dairy corporation for a meeting to discuss the marketing of milk and other problems facing the small farmer in Ontario. The other corporation agreed to such a meeting but the Kraft turned the NFU down. This giant company, with its huge profits, refused to talk to a small group of farmers who refuse to "move with the timmes."

Some members of the NFU believe that Kraft's attitude is fed by the conviction that the NFU is a nine-day wonder and will soon run out of funds. As a result of Kraft's refusal to talk to the NFU a boycott was placed on their products. The boycott is designed to put pressure on the Kraft to bring them to a meeting with the NFU. Experience has shown that corporations like Kraft only talk to unions if their profits or sales are threatened.

The boycott is important for all Canadians for higher prices for the small farmer will not result in higher food prices. It will only cause a small dent in the profits of Kraft. Our governments have been very generous with these companies. This generosity, totally undeserved, should be extended to the small farmer.

Nadar Attacks Kraft

The usual justification of government agricultural policy is that small farms are inefficient. It is about time that we asked what the big corporations are efficient at. They are efficient at driving farmers to the cities but this is hardly a creditable achievement. Government policy has often pushed the price of milk far beyond the reach of too many people. This situation so angered the NFU that last year they tried giving away unpasteurized milk to draw attention to this deplorable state of affairs.

Kraft came under strong condemnation in Ralph Nader's report, "The Chemical Feast", for the market decline in the quality of cheese produced in the U.S. There is a standard method companies employ for avoiding necessary standards in the quality of their products: they invent a "distinctive name". Although Kraft's "Miracle Whip" is actually a salad dressing, it does not have to meet dressing standards because it masquerades as a whip.

Kraft has also used the same technique to escape requirements for process cheeses. The low quality, hard and moldy cheese that the public will not buy can be groung up, heated, and combined with salt, water, and an emulsifying agent and then sold under some flamboyant new name. Give Kraft a distinctive label and they will give you a new brand of "cheese."

The low quality of Kraft's products does not entail any sacrifice in their boycott. And contrary to advertising myth, Kraft cheese is no cheaper than any other brand. It is perhaps significant that Kraft realizes the largest net profit of any food processor, even though its gross sales are only half that of Swift's, the world's largest food company. Kraft milks us all!

Publicity Problems

The boycott has been running for almost a year. The NFU has no way of knowing how much sales are being affected, but the fact that advertising has increased is an indication that the company is suffering. The NFU faces the problem of publicity for the demands of running a farm do not leave much time for organizing a nation-wide boycott.

The Queen's University Community Support Group is sponsoring a public meeting on Monday, November 13 at 8:30 in Stirling Hall D. Walter Miller, Vice President of the NFU and Don Kossick, the National Boycott cooridinator and representatives and local representatives of the NFU will be present. It is hoped that out of this meeting will emerge a "Kingston Boycott Kraft Committee".

Night on the Porch with Bruce Cockburn

by Tim Colbert

"Would you like to know the great drama of my life? It is that I have put my genius into my life - - I have put only my talents into my works."

---Oscar Wilde

A friend of mine introduced me to Bruce Cockburn by way of records, some time ago. I was impressed with his warm and personal down-home style of music and I rather enjoyed the feeling of simple satisfaction which pervaded the whole album. Every bit of satisfaction I had ever received from Bruce Cockburn on record was given a healthy boost last week by Bruce Cockburn in concert.

In this day and age people are starved for any form of meaningful interaction. The predominant concert atmosphere in keeping with the times, has turned rather cold -- almost hostile, heavy bands. The likes of Bruce Cockburn offers a welcome alternative to such coldness -- a chance to interact at least on a mental or intellectual level, with the performer and with others in the audience.

Cockburn wasted no time in establishing an atmosphere of easy-going sincerity and amiable informality which was to last the entire evening. The mood was much the same as it would be if you were to settle down on the front porch with some good friends to talk about old times over a few beers. Cockburn's relation with his audience is on a person-to-person basis rather than the Big Star-to-customer relationships experienced at so many other concerts. In approaching music as a means of bringing people together Cockburn's performance becomes ultimately a far more satisfying venture than a concert which simply offers an assault on the senses.

This type of musical interaction is manifest in both the personal nature of Cockburn's songs and in the intelligent, friendly manner of Cockburn himself. On stage, perched on a stool, he shared bits of personal history, origins of numerous songs, and several humourous anecdotes. Cockburn's report extended to the point of reflecting on the philosophy of guitar tuning pegs (akin to George Carlin's desire to share amplified two-part swallows with his audiences) - a very refreshing character.

Although he began to show the inevitable strain of two successive performances, Cockburn's musical offerings were excellent. An extremely gifted guitarist, a rather talented pianist, and a very entertaining dulcimer and mandolin player as well, Cockburn impresses one as a highly innovative, creative artist. His songs spring from personal experience and reflect his obviously relaxed, unpretentious, and seemingly quite enviable life style.

Cockburn in concert is an extension of the nature of the man himself; he exudes more warmth, earthy charm, and candor than most involved in the medium. It was nice to have you drop by, Bruce, I hope you enjoyed it as much as we did.

Listen To Your World -"Yes" - Black Sabbath

"Close to the Edge" - Yes - (Atlantic)

"Yes" is another in the long line of excellent British groups. Comparisons are impossible, for their sound is electric and heavily produced. One does not have to listen to words to be moved, for the excitement and the power of their music is enough to reach anyone.

On their newest album, "Close to the Edge," the most appropriate statement comes from their own advertisment, "Yes is not fragile." After their highly successful second album "Fragile," the group ran into personnel problems and many predicted that they were finished. But fortunately for us, this is not the case. The album only has three separate pieces. The theme, "Close to the Edge" (18.50) takes up the entire first side. Side two is made up of "And you and I" (10.09) and Siberian Khatra (8.58). To talk about individual parts seems ridiculous, for this album is not a group of songs but a musical experience. Its powerful listening, but not so powerful that you won't want to play it over and over again. The vocals of little Jon Anderson and keyboard playing of Rick Wakeman give them a unique combination of power and beauty. I recommend that if you don't buy this album you at least give it a listen. I have enjoyed it ever since I first played it after having the opportunity to see the group. They are an incredible group of musicians and their sounds warrant your attention.

Black Sabbath - Volume Four (Warner Brothers BS2602)

Freud wrote that many of man's psychological needs and desires must be sublimated, repressed, or whatever to ensure "acceptable" behavior in a social setting. I think Freud was on the right track. But one just can't "repress" forever - there's just not that much room inside your head. Every once in a while it's important to set up and object upon which to vent accumulated resentment, to tear something apart, blindly ravaging and criticizing with nothing but malicious intent. This conscious re-channeling of anti social behavior acts as a sort of purge, the drano of the soul the first step on the long road to salvation, if you will. At any rate, finding an object of focus for your misguided emotion is instrumental. Objects that have no means of retaliation make the safest target for occasional tirades - they deserve any beating they take, and their only defence is an incredibly cheap brand of noise-laden and ultimately boring hard rock.

Cheech and chong do a skit where some perpetually wired character remarks that he "played Black Sabbath" at 78 speed and saw God. "I played it at 33 speed and the best I could muster was a plea for His mercy.

I have been unable to treat Black Sabbath with any degree of objectivity. The music is simply contrived, artificial, and totally lacks most any sense of creativity. Volume four of Black Sabbath is relatively unintelligible from volumes one, two and three, save the song titles and design. The music thereon is loud presumably to camouflage the ineptitude of the musicians themselves, and is for the most part extremely uninteresting. It's not lively enough to label rock and roll; it certainly isn't soul music; nor is it jazz or rhythm and blues although it sure as hell could give you the blues - so what's left? Volume four falls into the barren vacuum of talentless waste so often categorized as psychedelic hard rock.

But the album is useful, as noted. So if you feel a need to lash out at something - anything, and you want to cleanse your troubled psyche, do something creative with the fury of your repressed passions. Buy a Black Sabbath album and cut loose in the privacy of your own home.

Dance Preview

"We Can Do It!"

by Sue Denim

Sandy Aitken giggled a little nervously as she said "We CAN do it!" during the Tuesday night rehearsal of the Queen's Modern Dance Company's first production. This dance-drama, entitled, The Twice-Born: The Legend of Dionysus, opened last night and will run tonight, tomorrow and Sunday at 8:30 pm in the Guild Hall Theatre, 233½ Princess Street.

The company, which got its impetus from a presentation of experimental dance performed to electronic music last spring in the studio theatre of the Old Arts Building, has grown both in scope of endeavour and in size. Aside from Miss Aitken, the only other member of last years group is Tony Morgan. His sister Julia, Vlasta and Joseph Riha, Rene O'Farrell, Janice Hladki and Ann O'Brien, make up the company of dancers and all have had previous experience and professional training. The company also has an artistic director, musical director and technician, all of whom comprise a company which will perform original material during the year, choreographed by Sandy Aitken, founder of the company and instructress of dance and movement in various curricular and extra curricular capacities on campus.

At the Tuesday night rehearsal the finishing touches were being added to the programme which depicts in dance the myth of the birth of Dionysus, Greek God of revelry and wine, who was worshipped by the Bacchae.

A dancers sporadically arrived, Morrison Bock, who plays drums and directs the show was checking lighting cues with technical director Ian Collier and listening to the taped soundtrack that Bill Buxton had compiled. Scott MacKenzie practised first on the flute and then the tympony, both which he will be playing and the dancers stretched and jumped and loosened themselves up in preparation for their rehearsal.

The company has been in training since the beginning of September and the production has been in rehearsal for about three and a half weeks.

There are almost no regular opportunities to see this type of creative expression performed in Kingston and Miss Aitken's choreography, totally original, has its own smoothly sensual style.

Tickets are available at the Agnes Etherington Arts Centre and start at $1.

A PHESA Symposium

OLYMPICS '76

Montreal will host the summer Olympic Games in 1976. What are the implications for Canada? Will the political power plays that turned the Munich Games into a black smear on the olympic record be repeated? Can they be avoided? Can they be avoided?

What are the financial implications of Olympics '76 for Canada? Will they be a national deficit like Expo? Are the Olympics really a commercial venture for the host country? What are the economic pressures felt by the athletes themselves?

Is the traditional concept of "amateur sport" dead? Should it be? What can replace it as a guiding principle in the Olympic Code? Does this "amateur concept" represent the maintenance of an aristocratic social order that is far out of touch with modern industrial society?

There are a lot of questions that have vague answers at best, at least for most people. If you are interested in the problems associated with the Olympics, or with Track and Field in Canada, come and sit in on the Wednesday (Nov. 8th) and Thursday (Nov. 9th) sessions of Olympics '76 Symposium, in Dupuis Hall Auditorium, at 8:00 pm. The first night will be devoted to the theme "Canada prepares for Olympics '76", and the second to "Political and other implications of the Olympic Games". These sessions will be well worth seeing and hearing, both for those with an interest in the purely athletic side of the Olympic question, and for those whose interests range into the broader social political and economic problems raised by such international competition. Admission is free, so pack the place and get informed!

Abbie Hoffman

Abbie Hoffman, Canada's premiere female middle-distance runner, has participated in several British Commonwealth and Pan-American Games. Her gold medal performances in these games have brought not only personal satisfaction for Miss Hoffman, but international recognition for Canadian track and field.She has also represented Canada in Olympic competition, as a member of both the '68 and '72 teams. The Munich games witnessed her best performance ever, as she reached the semi-finals of the 800 metres, recording her best-ever time for that distance. Miss Hoffman is acutley interested in a question that arises in Canada every Olympic year: What makes an athlete successful - facilities, coaching, or personal drive? To hear her opinions on this and other facets of the "Olympic Problem", and on the Canadian track and field situation, attend OLYMPICS '76 Symposium, to be held next Wednesday and Thursday, November 8th and 9th, at 8:00 pm in Dupuis Auditorium. Admission is free, and refreshments will be served.

Bruce Kidd

For a period of about four years during the early 1960's, Bruce Kidd was not only the brightest, but at times the only, shining light in Canadian track and field. He appeared on the scene from nowhere, and appeared destined for a glorious international career before tendon problems in his ankles forced a premature retirement from competitive track. However, before his dissapointments in the 'Tokyo Olympics,, he did more to bolster Canadian track and field than any athlete before or since, opening the door for Canadian competitors in many top U.S. indoor meets, and playing an instrumental role in the origin of the Maple Leaf Games, which is still Canada's only top-level track and field competition.

Kidd was able to walk away from track and field, because he ne er lost sight of his real ambitions in life, nor let competition become so serious an enterprise that it dominated his every move. For his views as a competitor, and his opinions on Canadian track and field, come to Dupuis Auditorium at 8:00 pm, November 8th and 9th, for the PHESA-sponsored OLYMPICS "76 symposium. Admission is free, and refreshments will be served.

THIS SATURDAY

Queen's hosting swim invitational

This Saturday, November 4, Queen's University will be host to five other teams at the Queen's "Club" Invitational swim meet. The distance events will be run from 9:30 to 11:30 in the morning and the main events will take place in the afternoon and will run until 7:30. The meet will be held in the Phys-ed Centre on campus and all spectators are welcome.

From Kingston there is Base Kingston. When watching this club compete you should look for Kate Whitaker who has just moved into senior competition. She is a good backstroker and also competes in the individual medley.

The Etobicoke Memorial Aquatic Club boasts one of the largest senior teams in Ontario. They have Canadian National finalists in Co-Captains Bill Woodley and Ross Armstrong. They also have Merrily Stratten competing for them. She was on the 1972 Canadian Olympic Team, and ranks among the top 15 in the world in freestyle. This club is favoured to come on very strong in this meet.

The Queen's University men and women will be competing as a single team for this meet. Kathy Brace, a finalist in the OWIAA and Canadian College Championships, is the women's ace. She looks to breast stroke to place her in the top times. For the men's team there is Steve "Rox" Patterson, team captain, and John Pearson. Both of these swimmers have shown very well in the Inter-Squad meets that have been held over the past few weeks.

Also competing in this meet will be the Scarborough Swim Club, the Trenton Dolphins, and the Ottawa Kingfish.

bews news

by Peter Watts

The season is moving towards a climax for some of the outdoor team sports. Playoffs began yesterday in rugger and flag football. Co-ordinator Don Krestel has announced that the football champion will be decided by a two-game total point playoff between the top two teams in each of the four sections. The four winners will then meet in a round-robin tournament to determine a league champion.

At press time, it was still not definite who would meet who in the rugger playoffs. PHE is slated to meet either Mechanical or Medicine in one round while Chemical Grads meet Civil and Medicine or Mechanical take on Commerce '73 in the other two playoffs which began on Thursday. Then on Monday Business Grads will meet either Commerce '76 or Mining. The champion will be known by next Thursday.

The Horseshoe tournament is now into the third round which should be completed by November 7th.

Entries for the second and third rounds of the singles and doubles paddleball, squash, and tennis are now posted on the notice boards in the locker room and strudents are urged to check these lists and to follow the time schedule laid out on the schedule.

Entries for the Bews broomball league have been extended: the deadline now is noon next Wednesday, November 8th. Anyone interested in officiating broomball is aksed to register with Mr. Carnegie next week. Broomball will begin play on Monday, November 6th. The schedule will be available toward the end of next week.

Also beginning on Monday is the Bews intra-mural hockey schedule which should now be available on the notice board in the main locker room.

A look at Bews standings is enough to indicate that it is usually the smaller team units which do well in team competitions. The Arts years are the biggest from the point of view of number of potential competitors. Yet they are regularly at the base of the standings. This week is no exception. A complete list of Bews standings through October 27th, follows:

1. Civil & Math	11,205
2. Mining	7,940
3. Commerce '73	7,193
4. PHE	6,887
5. Chemical	6,055
6. Mechanical	5,791
7. Commerce '76	4,890
8. Commerce '75	4,792
9. Medicine	4,671
10. Electrical	4,217
11. Commerce '74	4,178
12. Engineering Grads	3,317
13. Law '74	3,269
Arts '73	3,203
Business Grads	2,990
Chemistry Grads	2,791
Science '76	2,634
Law '75	2,633
Law '73	2,000
Artsci Grads	1,698
Arts '76	1,659
Arts '75	1,494
Arts '74	660
Independent	60
Education	-1,024

Minus points are awarded for defaults in schedules.

My comments at the first are directed to some of the male students on the campus and not to the athletic sticks in the Arts years who are doing a tremendous job. But they are not getting much help. HELP!

Canada: Stanfield wants Trudeau out

OTTAWA — Progressive Conservative Leader Robert Stanfield stated Tuesday that Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau has lost the confidence of the country and called for his resignation.

Stanfield stated, however, that if Trudeau decided not to resign and met parliament as Prime Minister, the Conservatives would not vote against Liberal legislation merely to bring them down. However, he also claimed that he would not try to avoid defeating the government on measures he considers wrong for the country.

OTTAWA — David Lewis, whose New Democratic Party now holds the balance of power in the new parliament, considers his first campaign as party leader to be a tremendous success. In a press conference Tuesday, he stated that there will be no coalitions between the NDP and the other parties.

He claimed that the Canadian people are obviously dissatisfied with a Liberal government and Pierre Trudeau. "We will support good government policies and oppose bad government policies," he said.

Lewis stated that his priorities this parliament would be to change the tax system, improve the cost-of-living, and lower housing costs.

OTTAWA — Five women in Monday's election were elected to the House of Commons, the only winners of 71 women candidates.

Quebec, which has never before in its history sent a woman to Ottawa, is sending three. They are Liberals Albanie Morin, Jeanne Sauve, and Monique Begin. Sauve is the wife of former Liberal cabinet minister Maurice Sauve.

The Conservatives elected as their only woman MP Flora MacDonald of Kingston and the Islands who won the riding in a landslide victory.

Grace MacInnes was elected in Vancouver Kingsway for the New Democratic Party and will be serving her third term. MacInnes was the only woman to sit in the last session.

KINGSTON — Two candidates have put their names forward for alderman in Sydenham Ward in the December 4 municipal elections. Angus Ross, a member of the faculty at St. Lawrence College has announced that he will be running in the ward which includes Queen's University. The other candidate will be Nancy Foster, former member of the Kingston Planning Board.

Sydenham Ward, which elects two Aldermen, was represented last time by Ald. James Cook and Ald. James Vosper.

Ross stated in his announcement that he is concerned with the state of the environment and that he is aware that the city's greatest need is for screening and control of development to ensure that it is a positive contribution to the residents.

Foster stated that her chief concern is the preservation of the ward as an area suitable for family living. She would also make the planning board a standing committee of the city council so that it would come under broader discussion. She would also form a council committee to deal with transportation and form a new housing policy.

TORONTO — The Ontario Credit Union League Central has announced that it will merge its assets with the assets of the Ontario Co-operative Credit Society. The two concerns each count as their members the same 500 credit unions in addition to their co-ops and so decided to merge to avoid duplication of effort. The society's assets total about $40 million and the league's assets total about $60 million.

BROCKVILLE — Bell Canada has announced the possibility of yet another wider toll free area, this time around Brockville including the Delta-Lyndhurst exchanges. An executive of the company stated that when 50 per cent to 60 per cent of the long distance calls are made between two exchanges, Bell will study the possibility of making them a toll free area. The increase in calling range will be accompanied by a proportionate increase in the basic telephone costs for that area, he said.

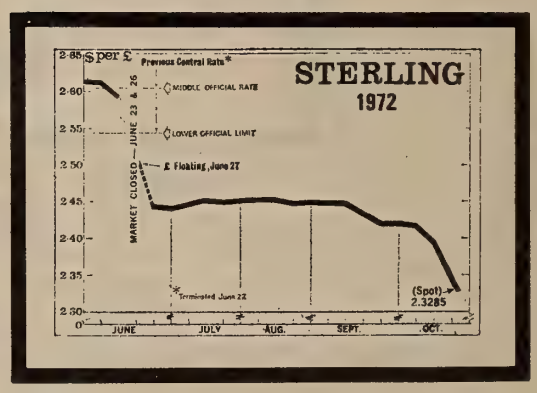
KINGSTON — The work stoppage of Millhaven Penitentiary in which 85 per cent of the prison guards booked off sick to protest government policies, has ended. Director of Prisons Paul Faguy promised the guards that he would tighten security and improve their working conditions.

OTTAWA — It has been suggested that each of Canada, Indonesia, Hungary and Poland send a 250 man force to supervise the peace fire in South Vietnam, once the agreement has been signed. As yet the Ministry of External Affairs here is non-committal on the subject.

MONTREAL — Faced with higher tobacco costs due to a poor crop and higher labour costs, it appears that cigarettes are in for another price increase. Both Imperial Tobacco and Benson and Hedges have hinted at the possibility. Rothmans of Pall Mall did not comment.

World: Kissinger still optimistic on peace

WASHINGTON- Presidential Advisor Henry Kissinger has announced that despite the missing of the deadline for signing the Vietnam peace proposal set forward by the North Vietnamese, he is confident that another settlement could be reached within a matter of weeks. "We've gone through this with the Vietnamese before", he said.



According to Kissinger there are six or seven issues which have come up which must be discussed before any agreement can be reached. These include the inclusion of the Saigon Administration in the signing of the agreement, the strengthening of the International Supervision clause and the ensuring of a concurrent ceasefire in Cambodia and Laos.

The Viet Cong meanwhile have pledged to "absolutely respect and carry out all provisions" of the Paris peace agreement. They have launched a land grab drive in anticipation of a peace fire going into effect soon.

It is expected that Kissinger will meet with North Vietnamese negotiators in Paris again to settle the differences between him and the North Vietnamese.

TOKYO- The Japanese government has imposed a wide range of controls on exports of consumer good items to head off the upward pressure on the yen. The United States has been enouraging Japan to impose measures to cut their estimated export surplus of $3.5 billion with Japan. The demand has been echoed by many other countries.

The 16.88 per cent revaluation of the yen last December seems to have had little effect on their continued export surpluses.

The restrictions will include exports of cameras, radios, automobile parts, electric motors, generators and transformers. They are a voluntary arrangement with manufacturers but if unsuccessful will become mandatory impositions.

BEIRUT - North and South Yemen have patched up their differences and will have a ceasefire agreement in effect within a month with total reunification of the two countries within a year

The agreement has been signed by the two Premiers and the peacefire will be supervised by Algerian and Kuwaiti officers. The two Yemens separated in 1962 when the northern tribes revolted against the rule of the south's President.

SEOUL - The South Korean government has announced that it has put together a sweeping constitution that would allow President Chung Hee Park to stay in power indefinately and that it would be put to a referendum on November 21. All campaigns for and against the constitution have been banned.

LONDON- After a week of successive declines in the exchange rate for the pound sterling, it finally rose a cent and a half on Tuesday. The British claimed that any further efforts to stabillize the currency will be the result of negotions with labour for voluntary wage and price controls.

Longer open hours in women's res.

Women's Residence is one step closer to 24-hour open hour as a result of a motion passed unanimously by the Ban Rign Board at a meeting on Saturday extending open hours from noon to mid-night, during the week.

In a referendum held last Wednesday and Thursday 95 per cent of the women in residence voted. 82 per cent gave support to an extension of hours from noon to midnight but only 53 per cent were in favour of 24-hour open hour.

Open hours is the time during which women may have male guests in their rooms. There have been countless referendum during the past four years.

WRC President Kiloran German was confident that the issue of full open hours would not die.

Another referendum on this subject will likely occur in the spring.

National student union formed

OTTAWA (CUP) Delegates from 40 Canadian universities and colleges Sunday established a new national student union, but not before representatives from Quebec and the Atlantic Provinces had walked out.

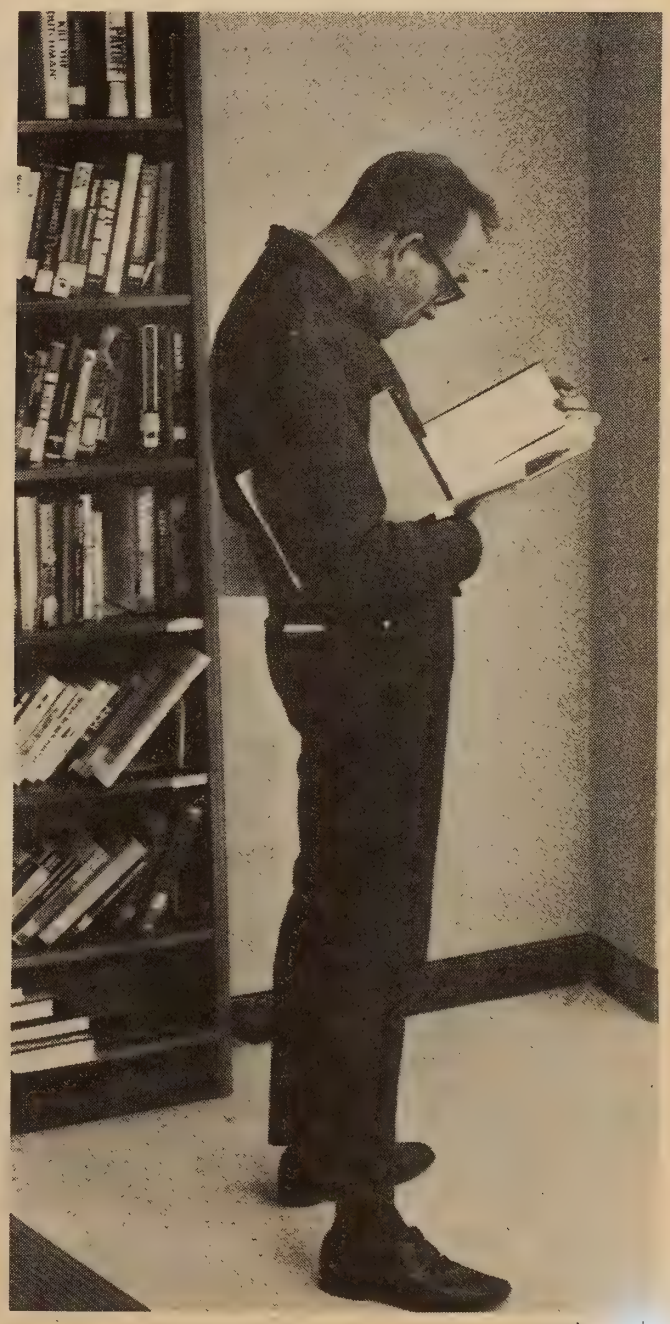
Creation of the National Union of Students-Association Nationale des Etudiants (NUS) followed three days of protracted, and sometimes tedious debate on a consitution.

But the fledgling organization's future is uncertain because potential members must conduct referendums on their campuses before being allowed to join. Although a few student councils had already authorized their delegates to join the new union, only Simon Fraser has conducted the necessary referendum.

Delegates authorized the executive of NUS to solicit grants from potential members to finance its formative stages. The only commitment made at the conference was a grant of $1000 from UBC.

The conference was perhaps the largest gathering of Canadian student council representatives since the dissolution of the old Canadian Union of Students (CUS) in 1969.

The Quebec-Atlantic Provinces walkout occurred after delegates reached a bitter impasse over methods of membership in the new union.



Quebec representatives, who came from the English-speaking universities and some English and French CEGEP's (community colleges), demanded representation based on region. Loyola, which introduced the proposal, wanted all NUS delegates to be appointed by regional student unions, with all five regions of Canada having equal voting power. They were especially adamant that their representation come from the growing Front des Eterdiants du Quebec (FEQ), rather than from individual institutions. The Loyola proposal drew on the example of FEQ where Quebec is divided into six regional government bodies.

The Quebec delegates contended that this method prevents one power bloc from controlling the organization. Each region must meet before an assembly meeting to develop positions scheduled for discussion at the assembly.

The proposed constitution called for equal representation from individual institutions. The plan was favored by most delegates from the west and Ontario, but it was amended to a modified representation by population formula after the Quebec - Atlantic provinces walkout.

The Atlantic Province participants wanted representation from provincial organizations,

200 York faculty may lose jobs

DOWNSVIEW (CUP) York University's faculty are battling to save some 200 members who may lose their jobs in the current York budget crisis.

In a surprise move, the Senate (composed of academics) refused to accept an administration report on York's financial set-backs and has launched an intensive investigation of its own.

The faculty reaction was sparked by a Board of Governors report suggesting a $2.7 million cut in academic operations at the university. York president David Slater called the board's figures "not outlandish".

In a special budget report in early October, Slater stated the budget deficit was $4.1 million. This was later revised to $3.4 million and finally reduced to $2.7 million after a financial freeze in faculty and library budgets.

Faculty members tangled with administrators in three Senate sessions during the last week of October. Charges of "lack of financial imagination", "confused state of information" and concern about "the nature and reliability of the information available" were lodged against the Board.

Atkinson College Dean Harry Crowe told the Senate the "data made available (by the board) on the current and 1973-74 budgets had been most confusing".

The Senate refusal to accept the Board's recommendations was refused by Slater. He told the members that "it invited confrontation with the board." However, faculty members argued the board had been blunt and they had to be blunt in return.

"Firing staff seems to imply that people are reduced to the order of things instead of people being placed ahead of things," Mathematics Professor P. Rajogopal told the administration in a budget report he presented to Senate.

Tenured professors can be fired with notice, according to a recent statement by the Canadian Association of University Teachers.

We remember

The University suspends classes and laboratories for one hour on Friday, November 10th, to honour the sacrifice of those who went out and did not return, specifically three hundred and sixty-two Queensmen in two World Wars, and to engage in a Service which is both remembrance of sacrifice and resolution for peace in our time. The twofold nature of the Service is indicated by the quotation from Stephen Spender standing alone on the front page of the Service folder:

"They travelled a short while towards the sun and left the vivid air signed with their honour."

and the quotation from Omar Bradley standing alone on the back page:

"It is easy for us who are living to honour the sacrifice of those who are dead. For it helps to assauge the guilt we should feel in their presence. Wars can be prevented just as surely as they are provoked and, therefore, those who fail to prevent them must share in the guilt of the dead."

Principal Deutsch, Greg LeBlanc, President of the A.M.S., and Padre Laverty will be associated in the brief Service to be held in Grant Hall at 10:53 A.M.

Sincerely,
The Rev. A.M. Laverty

Grads don't want union

TORONTO (CUP) — The Canadian Union of Graduate Students (CUGS) does not want to be a union any longer.

Twelve universities represented at a CUGS meeting decided last Wednesday to dispense with its formal organization and set up an informal structure designed only to disseminate information among member graduate student councils.

The new association says it will be available to take action should the members decide it is required, although with its structural change, organization on issues will be virtually impossible.

Under the new format, CUGS will have six regional co-ordinators who will gather information from member universities in their areas and exchange it with other co-ordinators and other member universities.

The co-ordinators are Jean-Paul Daem of Simon Fraser, Colin Issacs of Western, Anne Woakes of The University of Calgary, John Reid of The University of New Brunswick, Melvin Croucher of McGill and Elaine Thompson of The University of Manitoba.

The new CUGS has no formal budget. National meetings are to be held once a year with local individual graduate schools or students councils paying travel costs.

Ontario members of the organization will not be leaving as a whole, as forecast during the summer. They formed their own association however, Oct. 31, to distribute information to one another across the province only. This left no active grouping of graduate Unions in Ontario.

Chairman Issacs of Western said the Ontario Graduates Students' Association will circulate information such as comparative graduate tuition fees across Canada and the activities of specific graduate unions.

The association will not act on a proposed fee strike until the Ontario Federation of Students has decided what it will do. It will also not concern itself with the formation of labor unions for graduate teaching assistants.

York and U of T have already taken steps to form their own unions. Other universities can form their own unions without association support, Issacs said.

The University of Waterloo, U of T and several other graduate student councils dropped out of CUGS last summer.

You learn something new every day

One of the wonderful things about growing up is trying different things. Like Yoga. And forming your own opinion about all your new learning. Another part of growing up is finding out about sanitary protection. Maybe you're wondering if you're old enough for Tampax tampons. If you're of menstrual age, you're probably old enough. Many girls start right off with Tampax tampons.

They come in three absorbencies: Regular, Super and Junior. There's one to fit your needs. And they're easy to use. Just follow the simple directions inside every package. You'll learn something new and simplify your life.

User's committee ignores complaints

The University Centre Users' Committee met last Monday to discuss the subject of lounges and the inclusion of specific groups in the new University Centre, they completely ignored the controversial open meeting held the previous Thursday.

At the open meeting last week much criticism was directed at the concept of a single large university centre. Politics professor Ned Franks, Rector Alan Broadbent expressed the view that rather than having one centre, several sub-centres might prove more beneficial. Others, includng AMS Vice-President Wallly Palmer and Vice-Principal (administration) Russell Kennedy pointed out the need to re-evaluate the single centre idea.

Student Committee member Sue Dowler told the Journal that the committee had already asked the architect to attend the Monday meeting to show slides of lounges. She stated that the open meeting would be discussed at the next regular Monday meeting of the Committee.

C.F.R.C. station manager Andrew Marshall presented a report requesting inclusion in the University Centre, and told the User's committee that their present location could not provide adequately for the expansion that they required.

However, T. Holloway committee member and 2nd year commerce student pointed out that activities to be included in the centre should be open to the involvement of all students at any time and that C.F.R.C. might more appropriately be place in the music or drama sub-centre.

It was decided that the committee would look further into this proposal before committing itself.

The rest of the meeting was allocated to discussion of the slides shown by the architect and the types of lounges desired in the Centre. The merits of various lounge ideas were discussed in detail and the architect was given some ideas from which he could work in designing them.

AUCC discusses research policy

The Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada met in Toronto last week to discuss a report on university research policy.

The study was undertaken by L.P. Bonneau, Laval University and J.A. Corry, former principal of Queen's.

It claims that undergraduate teaching is the primary function of the university. Although research could be done elsewhere, the report says that only universities can transmit "the knowledge and traditions inherited from the past."

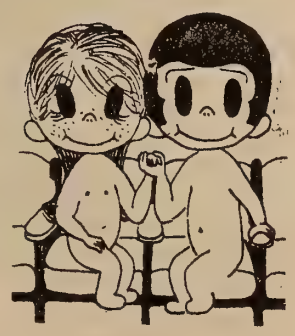
It recommends that "universities revise their policies on promotion and salary increases to ensure that the same weight is given to undergraduate teaching and reflective inquiry as is given to undergraduate teaching and reflective inquiry as is given to frontier research, teaching and supervision of graduate students."

Frontier research consists of mainly empirical work while reflective inquiry is essentially distinguished from empirical activity.

This recommendation would require a major change in the existing academic dynamic which puts a premium on research and downgrades the faculty member who prefers undergraduate teaching to publishing in scholarly journals.

Current faculty attitudes appear to rule out any easy acceptance of the recommendation in practice, although many may cling to it in theory.

The report claims that universities are the place where basic research can be done most effectively and they should give their principal attention to basic research as compared to applied research. The latter is not ruled out but it is suggested that it should not be developed in a way that might imperil the pre-eminence of basic research.



The rationalization of research is discussed at length in the report. It is suggested that universities seek to articulate policies keeping in mind local, provincial and national problems that research can help to solve. A second model relates to consultation between universities and the government. The report suggests that the provincial government identify areas of research of special interest to them and offer inducements to the universities to undertake study in these areas. The report also recommends a similar role for the federal government.

The need for rationalization of research is qualified by a note that it is absolutely necessary for effective research that the individual researcher should be free to choose his project.

Doug Pritchard, Graduate Society President and delegate to the convention in Toronto told the Journal that "many universities did not wish to use the report as a blueprint." It will be up to the individual universities to set their own priorities.

A report of the meeting from the ten member Queen's delegation will be submitted to the Senate at the upcoming meeting.

Worrell to speak at Olympics '76

"Montreal should save the life of the Olympics", Jim Worrell, member of the International Olympic Committee claims. Worrell will be speaking at the Olympics '76 Symposium in Dupuis Hall November 8 and 9 at 8:00 pm.

He believes that the Olympics should be taken out of the political showcase and the areas of the affluence. Montreal, he claims will return the games to the human scale as a festival for the athletes.

Worrell stated that the Canadian government must back up their endorsement of the Montreal bid for the games in a more tangible way. He pointed out that it is not a matter of supporting blindly a project of national prestige with an exercise in national extravagence.

He pointed out that Canada sent its largest team ever to the Munich games and that we are blessed with a far greater pool of talent of international calibre then previously. He stated that it was the best dressed, best equipped team and best served in terms of medical support personnel. It is for these reasons that he claimed that Canadian teams are doing so much better.

Happy 21st birthday, sarah!

Day care at Queen's

-paidra

by Susan de Stein

Many universities, apartment blocks and residential communities in Canada now are supporting child-care centres and nursery schools. In some cases the aim is to provide children with supervised play facilities and in others, to give more formal pre-school teaching.

At Queen's University there have been places for the organized care of children since 1969.

The Co-operative Day Care centre was started by a group of students in a room in the Students' Memorial Union. Since then, the Centre has moved to the larger premises of 76 Queen's Crescent.

The Complex Co-operative Nursery School was started in 1970 by a group of parents living in the Queen's Married Students' Apartments which had just been built.

The purposes and natures of the Nursery School and the Day-Care Centre have been different from the outset.

The Co-operative Day Care Centre, located at 76 Queen's Crescent on the main campus, occupies a three-storey house that in 1971 was converted for the purpose.

The Centre provides day-care for children between the ages of 6 months and 4 years. The centre is the only one in Kingston which provides day-care for children under the age of 2 years. It is open from 8 a.m. to 5:30 p.m. and children may attend for all or part of the time. Presently, there are 25 children registered.

Parents participate

In the co-operative spirit, parents participate in the making of policy and administration and also attend children's activities during the week to make up the complement of staff to give the required ratio of 1 adult to every 5 children. There are three full-time paid staff members. Volunteers from the student community who do not have children in attendance also help.

Jenny Lowther, the supervisor of Day Care, received her training in England in the form of a two year Nursery Nurse Examination Board course. The course dealt with all aspects of child care for children from birth to 5 years of age. She has also had experience with retarded, blind and deaf children, has worked in hospitals and has been a teacher in a nursery school for 7 years.

Ann Chenier, one of the three full-time paid staff members is a trained child-care worker, having taken a two year course at the Beach Grove division of Kingston Psychiatric Hospital. She has had extensive experience working with children, especially with the emotionally disturbed.

Vlasta Riha received nursery school training in Czechoslovakia, and at the Day Care Centre she has charge of the children under 2 years of age.

Centre Understaffed

For a variety of reasons, the Day Care centre at present is greatly understaffed. Miss Chenier told the Journal that "without the student volunteers the problem would be acute." In fact, the Day Care centre was forced to close its doors, last week due to lack of sufficient staff. "Without a number of workers there can be little leeway within the programme," she added.

A basic problem Mrs. Lowther cited was that "the parents are not coming to do the work." She feels that "the co-operative aspect is not going too well." She added that "a lot of responsibility is being placed on a few."

Activities with the children are carried out informally with groups of children of different ages. Children arrive and depart at varing times of the day and their play groupings take place spontaneously with the workers that are present.

On a usual day most of the children have arrived by 9 a.m. Those children under 2 years of age are supervised on the second floor; those older than two years have the "run" of the downstairs.

Mrs. Lowther spoke of the need to split the children into 3 groups: those under 2 years, those 2 and 3 years, and into a group of children 3 and 4 years of age. "The needs of these three age groups are very different," she explained. But with the limited amount of space and staff, it just is not feasible.

On days of good weather the children make use of three playground areas around the house. In one area there are toys, in another, swings and monkey bars, and there is sand, in another area for "rough-house" play.

Sometimes the children are taken for walks, perhaps over to the Agnes Etherington Art Centre where they might be asked for their interpretation of the art on display. The children respond well to outings.

A hot lunch, consisting of meat, vegetables, desert and milk is provided by the parents at 11:30, after which the children settle down for a rest. A snack, usually consisting of fruit, cookies, bread and milk is provided in the morning and following the sleep time in the afternoon.

Time is given to fantasy play, sing-songs, story-telling, painting and drawing throughout the day. However it is, as Miss Chenier says, "a flexible plan." She feels that "it is important also to allow the children to freely interact with each other in unstructured time periods."

Open all year

The Centre is open all year round and in the summer, accomodates a number of children with parents in Summer school.

Fees consist of an initial registration fee of $7.50 and a weekly fee of $10.00 regarldess of the amount of time the child stays at the centre. For the parents who are unable to attend the minimum of 6 hours per week, an additional fee of $7.50 is payable. There has been a recent proposal that instead of this $10.00 levy, the parent may pay $2.00 for every hour of the weekly six which he does not attend.

The Centre is licensed by the Ontario government. No rent is paid for the house, which Queen's owns. The university also pays for heating and building maintenance. The co-operative is responsible for all other work including cleaning of the interior and the provision and care of the equipment. Mrs. Lowther commented that there was very little money to spend on equipment, despite a grant of $110 made by the university for that purpose, and that the centre greatly depended on gifts and donations.

Considerable parent participation in running of the centre is necessary. The parents duties include: a minimum of four hours per week with children activities, lunch-cooking once a month, cleaning which requires ¾ hour per week, and the making and repairing of equipment which involves one workshop every two months.

Fees are kept to a minimum since the majority of parents have a low income. Paid assistance is also kept as low as possible.

The Centre's location on the campus makes it convenient for both students and university staff. Several of the parents are married to full-time students and are employed on campus by the university. Some of the children have a single parent and for them full-time child care is a necessity. (There are also a number of children whose parents are not involved at Queen's.)

The present premises on Queen's Crescent were designated for use by the day-care centre in 1971 for a few years only. It was then envisaged moving the Centre to other accomodation such as the house now occupied by the department of Public Administration on Albert Street and Union Street. While this house is large and surrounded by a garden, it is not ideally suited for use as a Day-Care centre.

Experience at 76 Queen's Crescent has shown that a converted house has several disadvantages for day-care use. The division of children on several floors makes supervision of them more difficult. During normal operation it is difficult to negotiate stairways with young children and could be hazardous in the case of fire. A greater number of staff is needed when children are accomodated in several rooms. The rooms are generally not large enough for running games.

Could be model centre

"Queen's Day-Care Centre could be a model centre for the rest of Ontario", Mrs. Lowther commented. However there are many difficulties in having the centre dependent on Queen's. "We can't go much further without something more definite than we've had in the past from Queen's," she said, adding that "I think we are almost at stalemate."

The Complex Co-operative Nursery School is located in the Queen's Married Students Apartments at 47 Van Order Drive. The Nursery School occupies a suite designed for occupation by children and built as an integral part of the apartment complex.

The Nursery School functions as a school. Parents participate in the making of policy and administration but the children's programmes are arranged by staff with nursery school training. Parent's attendance at the class sessions is in the capacity of teacher's aide.

Children between the ages of 2 and 4 years are accepted. There are two sessions a day of 2½ hours each, one in the morning, the other in the afternoon. Children do not attend both sessions. The School operates from September to May. In 1971 the premises were used for a summer session but no activity is planned for this summer.

There is an average of 60 children in attendance on any day: 15 children in each of two classes in the morning or afternoon sessions. Of the children registered in April 1972, 9 were children of Queen's staff, 47 were children of Queen's students and 11 were children of parents not at Queen's.

There is a $5.00 registration fee and monthly fees are as follows: $12.00 per month for 2 sessions a week; $16.50 per month for 3 sessions a week; and $20.00 for 5 sessions a week.

The Nursery is licensed by the government of Ontario and occupies part of the Married Students Complex which is managed by Grahem Thompson, Realtor. No rental is paid for the use of the accomodation. Maintenance and repairs are paid for by Grahem Thompson.

Two full-time teachers are employed by the Nursery.

The Nursery functions according to the wishes of the participating parents. The premises were made available to the committee of interested parents in the fall of 1969. At that time it was decided to use the facilities for the benefit of the children in a nursery school setting for a few hours a day. This continues to be the wishes of

Kennedy will meet staff

On Thursday October 19, Vice Principal R. Kennedy assured an Interim Committee of the Queen's staff Association, an association of the non academic staff, that the university is prepared to meet regularly with this group to discuss matters of concern.

The Interim Committee has finished laying the groundwork for the establishment of a staff association. An election of executive officers will be held on Thursday at noon in Ellis Auditorium.

Commerce plans evaluation

Last week the Commerce Student - Faculty Committee designed a course evaluation questionnaire which will be presented to Dean Hand, Dean of the School of Business for approval this week.

Two course evaluation guides will be published this year, one in January and the other late next term.

John Telgman, President of the Commerce Society told the Journal that the purpose of the guide "is to make professors aware of how they come across to students."

It will be of little benefit to students in the selection of courses as Commerce students have no choice until 3rd year.

The proposed questionnaire is based on a leaflet distributed by the Educational Testing Service of New Jersey.

"This was the most comprehensive questionnaire of the one's available to us from other institutions," said Steve Klein, 3rd year representative on the student faculty committee.

Commerce students will be asked to rate their professors on a variety of subjects such as how he uses class time, whether or not he is available for consultation and his ability to make his students understand the material.

Three subsequent sections of questions deal with workload, class size and the quality of readings, assignments and exams.

Students plan open house

A group of Queen's students is organizing an Open House on February 11 and 12 in conjunction with the Kingston Tercentenary Committee, the AMS, Queen's Alumni and J.A. Courtwright, Vice Principal of Development and Information.

The open house will include department displays, films, mini courses and lectures and tours for high school students.

Volunteers are needed to act as hosts, guides, traffic directors and committee workers. Interested students should contact the initiators of the project at 29 Charles St., 544-2157.

NATIONAL UNION FORMED

with each province having equal voting power.

They feared the organization could become controlled by Ontario and Quebec under representation by population, and insufficient attention would be paid to Atlantic regional problems. They also claimed representation by institution would result in too unwieldy a body.

After being voted down overwhelmingly the Atlantic delegates supported the Quebec proposal, but it was defeated.

A compromise began to emerge as Ontario and BC delegates appeared willing to allow each province the right to appoint delegates to NUS as it chose. A measure to allow schools to give their regional or provincial associations proxy votes gained wide support and was eventually passed.

Although the delegates came close to agreement on methods of delegate selection, the conference floundered over the allocation of delegates to various regions and provinces.

Just after the Quebec proposals for regional representation was defeated, the University of Guelph introduced a motion declaring both institutional and regional appointment were valid methods of delegate selection. Most delegates from west of the Ottawa River hoped that this, along with the proxy voting proposal, would sufficiently appease Quebec and the Atlantic Provinces.

- The two dissenting regions immediately caucussed. Delegates were sharply divided on whether the new proposal was acceptable. Carleton student council President Bruce Cameron, who served on the national steering committee, entering the caucus room with a compromise.

The Cameron plan would have allowed each province to determine its mode of representation but would have divied the size of representation as follows: six per cent to each of the four Atlantic provinces, 20 per cent to Quebec, 20 per cent to Ontario, seven per cent to each of the three Prairie Provinces and 25 per cent to B.C.

It was immediately attacked for giving over-representation to the Atlantic provinces.

The University of Alberta threatened to withdraw if the proposal passed. Prairie delegates, who had strongly rejected the regionalism concept, caucussed and produced a plan for modified rep by pop - one vote for every 5000 students or fraction thereof.

The Atlantic Province delegates angrily rejected this plan and McGill and Bishop's made a counter-proposal which the Prairies and many Ontario and BC delegates found equally unacceptable, calling for a 100-member assembly of which 30 delegates would be chosen on the basis of three per province, and 70 would be allocated by provincial student population.

At this point, Dawson CEGEP from Montreal walked out, saying, "this conference has proven to us that the federal concept of representation within the present boundaries of Canada cannot permit democratic process."

Amid considerable uproar and confusion, Cameron's original percentage proposal as rejected and the Prairie rep-by-population plan accepted.

Then delegates representing the Atlantic schools walked out.

All Atlantic schools appeared willing to negotiate further and said they would return to their student councils to discuss it.

Immediately after the eastern walkout, most of the 11 Quebec delegations left.

"We've got to start somewhere," Simon Fraser representative and steering committee Member Michael Warsh said. "We must continue to form this organization and by starting small. We will build our strength. I urge the remaining delegates (mostly from Ontario, the Prairies and BC) to remain and proceed."

And proceed they did through more than five hours of seemingly endless wrangles over amendments to the proposed constitution, some major, but most minor.

(Cameron left the meeting after the walkouts, because he had lost his credibility with the remaining delegations. He did not play a major role in the conference again until Sunday during the elections to the central committee, when he ran and was defeated twice.

They adopted the declaration of the Canadian student, which formerly served as part of the constitution CUS.

In the context of this year's struggle against government-ordered fee increases and student award difficulties, the declaration seemed particularly appropriate. It concludes the clause "The Canadian student has the right to be free to continue his education without any material, economic, social or psychological barriers, created by the absence of real equality of essential conditions."

In a controversial move, they added a by-law which requires one-half of all NUS committees be composed of women.

The vote was 24-16-8 with such traditionally conservative student councils as Saskatchewan (Saskatoon) and York voting for it.

DAY CARE

the parents. Thus the Nursery offers a well-run educational and social environment for the benefit of the children of the Queen's community and the community-at-large.

Doesn't aid course taking

The mode of operation of the Nursery does not significantly aid those parents who wish to attend courses at Queen's or those who work. At the same time there has been no desire to extend the sessions to provide day-care. The present Executive summarize their feelings about changing to a day-care operation by pointing out that there is no demonstrated demand for change, that very much more organization would be required, and that it would involve a departure from the present emphasis on "learning".

From the point of view of the university administration the use to which the children's facilities are put can be a significant factor in both housing policy and admissions policy. It is possible that if the facilities were used for full-time day-care, for example, and this fact were advertised to prospective students the university would be able to attract more students who have children. Whether or not it is desirable to attract students who have children is, of course, a matter of university policy.

There is an increasing number of adults, today returning to university to do further studies after a few years of working experience.

The graduate students, representing only 11.7 per cent of the student community, have 42.4 per cent of students' children. Thus, graduates are most likely to benefit from child-care facilities than are undergraduates.

By the same evidence, graduate students might be attracted to the university by the presence of well-established child-care facilities.

Day care still a novelty

Using day-care is still a novelty in the minds of most Canadians even in the minds of those most likely to benefit. The response from prospective students with families could well be impressive when faced with the proposition, "Queen's has facilities to help you look after your children while you study or work."

It rests largely with the university's policy-makers to decide to what extent and in what way child-care facilities should be supported. In any case the monetery commitment to both existing facilities is considerable. The university or its agents have provided the two buildings in which the facilities are housed and in the case of the Complex Co-operative Nursery School have provided equipment and janitorial services.

The Course Evaluation Guide committee is holding an open meeting tonight to discuss last year's effort and to formulate plans for the 1973 ediditon of the guide.

Perhaps a few things can be kept in mind this year that seemed lacking in previous years.

It is essential to: evaluate first year courses, section by section. These courses are the ones that are taken by the greatest number of people who have the least information available to them regarding the courses.

A first year course book published this year, (albeit it had bigger type and some more up-to-date information,) was a waste of money and effort as it was in essence a rehash of the Arts Calendar.

If a professor doesn't have anything to say other than what he said in the calendar, don't bother. It is a costly repetition.

Numerical ratings concerning the quality of courses and the ability of the instructors should be introduced, along with the purely subjective evaluations compiled by representatives of the DSC's.

Such objective representation is necessary in order to provide a valid and comprehensive guide. It also ensures that a fuller picture of a course and instructor is revealed rather than merely the particular bias of the person compiling the evaluation.

A reply

Dear Editor:

This is in reply to "Turner Replys" (Q.J., Nov. 3)

As is her custom, Miss Turner has garbled the facts and issues to which she replies.

It should be pointed out that contrary to Miss Turner's erroneous allegations concerning the meeting of October 28th, at which she was not present in any relevant sense, no "constitutional moves" were made, but rather a procedural change was made, and this with the consent of the committee concerned. The rest of Miss Turner's statements are equally inaccurate, but because this meeting was held in camera, a clear statement of the matters to which she alludes is not possible without a breach of faith. One wishes that where a person feels, at liberty to break a trust, they would at least do so accurately!

With respect to the main point of Miss Turner's letter, she says, "I personally feel that I can handle the two committments," (AMS and ASUS Orientation Committee), and goes on to cite Kathy McSweeny as an example of precedent stating, "she . . . managed to perform both functions satisfactorily."

In light of fact that when asked by Miss Turner, Miss McSweeny stated that because of her position on the Orientation Committee, she found herself unable to carry out any duties or responsibilities on the AMS other than attending the bi-weekly meetings, it would appear to be an instance of bad faith for Miss Turner to completely disregard those statements in a rather obvious attempt to support her own doubtful position.

Further, it must be pointed out that there are important differences in the situation Miss McSweeny was in, and the one Miss Turner presently finds herself. For example, the former was in an arts programme, the latter is in a science programme, the former was appointed to the Orientation Committee in October, and elected to the AMS in February of the following year after the bulk of the committee work for orientation had been done, the latter was elected to the AMS in February and then nominated to the Orientation Committee, in October with the bulk of the planning, organizing, selecting, etc still to be done concurrently with her previous and first obligation to the AMS.

At a time when the AMS is plagued with resignations, accused of inaction and poor management, and suffers generally from a lack of people to carry their share of the responsibilities, one might well ask what right an elected representative has in accepting another committment which will beyond doubt make that person significantly less effective than he could have been had he not accepted the later commitment.

It is time that persons elected to Outer Council take their positions seriously. They are elected by their respective faculties as that faculty's representative to the AMS, and as such they have certain duties and obligations. Any student can attend the meetings of outer council, move or second motions, and speak to items on the agenda, so presumably the elected representative is more than this. One would think that because the elected members have a vote, their duties and responsibilities go much deeper than mere attendance of AMS meetings.

How, one asks, can they vote intelligently or debate questions with any effectiveness unless they have spent the time required to inform themselves of the issues? How can they be faculty representatives unless they take the time to canvass opinion on the various matters coming before Outer Council? How can they effect policy considerations or make needed changes unless they spend their time in the various commissions and committees of the AMS that are charged with particular tasks? How indeed?

One does not expect a person to turn into some sort of superman upon election to the AMS but one does expect, and in fact, a duty lies upon a person so elected, to carry out his or her responsibilities to the best of their abilities.

It is one thing to use the cliche "student apathy" as a justification. It is quite another to face up to the problem and deal with it in an effective way. When do we start to profit from past experience? When will we realize that effective government depends upon more than good leadership?

Action if it is to be forthcoming, must it come from the level of the faculty societies and there representatives, if for no other reason than that it is they and not AMS Outer Council who are responsible for any initiative in this matter.

Marvin Bloos
Kathy McSweeny.

Demonstration?

Dear Editor:

The Alma Mater Society wishes to disassociate itself entirely from the demonstration proposed by the OFS for November 21 over the fee issue. We see it as a futile venture of which will simply create hostilities in various quarters without advancing the cause for which we are working.

Three weeks ago we urged Queen's students to vote in favour of boycotting January fees for the following reasons:

1. We wanted to impress upon the Davis government the strength of our committment to a system of higher education in which universal accessibility received top priority. The one hundred dollar fee hike combined with the regressive changes in the Ontario Student Award Program appeared to us as a giant step towards an even more elitist system of higher education than that already obtaining. Ontario has long passed the level of affluence at which education should be accessible to rich and poor alike - a fee hike is no way to realize this ideal.
2. We wished to express our displeasure at the arbitrary manner in which the Davis government has acted throughout the issue. It neither consulted students prior to the fee hike nor attempted to explain its decision afterwards to the OFS; - any group of citizens deserves better than that.

A week later, Queen's students turned out in greater proportions than at any other university in Ontario to vote heavily 57 per cent in favour of a fee boycott. Having expressed our commitment to the goals of universal accessibility and student consultation so firmly, we do not think another round of muscle flexing is necessary in the least. At this point, a demonstration can do absolutely nothing towards the realization of our gains; at worst, it can seriously jeopardize them by the animosity it might create.

Rather than making a redundant show of strength, the OFS should be concentrating on high powered negotiations. If these fail, fine, we will have to reconsider the alternatives. However, until we have exhausted the available channel, let's not start clenching our fists. A demonstration would be simply a waste of energies right now.

We apologize

Dear Editor:

Well, it seems that the Queen's Journal has managed to screw things again! I'm talking about the Queen's-RMC debate last Thursday (Oct. 19): resolved that the Canadian content of our Universities be raised. First, there were a number of downright errors and misquotes. The first Queen's speaker is reported as saying that there were 13,000 jobless Canadians Ph.D's last year. The figure actually quoted was 3,000. The first Queen's speaker was also quoted as saying that "25 per cent of all new faculty hired tend to be from other countries." The figure given for the year 1971-72 was 75 per cent. Secondly, there were gross distortions of what was actually said. The Queen's team quoted a case occuring at MacMaster University's Department of Politics. MacMaster students requested that a course on Canadian Foreign Relations be offered in the 1972-73 school year. Howard Lentmer (?) the American head of the MacMaster Department of Politics, not only hired an American to teach the course, but changed the name of the course from Canadian Foreign Relations to International Politics. This incident was cited as evidence that the growing demand on the part of Canadian students for courses with Canadian content is not being met, due to the fact that a large number of the faculty at our universities are non Canadian who lack a sufficient knowledge of or sufficient interest in Canadian affairs.

... A poverty like we had never seen before is undoubtedly etched upon each of our minds

Two Queen's students were participants at the International Seminar held this summer in Lima, Peru, sponsored by World University Service of Canada. Here they relate the political and social conditions in Peru today...

By Jonathan Rayner

From Lima's Jorge Chavez International Airport, the route into Lima proper is a confusion of fragile, improvised huts that constitute the major part of lower class housing in Peru. The contrast between the sleak, ultramodern, cement and glass structure of the airport that boasts the most up-to-date technical equipment which would rival any European or American airport and the horror of the slums into which the unsuspecting foreigner is immediately plunged is indeed shocking. But the povery is so widespread and has become such an inherent characteristic of Latin American countries that the initial violent reaction soon gives way to a resigned attitude of acceptance. The appalling conditions seemed to be just one more example of the "inevitable" results of a turbulent history of class conflict. Here we were confronted by the evidence.

The impact of the squalor leaves one incredulous and that first glimpse of poverty, a poverty like we had never seen before, is undoubtedly etched indelibly upon each of our minds. The feeling of depression was heightened by the total lack of colour of the landscape: the abode brick (mud and straw) houses blended into the arid desert coastal land, set against a backdrop of stark Andean foothills. And over everything hung the grey mist that blankets the city during the winter months (June to September).

The slums are commonly called "barriadas" but are euphemistically referred to as "pueblo jovenes" (young towns) by the revolutionary government of Juan Velasco de Alvarado. Although the vast majority of the Lima population lives in the barriadas, it is interesting to note that the government has done little if anything to improve conditions. It should be realized that unlike the slums of North American cities which develop around the centre and expand as the middle class migrates to the suburbs; Latin American slums spring up on the outskirts of the city. Because of the insignificant size of the Peruvian middle class, the barriadas have taken the place of the suburbs and expand outward as the rural population is attracted to the city. The principle concern of the government is stemming the tide of "campesinos" who forsake the land in the mountains after hearing of the opportunities for employment in the cities. There is little incentive to remain on the land, especially for the young people, and no matter what conditions in the city are like they will certainly be no worse than those existing in the country.

In combatting the deteriorating situation, the Velasco administration has two alternatives. The first is to begin reform on the land in an attempt to control the migration at its source. This is in fact, the government policy at the present time. The second alternative is to improve conditions in the cities, a futile task given the fact that the overwhelming majority of these people lack even the most basic skills that would enable them to secure employment.

To most of the barriada dwellers, employment consists of selling cheap items of clothing, cosmetics, jewellery, household utensils, in short everything and anything imaginable. These products are secured through a middleman who buys in bulk, distributes the merchandise among his vendors to be sold on the streets and then collects the meager earnings of which a minute portion goes to the vendors as a wage. An individual might earn between $20 and $30 a month on which he and his family must exist as best they can. The intence poverty forces other members of the family to seek what employment is available to them. The mother might also sell merchandise on a street corner or else wash clothes or beg; the children are taken out of school after the second or third year to shine shoes or carry cases, adding their few soles (the Peruvian currency) to the family income.

Living conditions themselves are appalling. The barriadas can be divided into "upper" and "lower" classes depending on their age. The first established are situated closest to the centre of Lima and they become progressively more sordid the farther one travels from the city. To cite an example, I will refer to a barriada called Comas which I visited with a Canadian Oblate priest, Gilles Moncion, who runs a technical school in this particular barriada. Comas is an "upper class" barriada with a population of 50,000 and a growth rate of 10 per cent a year. Established in 1954, it has had sufficient time to lay its foundations. Consequently, the majority of the houses are constructed out of adobe bricks and are laid out according to a grid system of streets. It is relatively clean, fifty per cent of the houses have running water therefore there is probably some sort of sewage disposal system, and the people are beginning to install their own electricity. Nevertheless 60 per cent of the people are undernourished although none are actually starving. Participation and the Peruvian Revolution

By Don Macdougall

In 1968 a military junta headed by Lt.-Gen. Juan Velasco Alvarado seized political power in Peru. The immediate reason was the deposed government's deliberation in nationalizing International Petroleum Company (IPC), a Standard Oil subsidiary.

The long term reason was that the army and the emerging group of technocrats had become sensitive to the foreign imperialism which was draining Peru's economy.

The Cuban revolution was a prominent factor in the changes in power. In the 1960's the middle class took over in an attempt to substitute national production for imports and thus save foreign spending. However, that government failed because the pace-setters were soon absorbed into the imperialist groups, according to a Peruvian economist at Lima's Catholic University.

The generals took over and have been in power ever since. There seems to be little serious opposition to their rule.

The revolutionary junta had a nationalistic tinge as opposed to the liberal leanings of the previous governments. From a policy of laissez-faire the government began to direct development according to its own economic criteria. Peruvian problems fell under a new type of analysis.

I.P.C. was nationalized as a first step by the revoluntionary government.

Agrarian reform was the initial attempt to redistribute wealth. The first priority was to get rid of the large private landholders. Their haciendas, or plantations, were expropriated, the land divided and the titles given to the peasants. However, the amount of arable land in Peru is small and it soon became evident that the family farm was unsuited for this largely mountainous country.

Therefore the government was forced to change its policy to collectivized farms. Peasants who had taken orders all of their lives could not easily assume the responsibilities which came with the ownership of their land. The result, then, was that the landowners have had their power removed but the farm managers, whose power has increased, still operate the farms and the peasants are still taking orders from them.

Because there are so many problems to solve it is most difficult to determine priorities for Peru. Although the military is highly autonomous, the business community still exerts its pressure on economic policy. Foreign firms still heavily control secondary manufacturing plants in Peru.

Peru needs capital but her people keep their savings under their mattresses, not invested in the stock exchange. Therefore foreign capital accumulates and with it the fear of foreign domination.

"I came here with a master's degree in economics but I have no answers," complained one frustrated Canadian teaching public administration in Lima. "There are no solutions," she continued, "because you just can't count on the human factor."

Public participation has always been a problem in Peruvian politics.

The revolutionary military government has created SINAMOS (National System to Support Social Mobilization) in an effort to both divert opposition and to create public support. This idea, original to Peru, has given the country a Marxist school of thought. The government has enlisted students, intellectuals, activists and former guerilla fighters and is using them to agitate the people and get them participating in the new reforms.

The military government itself is not communist and, therefore, this policy could be dangerous if in ten years the participators turn on the government.

Basically, SINAMOS was created to mobilize political forces without being put in the place of being a political party.

However, critics have seen SINAMOS's role as a prevention of social-conscience mobilization at the grass-roots level which would produce a real revolution. Therefore, the dilemma of political reform from the top has not been solved.

SINAMOS is a social experiment in Peru and the question arises whether such an underdeveloped country needs the philosophy of participation. Politically it could be correct but its terms and philosophy are sometimes misleading.

In a country where change comes slowly and villages and farming areas seem completely isolated from the government and political life, slogans such as SINAMOS's "participation es revolucion" may have little meaning.

On the other hand, transforming Peru from its position as a colony exporting oil, copper and fishmeal to the industrial world takes a strong government.

Former governments were manipulated by groups outside of power. One of ex-President Belaunde's former top officials readily conceded that this is the first government which is in power in the full extent of that word.

Because there are so many problems to solve, it is difficult to determine priorities in Peru

Queen's Modern Dance Company

"The Twice Born" displays Company's potential

Sandra Aitken and Joseph Riha warming up

-macpherson

by Sue Denim

Dance is one of the most intriguing of the artistic modes, for like the pigments on a painter's palette and the words in a playwright's script, dancers manipulate their bodies to tell a story, to give an impression and to convey emotions in a highly articulate manner.

The Queen's Modern Dance Company's first production, The Twice Born: The Legend of Dionysus, which ran last Thursday through Sunday evening in the Guild Hall Theatre utilized these prerequisites fully. A company of eight told the story of the birth of the God of Revelry and Feasting with conviction, and Miss Sandra Aitken's choreography hit its peak in several outstanding sequences.

The seduction of Semele by Zeus, danced by Miss Aitken and Tony Morgan was beautifully sensual and erotically performed. Here, the delicacy of the act, and the sincerity of the performers emphasized the heights to which dance can convey this pinnacle of human emotional experience in a manner which can become very mundane in any other medium of expression.

The Jealousy of Hera, with Miss Aitken and Vlasta Riha, abetted by Morison Back's excellent accompaniment on the drums was the most rhythmically exciting of the evening. Miss Aitken and Mrs. Riha performed their tantalizing cat and mouse game with confidence and an aire of cocky preciseness.

And Joseph Riha as Pluto was extremely captivating as Pluto in his fight with Dionysus in Hades. His physical command of the stage and the intrinsic strength in his character made the confrontation with Dionysus powerful both dramatically and emotionally.

Mr. Morgan seemed much more relaxed and confident when dancing with Miss Aitken. In his solo, the Birth of Dionysus, he seemed overtly nervous and rather forced, yet in the final sequence when he was reunited with Semele he regained his smooth command of movement.

Bill Buxton's soundtrack was not as effective as was the incidental music provided by Scott MacKenzie and Morison Bock. It was more a sound effect than a rhythmical accompaniment for the dancers.

The chorus sequences were also weaker than the routines which featured Miss Aitken, Mr. Morgan and Joseph and Vlasta Riha because the dynamism of the latter group was not evident.

The production was considerably well attended and on Saturday evening a second show was performed because so many people were unable to be seated for the first showing.

The Queen's Modern Dance Company will continue to perform original scenarios throughout the year, choreographed by Miss Aitken, and if this first production is an indication of the potential of the company then their future programmes promise to be very exciting indeed.

Queen's Drama Department presents

The Mother

Tomorrow evening, the Queen's Drama Department will present its first major production of the year, Bertolt Brecht's The Mother.

The Mother was written in late 1931, just over a year before Hitler gained power. Based on Gorky's novel, it is the last and largest of Brecht's Lehrstucke (plays of learning). First produced in Berlin on January 17, 1932 the show was closed because it was "too subversive." Brecht produced The Mother with Antigone and Mother Courage during the Berliner Ensemble's first season, an indication of his high regard for the play. This is the premiere production of the show in Canada, and it is certainly the first Canadian production with music based on the Russian Revolution.

The play treats the Russian Revolution as a fable to examine why people become revolutionaries and how revolutionaries behave. The Mother is dynamic, not static - we see people in action, not people talking about action. It encompasses the entire range of human activity and feelings - despair, anger, curiosity, fervor, pain, joy, fear, hope. Although The Mother has been condemned by communist critics for "not being proletarian enough" and although it has been condemned by bourgeois critics for being "too propagandistic" all have agreed that "it is moving and impressive", that "the mother herself is a richly human character".

To emphasize the exemplary nature of the play, (the Revolution occurred 15 years before it was written and 55 years before this production) an ensemble of one dozen performers has been cast to play the more than three dozen characters in the show. Such extensive doubling enforces the consciousness on which Brecht correctly insisted of performer as cabaret entertainer, not as the "real character". The company's goal is to entertain our audience by clarifying through song, dance, and action the central social fact of the twentieth century --- socialist revolution.

The production will be held in Convocation Hall on November 8, 9, 10, 11, and 16, 17, 18, starting at 8:30 p.m. Tickets are $2.00 for the general public and $1.00 for students, and are available in the Department of Drama office, Old Arts building.

Domino Theatre Preview

"Black Comedy" is far from Black

Actors rehearse blindfolded

by Sandy Naiman

Peter Shaffer's hilarious farce, Black Comedy, opens Friday night at the Domino Theatre. At rehearsal last Thrusday night, several members of the cast were trying to overcome the major problem of the play, that is to be unable to see on a well lit stage. For the blackness of this comedy has no political underpinnings or sociological grotesqueries of any sort. There are no overtones of Gent, Beckett or Pirandello in this little piece, instead it is much more in league with Chaplin, Keaton and W.C.Fields.

It is a comedy about lack of light and the gimmick that Shaffer imposes upon it is a reversal of lighting effects. When a fuse blows in a London apartment, the lights on stage come up although everyone is plunged into darkness. When light is restored, the lights on stage dim down.

Owen Moulton, who plays Brinsely, Douglas Crawford as the Colonel, Tony Ibbotson as Harold, Jennifer Hodges as Clea and Janine Prevost as Carol, have all discovered during their three weeks of rehearsal that each has a different way of handling this blindness problem. With constant threats from Director Nancy Helwig of blindfolding all of them or of turning out the lights, they were still anticipating their moves and seeing things they should not be seeing.

Finally, Mrs. Helwig's threat became a reality and the stage was blackened, so that nobody could see anything except when Tony Ibbotson, as Harold, came out with a candle to verbally castrate his soon to be exed roommate Brinsely.

Mrs. Helwig's direction is, to say the least, meticulous, for she refuses to let even the smallest faux pas go unnoticed and will run through a sequence again and again until it has been completely ironed out.

In fact, last weekend in order to allow the actors to see what they were doing, she videotaped a rehearsal with all of them blindfolded.

Athough the set was far from finished during this rehearsal, Robert Montheith, who designed the sets for Guys and Dolls earlier this year was busily rushing around making notes and drawings, collecting furniture and other pieces of bric a brac to add to the London flat setting.

The rehearsal ran two hours without a break and the actors were exhausted when it was finished, but as Mrs. Helwig mentioned later, they are telescoping into one month, the work that took the original cast, in 1967, six months to do.

Black Comedy runs three consecutive weekends from November 10th to November 26th. Tickets can be purchased at the theatre,at 8 Princess Street or at Mahoods, and are $2 and $1.50 for students.

Another attempt, this time without blindfolds

Division of Concerts

Modern Classics

by Michael Hodgson

If you saw a concert pianist hitting the keys with his fists and forearms, what would you think? Franzpeter Goebels played that way during his recital in Dunning Hall; but I think most of us who were there came away convinced that this charming and obviously musical man is seriously committed to the music he plays. After hearing his recital, I can't be one of those sceptics who thinks modern classical music is nothing but noise.

Concert goers are used to a milk-diet of Romantic masterpeices: Mr. Goebels instead gave us the spicy music of Stravinsky, Webern, Messiaen, and Stockhausen. This exhiliarating music is rarely heard in concerts, and therefore difficult for the listener. But the pianist won us over completely by his reverent and expert interpretations.

As he put it in his engaging manner, "don't be surprised if I use my elbows on the piano. You know I can also play with my fingers." Indeed he can, and he demonstrated this in his first piece "C minor Fantasy" of C.P.E. Bach, that avant- gardiste of the 18th Century who is so little heard today. This music was full of dramatic gestures that are as unsettling today as they must have been 200 years ago. Later in the program Mr. Goebels played three "sonatas" by the Baroque composer Domenico Scarlatti in fine harpsichord style with a stunning finger technique (and even a glissando). Without a break he went into a beautifully paced performance of the Stravinsky "Sonata" (1925). In its Adagietto in particular, by turns whimsical and discreet, we heard delicious sonorities that even the repeated ringing of the Dunning Hall class bell couldn't spoil.

In a very different style were the "Variations" (1936), of Webern, economical and profound music that was most effective in haunting subdued passages. No doubt everybody enjoyed the two selections by Olivier Messiaen - "Neums rhythmiques" and "L'Alouette calandrelle" - which were convincingly carried along by their flamboyant and powerful rhythms - and the page turner's nightmares in trying to follow devilish score!

For me the highlight of the evening was the "Piano Piece IX" (1954) of Karlheinz Stockhausen. Mr. Goebels gave this difficult work an endless variety of tone and dynamics, and yet also an emotional logic, beginning in rigid bass chords and drifting away in a spray of notes in the treble. The program ended with a "choral prelude" of J. S. Bach, which was performed wonderfully, with every melodic line distinct and toneful. This is a piece over 200 years old: the idioms are very different, and yet the language of music is the same - a fresh, powerful, and moving language when the performer is as intelligent and enthusiastic as Mr. Goebels.

As I left the hall I felt ashamed that so few people know the modern classics of our time that he had performed for us. Mr. Goebels devoted his life to spreading the gospel of this music: it was all summed up in the title of that Bach choral prelude - "Sleepers Awake!"

Dunning Hall Series

Israel's Outstanding Musicians

On Tuesday 7 November at 8:30 p.m., the Israeli Trio opens the popular Dunning Hall Series of chamber music concerts. This event is sponsored by the Division of Concerts at Queen's University.

The Israeli Trio is comprised of clarinet, 'cello and piano. This combination allows the artists to perform rarely heard trios as well as popular duos. The November 7 programme consists of Beethoven's Trio Opus 11, the popular Debussy's Sonata for 'Cello and Piano and two works by Brahms - the Clarinet and Piano Sonata in F Minor and the magnificent Trio, Opus 114.

The Trio has been acclaimed throughout Israel as one of that country's most outstanding accomplishments in the cultural field. Indeed what makes the Trio so illustrious is the virtuoso quality of each member combined with the constant concern for ensemble playing.

Uzi Wiesel, 'cellist, has studied in Israel as well as at the Julliard School of Music in New York. Pnina Salzman, pianist, a child prodigy at 8, has performed with many leading musicians in the world. Yona Ettlinger, clarinetist, is also an acclaimed orchestral musician, performing with the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra.

Waterpolo Gaels on top in OUAA-East

Queen's waterpolo Gaels defeated Toronto and York by scores of 13-9 and 9-8 respectively in OUAA waterpolo action this weekend in Toronto. The 2 wins gave Queen's the championship in the OUAA east division, with a record of 7 wins and 1 loss.

During the league season, Queen's amassed 111 goals while allowing only 42.

In the other games in the tournament, scores were York 10, Ottawa 6 and Toronto 15, Ottawa 7.

In typical Queen's fashion the Gaels waited until the last 2 seconds to score the winning goal against York. A very nervous Queen's team fell behind 7-3 entering the final period of play, however, the Gaels fought back to record the win. Chris Whately fired four goals for Queen's while George Craig added two more. Singles went to Rick Zajchowski, Dave Howard, and Steve Patterson.

In the game against Toronto, Queen's got off to a fast start scoring 4 goals on the Blues in the opening quarter of play. However, Toronto fought back and closed the gap to 10-7 in the third period. The fourth period saw the Gaels reassert themselves and the final score was Queen's 13, Toronto 9.

Scoring for Queen's were Chris Whately with 4 goals, Archie Nesbitt, and Rick Zajchowski with 3 each and Jack Muir, Dave Howard and Steve Patterson with 1 each.

The win gives Queen's the Eastern OUAA championships in only their third year of competition, a great tibute to the job coach Simon Beitler has done. Next weekend in the OUAA finals at York, Queen's meets Western and McMaster, the reigning champions. Coach Simon Beitler is looking forward to a Western sandwich and a big Mac for lunch.

Etobicoke dominates swim meet

Queen's University played host to a six club coed swim meet this past weekend that saw some of Canada's top swimmers take part in day-long competition. Led by Merrily Stratten and Bill Woodley, the Etobicoke Swim Club from Toronto finished in first place by a commanding margin. Ottawa Kingfish were second, Scarborough Swim Club were third Queen's fourth and CFB Kingston fifth.

Queen's competitors ran into some stiff competition chiefly from the Toronto club and did not place high in the standings. However, coach Larry Brawley was well pleased with the performance of his team. Kathy Brace finished fourth in the women's 200 yard breaststroke, while Rob Herman won the 100 yard freestyle. John Pearson, one of the first year performers on the Queen's team, broke a team record in the 100 yard butterfly and finished second in the event.

All of the performers and coaches were enthusiastic in their praise of the operation of the meet and of the facilities available. Queen's has been recommended as the host of the Ontario Senior Championships. The meet should also serve to put Queen's into the forefront of strong inter-collegiate swim teams in Ontario.

The swim team will see its next action on November 18 when it travels to York University to take part in the OUAA relays. The team should definitely show much better with the return of George Craig and Steve Patterson from the waterpolo team and the addition of the divers coached by Dr. Nelson Freedman.

York wins 4-3

Hockey Gaels just miss

by Peter Watts

Queen's Golden Gaels put up a game effort but dropped a 4-3 decision to the York Yeomen in the championship game of the Hockey Canada Tournament Sunday afternoon at the Harty Arena. The Gaels had won their first game of the year on Saturday evening, beating Trent University 7-0, while York handed the McGill Redmen a 5-1 setback to qualify for the final game.

The tournament was jointly sponsored by Hockey Canada and the Big Brothers Association of Canada. It was one of nine regional tournaments held across Canada this past weekend.

On Saturday night, the Gaels made their 1972 debut a winning one with a 7-0 victory over a weak and inexperienced Trent team. Sporting new blue uniforms, the Gaels jumped out in front 2-0 in the first period, adding 4 more goals in the second and getting a single goal in the final period. John Cerre opened the scoring for Queen's taking a pass from right winger John Smith and firing a low shot past Trent goalie Miller Steepler. Six minutes later, Dick Dorion got his first goal of the year as he beat Steepler with a hard low drive from the right side. Stu Lang drew an assist on Dorion's goal. The Gaels led 2-0 after one period of play.

In the second period, the Gaels took control with some good passing and more skating than they had shown in the opening twenty minutes. Colin Loudon, Dave Melloy, John Smith and rookie Craig Shannon with his first goal as a Gael were the Queen's scorers. John Smith got the lone marker for Queen's in the third period.

Veteran goalie Clyde Harris played the first two periods and blocked 13 shots. Newcomer Don Hall finished the game and stopped 9 drives. At the other end of the rink, goalie Miller Steepler of Trent faced 62 shots.

Game two Saturday night featured the York Yeomen and the McGill Redmen. The winning team could have been picked in the first period although York only led 1-0 after the first twenty minutes. Al Avery counted the opening goal for York.

The first period looked very much like something one would see in the middle of the season: good hard-hitting fast hockey. The final two periods, however, showed the better-conditioned Yeomen to be the better team. Chris Christie, Barry Jenkins, and Doug Dunsmuir scored for York in the second period while Mike Quinn got the York goal in the third period. Ed Dowd scored the lone goal for the Redmen midway through the final period.

Conditioning again played a leading role in York's win over the Gaels on Sunday afternoon. Queen's fell behind 3-1 after the opening twenty minutes as Paul Cerre, Ron Maech, and Al Avery tallied for the Yeomen. John Smith got the lone Queen's goal. After a scoreless second period, the Gaels came out flying in the third period and came up with two quick goals, one by Craig Shannon and the other by Bill White. The score remained 3-3 until with less than 5 minutes to play in the period, Paul Cerre scored the winning goal from a scramble in front of the net.

Goalie Clyde Harris played an outstanding game for Queen's as he faced 47 shots. The Gaels tested Doug Hutchison and Ed Buckman 31 times; however, the first two shots, Hutchison would like to forget about. Six minutes into the opening period, Norm Goulet came down the left side on a two-man break with John Smith. Goulet faked a pass and fired a rising drive which caught Hutchison under his face mask. The rebound was flipped into the net by Smith. Hutchison was replaced in goal by Ed Buckman who finished the first period, played the second, and started the third. He was replaced after two minutes, thirty-seven seconds with the score tied 3-3. York had opened the period leading 3-1.

Colin Loudon (9) slides puck past Trent goalie Miller Steepler as Craig Shannon (6) and John Cerre (20) close in.

The Gaels loss on Sunday afternoon occurred for a number of reasons. Queen's played on Sunday without two key players: centre Jim Adair who suffered a deep bruise on his right ankle after stopping a shot in Saturday night's game, and left-winger Jim Sunstrum who missed the game because of a hip injury. The loss of these two players left only John Smith on what has to be regarded as one of the team's top lines.

Secondly, the Gaels are not yet in the best of shape. Due to commitments with the arena, they have not had sufficient time to practice and the effects showed up Sunday afternoon.

A third problem was one that hurt the Gaels virtually all of last year: an inability to move men from in front of the Queen's goal. All four of the York goals were scored after Harris had made at least one save. This too can be blamed on inexperience; nevertheless, it is one important part of their defensive game that Queen's must work hard on if they hope to do well this year in the OUAA.

On the whole, however, head coach Bob Carnegie and assistant coaches Dave Field and Graham Closs were highly pleased with the performance of their charges in their first taste of action this year. This reporter feels that the Queen's Golden Gaels, 1972-73 edition, is a stronger, better-balanced team than last year's club. With strong goaltending from veteran Clyde Harris and some capable play by backup Don Hall, the Gaels appear to be solid in the nets. Up front, one of the very pleasant surprises was the play of the so-called third line of John Cerre, Bill White and Dick Dorion. Of the ten goals scored by Queen's in two games, this line got three of them, which is an indication that the scoring punch is a little more spread out than was the case last season. Defence may still be the deciding factor but with two newcomers in Chris Clark and John Jeffrey, backed by the steady play of veterans Mike Lynch, Steve Gross and Stu Lang, the Gaels should provide a very exciting brand of hockey for Queen's fans this year. We urge you to support them.

This coming weekend, the Gaels are in Montreal for games Friday night against Loyola and Sunday afternoon against Sir George Williams University. The Gaels open their 1972-73 OUAA hockey season on Friday, November 17th at the Harty Arena at 8 p.m. Ryerson Rams will provide the opposition.

Gaels' pack bears down in loose ruck vs. Trent Saturday

Rugby ends on winning note

Queen's rugby 1st XV, plagued all season by an inability to put together the smooth team play required for winning games, pulled together for the last week of the campaign,and recorded two big wins that could be a warning for next year. The Gaels dumped Trent 38-10 in a lacklustre contest in Peterborough on Wednesday night behind Dave Murley's 22-point effort and two tries by Warren Smith. Dave Cook and Lee Doney counted the other majors for Queen's as they dominated the smaller and obviously disheartened Trent side.

The big win of the week came Saturday, in the freezing winds and frozen turf of Richardson Stadium. The 1sts downed league champions York 10-0, containing the Yeomen at every opportunity, tackling hard, and generally playing rugby as Queen's is used to playing the game. Warren Smith and Brian Titley scored tries for Queen's, with Murley adding one convert.

The Gaels' pack played its usual ferocious game, holding a clear edge in play both from the loose and set scrums, while the back line finally displayed the co-ordination to go with the great individual talent that has been lurking there all season. Of course, pride played a part too. Several Queen's veterans were in their last game for the school, and they made it a good one.

The Seconds, not to be outdone by a rejuvenated senior squad, continued on their undefeated way, eating Trent 7-3 (the 3 points are the only ones scored against the seconds this year, and they came on a penalty kick), then shutting out York 2nds by a 10-0 count. Bill Steele and Jim Ferguson scored the tries against York, as the 2nds fought through the elements to win a large territorial edge as well as the point spread.

Looking ahead, there may be an All-Ontario competition for the 2nd teams. If there is, the Gaels have to be favorites.

Basketball Gals strong on defense but lack offensive scoring punch

Queen's Golden Gals senior basketball team came up with a split in tournament action at Guelph this weekend. The Gals edged Waterloo 39-33 Friday night, behind strong defensive play and a balanced but low-scoring attack. Karen Flemming hooped 10 points to lead the Gals, while Janet Eady, Pat Patterson and rookie Kathy Kelly added 6 points each. Despite the victory, the Gals were plagued by the inaccurate shooting that gave them problems most of last year; the absence of Karen Carson and Laney Marshall, two regulars from last season who averaged about 25 points a game between them didn't help matters any, either. Coach Brenda Mackie substituted freely throughout the game, taking a look at her rookies under game conditions. Most of them stood up well.

In the second game, the Gals met the North York Athenas, a senior team from Hamilton that sports several veterans of OWIAA competition. The experience and finesse of the older Hamilton women was too much for the Gals, especially on the boards, where the Athenas enjoyed a clear edge in both offensive and defensive rebounds. Although Queen's continued to play tenacious defense, Hamilton won 65-27, knocking the Gals out of the 8-team competition.

The Gals will open their regular season with a weekend road trip to Ottawa, meeting Ottawa U. on the 17th and Carleton on the 18th. The return of Misses Marshall and Carson should inject a little scoring punch into the lineup, but Queen's has had problems with Ottawa U. for several years. The GeeGees have had considerable success against Queen's with a zone defence, and much will depend on whether the Gals have found a floor leader to run their offence, and a good outside shooter. If they have, some of last year's close losses should be wins this season, and Queen's could go a long way.

Intermediate field hockey just misses; Seniors place 4th

by Sue Moffatt

Part II of the Senior and Intermediate Field Hockey Tournaments were played in T.O. this weekend under typical Novemberish conditions that were brightened by optimism on the part of both teams.

The Intermediates entered this tournie Number One. In their first game against Laurentian, they failed to score against the burly Northerners and had to leave the score an unsatisfactory 0-0 draw.

Against U. of T., their play improved with a number of fast breaks down both wings and a powerful corner shot into the net by Leslie Ferrari. U. of T. unfortunately managed to find the weak spots in Queen's defense and penetrated 3 times to take the game 3-1.

The final game against Mac saw Queen's again draw a null score. Somehow the co-ordination and impressive team work, which has marked all the Intermediates previous games this season, was lacking, and while the play was good for such a young team it wasn't as outstanding as it has been.

The tie to Laurentian decided the standings: U. of T. came out on top by one point, ahead of our Gals. Led by their ever-smiling coach Sharon Fiori, this team should take justifiable pride in its excellent season. Consistent and determined, they have played skilled and sportsmanlike hockey any time they have been on the pitches.

The Senior team? In the nick of time the Gals finally played up to their long-suspected potential and played 4 excellent matches. Friday morning Queen's shook Waterloo's confidence by opening the scoring with a goal by Gail McLeod early in the 1st half. It took 10 minutes for Waterloo to even it up and for the remainder of the game the see-sawing score reflected the strong play of both teams. Despite Laney Marshall's tying goal in the 2nd half, Waterloo managed to put one more in on a fast break to end the closely-fought game 3-2 in 'loos favour.

That afternoon, Queen's continued to improve in consistency of passing and offence-defence co-ordination. Laney Marshall again found the corners and scored once in each half, while Sue Moffatt put in a third. Guelph failed to capitalize on any of its few forays into the Queen's defensive end, while our lapses into chaos became less frequent.

Saturday morning, cold, rain and Western greeted the Gals as they played a powerful game against, or rather, over, Western. First half play was almost entirely confined to Western's defensive end, nor could the Londoner's excessive aggressiveness overpower our defence. In the second half Queen's again dominated the play, making countless attempts on the goal and failing, incredibly, on all of them. The final draw, 0-0, was a poor reflection of the teams' relative strength as they appeared on the field.

McMaster. If any team has a finest hour then this game stands as that of Queen's seniors. Laney Marshall scored the first two goals of the game, both on hard drives from the edge of the circle on penalty corners. Mac managed to even the score by midway through the second half, but Karen Carson drove in another, again off a corner, and the score stood 3-2 for the last 15 minutes of play. Upfield passes connected, forwards back-tackled, defence intercepted on play after play. Finally, all the weeks of practice paid off in a fast-moving game highlighted (miracle of miracles) by minimal fouling and excellent team play.

Despite their good record this weekend, however, in Part I of the championships, Queen's played poorly, losing to U. of T. and tying York and McGill. They finally stood 4th of 9 teams, tied with Mac behind McGill. U. of T. led the listings, for the 12th straight game, followed by Waterloo.

Queen's excellent showing this weekend promises a good future for this young team, if they can continue to improve under the tutelage of their coach, Donna Gallagher.

Karen Carson, Jane Peterson, Laney Marshall, Emily Watson and Goalie Pat Jamieson were chosen from Queen's to attend next weekend's trial for a Junior Ontario Team for competition at this summer's Canada Games, a tribute to Miss G's coaching as well as the personal skills of the Gals.

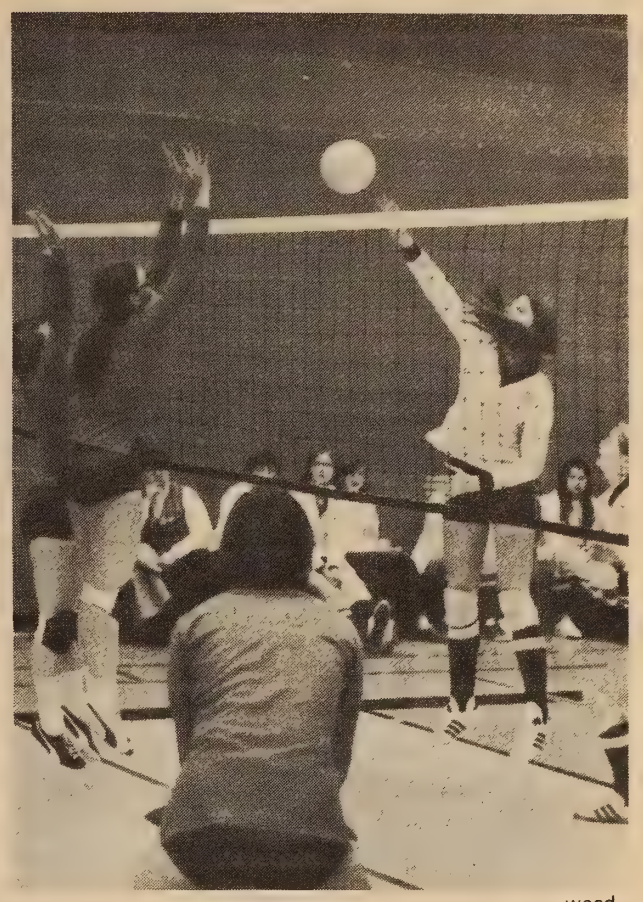
Cross-country men 7th

Queen's cross-country squad, less coach Walter Eadie and premier runner Steve Dillabough, placed a disappointing 7th out of 9 teams competing in the OUAA Cross-country meet at Guelph last Saturday. The team title was won by U. of T., whose team placed all five counting runners in the top ten finishers, an almost unbeatable effort. Western and Waterloo finished two-three in the competition.

The top finisher for Queen's was Bruce Elliott, in 24th place. The other Queen's scorers were Bill Bryden (31st), Bob McLeod (35th), Dieter Stein (38th) and Jim Dee (44th).

Waterloo's Dave Norvey won the individual race in a time of 31:51, over the 6-mile course.

Soccer Gaels tie Ravens in ice, mud, snow



The Queen's Golden Gaels soccer team closed out their 1972 season on Saturday as they tied Carleton Ravens one-all in a game played in Ottawa. The game was played under very inclement weather conditions; the field was frozen and it rained and snowed all afternoon.

The Ravens opened the scoring late in the first half as a 18 yard shot veered away from goalie Peter Dickie and rolled into the Queen's goal. Gord Taylor finished the scoring for Queen's at the 10 minute mark of the second quarter as he scored from a goal-mouth scramble.

The game was a rough affair with Carleton being 2 men short at one point in the contest. However, the Gaels were unable to capitalize on their chances and the game ended in a tie.

Coach John Walker, who has to be credited with an outstanding job with this year's team, praised the play of Gord Howard, Davy Robertson, and Don Baragar in the game. Walker also singled out Chris Clarke for praise. Immediately following the game, Clarke returned to Kingston where he played in the Gaels' hockey game against Trent University that night.

The soccer team has now completed its season and winds up in second place to York Yeomen. We congratulate the team and coach Walker on their showing.

Volleyball Gals good hosts; have offensive problems

Last weekend Queen's played host to an invitational volleyball tournament involving teams from Queen's, Carleton, Waterloo, York, Toronto, Ottawa, and McMaster. Each team played 12 games and were awarded a single point for a win. The Gals didn't fair too well, picking up 5 points for a 4th place finish. Toronto, led by a member of the Canadian National team, placed first with II points followed by McMaster with 9, and York with 6.

Team captain, Nancy Mills, who handled coaching duties for the team in the absence of Donna Gallagher, and veteran Kaiva Celdoma played well for the Queen's team. Kaiva led the team offensively with accurately placed spikes at the opposition. One of the rookies, Kathy Jeffries, looks promising as she played well both on offense and defence, demonstrating her abilities on the court.

The Gals play their first league games in Ottawa. November 17 sees them against Ottawa U, and on November 18, they play Carleton. Donna Gallagher's return from field hockey should aid the team.

Looking About

by Peter Jensen

A Bloody-Minded Country

Last week, the former Anglican Dean of Johannesburg spoke in Kingston of South Africa and his opinion as to that country's future. It was his belief that the intolerance of the political structure could and would only be changed by bloodshed. (Dean ffrench-Beytag, was charged last year with illegal activities in relation to the Suppression of Communism Act. His offense, it seemed, was to give Communion to both black and white during the same service.)

I think the pessimistic future he envisions for Southern Africa is correct, - a facile view. What leaves one without hope of compromise or change are such stories as the following:

"The Prime Minister is sovereign in the sense that he receives his authority from God; he merely uses Parliament, within the framework of the Constitution, to endorse his legislation."

TV is to start next year. The first television service will be black and white. It will be illegal for anyone other than a white to own or watch TV. However, colour is to be introduced in 1975 or 1976. When this happens, all those presently excluded will be able to own and watch black and white, while colour will be exclusive to the whites.

The Dilemna of the NDP

The seat totals of last Monday's election leave the NDP in perplexity as to how they will act and whom will they support in this next Parliament. Their problem rests in an acute unease that in an early election they will be wiped out in a public surge toward a majority for either the Liberals or Conservatives, most likely the latter.

The Liberals are going to meet the House with the intention of introducing further tax cuts for big business. The NDP, who fought the election on this very issue, attacking the 'corporate welfare bums', will defeat the Liberals in favour of a Conservative government. However, the Conservatives hunger after a majority and would call an election at the earliest opportunity.

A small party, the NDP have little left in the way of fresh issues and campaign resources. Their bind is that an early election is anathema, but the party to which they give the majority will be looking to an early election. My belief is the NDP will support a Conservative government as it will need a longer time to establish a programme and an image giving them time to organize anew and secure their gains.

Canada: Trudeau to continue as PM

Ottawa- Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau announced Wednesday that he will not give up the reigns of office and that he will be calling parliament as soon as possible, perhaps as early as December.

"The continued existence of my government will depend on the House of Commons", he said. He also claimed that last Monday's election results showed no clear degree of approval for any single party.

The results were a rebuke from the voters with the government of the past four and a half years, he said, and added that the government would make important concessions to the other parties to maintain house co-operation.

In a press conference following Trudeau's announcement, New Democratic Party Leader David Lewis stated that his party would not be intimidated into voting for measures in which it did not believe but at the same time he would not obstruct truly progressive legislation.

Lewis insisted on action on the "pocketbook" issues emphasized in his campaign. These include unemployment, inflation, restrictions on foreign ownership of the Canadian economy, and corporate rip-off, he said.

He gave Trudeau a definite warning that if he reintroduces a bill favouring fast corporate tax writeoffs, that the NDP would vote against it.

MONTREAL- Industry and Commerce Minster Jean-Luc Pepin has been declared re-elected in Drummond riding after an official recount put him five votes ahead of his Social Credit rival in that riding. The Liberal total, now standing at 109 seats, equals that of the Conservatives. The Social Credit Party has now falledn back to 14 seats in the Commons. The result in Drummond riding will now be subject to an automatic judicial recount.

OTTAWA- Foreign Affairs Minister Mitchel Sharp stated that Canada has formally committed itself to participating in a non-military peace-keeping role in Vietnam pending the signing of the peace proposal by the parties concerned.

He stressed that the operation must show promise of being successful before Canadian advisors are sent. Canada presently has a sixteen man delegation to the International Commission for Supervision and Control based in Saigon and a three-man party in Hanoi. The ICSC has proven to be ineffective since its inception during the 1950's.

TORONTO- The first volume of a report on research in Canadian Universities commissioned by the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada has been published and calls for more co-ordination of research activities both in and among universities.

The report stated that if this co-ordination is not forthcoming, various Canadian governments may begin to take action. The governments are now under pressure to account for higher education grants, it said.

The paper was co-authorized by former Queen's principal J.A. Corry and former vice-rector of Laval Louis-Philippe Boneau. They claimed that governments may step in and support only those projects which show "tangible public benefit".

OTTAWA- The Canadian dollar has been showing considerable weakness against the American recently, falling to 101.33 cents (US). The major cause has been cited as the unstable political situation in Canada.

There is a danger now of an outflow of funds formerly invested by foreign companies in Canadian real estate, equity and bonds, which will cause a further weakening of the dollar's position.

There is also concern expressed by foreign investors as to inflationary policies that could be implemented by a minority government.

TORONTO- It has been reported that the Ontario Conservatives received a $50,000 donation from Swiss-controlled Fidinam (Ontario) Ltd. following Cabinet approval of a land deal between them and the Workmen's Compensation Board.

The company claims that the donation had nothing to do with the land deal. Premier William Davis said that he has no knowledge of where the party's campaign funds come from.

Ontario Liberal Leader Robert Nixon stated that the matter should be thoroughly investigated and called for a royal commission to look at the issue.

World: ECM fights inflation

LUXEMBOURG — The finance ministers of the six members of the European Economic Community and those of the three to join on January 1, met in Luxembourg to put together a multinational policy for dealing with inflation.

The statement that was arrived at called for an attempt by member countries to keep price increases down to four percent. It called for a moderation of the nominal growth of incomes and revenue from capital to slow down inflation.

Clauses were included in the policy paper allowing the member nations to implement policies they felt were suited to their individual situations.

In support of the agreement the Bank of France and West Germany's Bundesbank have increased their bank rates, the former from 5.75 percent to 6.5 per cent and the latter from 3.5 per cent to 4 per cent.

However, Britain who is to join on January 1, stressed that while agreeing with the plan's untimate objectives, it in no way felt bound to carry out the parts of the package not in their best national interest. In their case of heavy inflation, they felt that the four percent line on price increases could be a little too ambitious.

NEW YORK According to a New York Times analysis, one-third of the qualified voters in next Tuesday's Presidential election are not registered to vote. Of 94.5 million American voters, 44 million will be inelligible, it claimed.

The paper stated that the youth vote, which has been a target for Senator George McGovern in his bid for the presidency, will be out in force from the college campuses where it was determined that 80 per cent of those eligible to vote have registered. The national rate in 1968, The Times, states, was 68.1 per cent.

VENICE — Well known American poet Ezra Pound, once criticized for his fascist learnings and lauded for his esoteric verse,has died at the age of 87. He was indicted for treason in 1943 for broadcasting for Fascist Italy and was committed to a Washington, D.C. mental hospital where he remained until 1958. After his release, he returned to Italy, where he has continued his writing.

KAMPALA — Canadian officials in Uganda have announced that because so few resident Asians are now seeking entry into Canada, they have stopped receiving applications. Visas issued for Canada presently total 5,712 and 200 more are accepted pending medical examinations. Britain so far has issued 27,345 permits, 3,808 of which are designated for India.

LOS ANGELES — President Richard Nixon has become a millionaire since taking office, a statement from the Los Angeles Times claims. They claim that the President's personal worth has climbed to $1,080,000 because of an increase in the market value of the Western White House in San Clemente, California.

WELLINGTON, NEW ZEALAND — Mickey Mouse, representing the Mad Hatters Tea Party, has been accepted as a candidate in that country's November 25 general election.

Committee debates centre and subcentres

by Bob Mutrie

"We have always kept in mind that all activities should not be in a main Centre",D. R. Norman, University Centre Users' Committee Chairman stated at the regular meeting of the Committee last Monday.

He was replying to the heavy criticism that the Users' Committee was receiving on the subject of sub-centres at their October 27 Open Meeting during a discussion initiated in the regular meeting.

Student committee member Marney Cousins, requested information as to how far previous committees had looked into the possibilities of sub-centres. R.M. Pool, Chairman of the University Centre Planning Committee, the body which preceeded the present Users' Committee was asked to comment on the question.

Poole pointed out that sub-centres were endorsed as early as 1970 by the University Centre Steering Committee. The report which they presented in November of that year outlined that any body set up to consider the Centre idea must look at the problem of inappropriate centralization and consider the development of "a variety of facilities across the campus."

Poole stated that his committee, which was set up after the Steering Committee Report, while feeling that a "strong Centre was needed", suggested that sub-centres also have a place and that in the actual report which the Planning Committee submitted to the Senate in 1971 suggested that both a Centre and sub-centres be adopted.

The university populace does not want to be "railroaded into an idea", P. Schell of Space Allocations stated. He pointed out that the Committee must make a firm indication that the sub-centre concept was looked at and that proposals were made.

Committee member G. Spragge, Professor of Urban and Regional Planning, stated that the Committee presently is looking only at space requirements of various organizations and is not "making firm commitments as to what would be included in a Centre and sub-centres." This was outlined to be the sole responsibility of the Users' Committee in the original Steering Committee Report which divided the project into four stages.

Spragge then pointed out that once these spacerequirements have been determined and the types of desired operations listed, a detailed plan could then be set up to determine who would be included in the Centre and who in sub-centres.

If the committee firstly finds that there is not enough demand for the facilities offered, they could later determine whether a Centre or a sub-centre concept would best suit the university Community's needs, he said.

R. D. Norman, Professor of Mathematics stressed that the point of the setting up of the committee was to look at space demands then to make a decision as to their placement. He claimed that it would be difficult to reach a decision otherwise.

The purpose of the committee, he stated, is to "determine what the priorities of the community are" then let the administration make the ultimate decision.

The question then was raised as to how strongly the university community felt about the existence of sub-centres and whether those expressing discontent at the open meeting on October 27 represented a majority of the campus.

Norman told the Committee that he received a letter from C. E. S. Franks, Assistant Professor of Political Studies, after the Open Meeting in which the latter showed considerable scepticism for a single University Centre concept. The content of the letter, Norman said, stated basically that Franks presented more radical views on the subject than he acutally felt in order to bring them into the open for discussion.

Schell pointed out that the Users' Committee has always kept the sub-centre idea in mind, but that they have no ultimate authority in determining how the facilities are to be distributed. "We recognize the need for distribution," he said, adding that, "we are still dealing in the sub-centre concept."

Cousins suggested that the Committee had inadequately communicated their position on the sub-centre idea to the Open Meeting.

Jennifer Grass, Editor of the Journal pointed out that the Committee's problem may be a "question of priorities" in that the "concept of sub-centres is not being looked at overall."

Cousins replied that the Arts Social Sciences Complex now under construction represents one sub-centre already designated as such and that "the concept had been looked at in the previous two committees". The Planning Committee report stated that they favoured the allocation of space in the Arts Social Sciences Complex towards a sub-centre "if it should prove feasible without affecting the minimum size of the New University Centre." The mimimum size was set at 106.000 square feet.

Norman stated that the present Committee and its predecessors have asked if there is a good reason for putting activity in a central location or if it could be put in a sub-centre. "We have always kept in mind that all activities should not be in the main Centre."

Spragge cited the example that the committee has been aware that the total appropriate number of seats provided for eating facilities would be partially distributed among sub-centres.

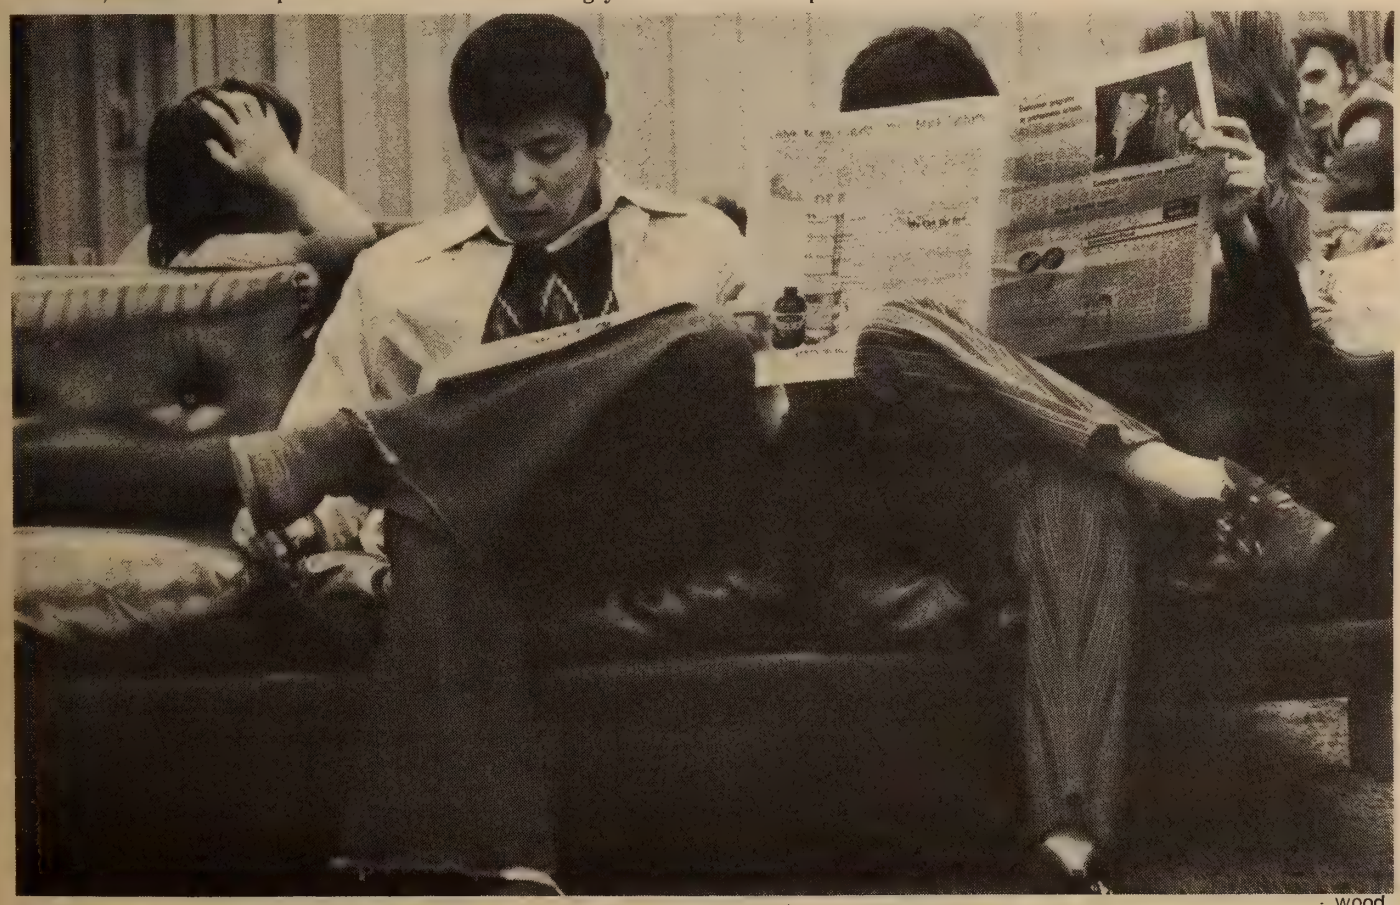
Student Committee member Sue Dowler pointed out that the Committee must not put together sub-centres of "left-tovers", just because "we said we'd have them" and added that the committee was headed in the right direction now.

"I am not at all sure that it is up to one committee to decide everything' Norman said. He pointed out that it was fruitless to make binding proposals now. He felt that it was important to wait for the redesigning of Ontario Hall before determining what facilities it should house. "We must take opportunities as they develop".

Grass asked if the sub-centre concept was not outside the jurisdiction of the Committee.

Norman replied that certain facilities aught to be included in the development of Ontario Hall and that he could not recommend how that building is to be actually occupied. However, he claimed that the committee has been invited to make specific proposals with regard to the centre at this time.

When asked whether the Committee should really be following such a "hands off" policy at this time, Norman stressed that this has not been his intention, but that the committee cannot be specific with regard to space at this time. "We can make detailed proposals for the centre", he said, and added that the committee will recommend that certain facilities be left out because they feel that they would be more adequare elsewhere.



Norman stated that the committee must organize its thoughts before determining if a main centre is to be the primary spot for activity.

Last Monday's meeting also discussed the inclusion of the Student Counselling Service, now at 165 University, in the new Centre, and the locating of a general ticket booth.

Spragge, presented a report on present and future needs of the Student Counselling Services which he compiled after meeting with Dr. Bowman, professor of Psychology.

Bowman, who is presently the Director of the Counselling Service, told Spragge that she felt their present facilities to be cramped and that with a projected future requirement of five full-time counsellors, based on the quota of one counsellor per 2,000 students more extensive factilities would be needed.

You are citizens of Kingston and Sydenham Ward - YOU deserve representation as well as any other people in this community do!

Members of the Committee to elect Ken Rowley for alderman for Sydenham Ward will be canvassing in residence from Nov. 12-18, and 19-25. They will be passing out declarations to vote if students have not yet been enumerated

Ken Rowley:

+ Wants to represent Queen's students on City Council. You are 80 per cent of Sydenham Ward, and deserve representation.

+ Wants to provide better liaison between the City and Queen's University.

+ Wants to look into rent structures in Kingston. He has received many complaints from Queen's students regarding high rents, absentee landlords, and poor conditions.

+ Look into off-street parking. Many Queen's students have been forced to find other parking as parking spots with their apartments have been taken over for commercial parking by landlords.

+ Believes that building of historical value should be saved. Many people in Sydenham ward are worried about this too, but sometimes people in Kingston forget the biggest industry in Kingston -- Queen's University, and maybe it would be good sometimes to show a little thanks, rather than a hell of a lot of criticism.

+ Is the proprietor of Hair.

+ Helped sponsor the Beer Brewing Contest, and the Science Formal.

+ Is an advertiser in Golden Words, the Journal and Who's Where.

+ Donates to scholarships at Queen's.

+ Has Queen's students as 80 per cent of his business.

Fee hike keeps Ontario solvent

On Friday October 27, provincial Minister of Colleges and Universities, Jack McNie spoke at the University of Waterloo. His purpose in appearing at U of W was the opening of a new Chemistry building.

This session lasted one hour and was started with the obvious question: Why were the fees increased? Suffering numerous interuptions, Mr. McNie furnished the standard "Costs have risen" explanation. No one was interested in the nature of these increases in costs, so this was never revealed. The next barrage of questions had to do with an alledged "philosophy" in raising the fees; Mr. McNie allowed that the "philosophy" was to keep the provincial government solvent, and backed this up with the fact that Ontario's deficit was greater than that of the Federal government. Further allusions by the minister were made to pre-fee-increase declines in enrolment and the nebulous fee and loan advantages Ontario enjoys over other provinces. This was poorly received, and the session began to deteriorate into an unfortunate display of ideological rhetoric on the part of the more vocal members of the "audience". At one point someone proposed that since corporations don't hire graduates "out of the good of their hearts" they must be "turning a profit on them", therefore any increase in educational costs "should be shouldered by the people who really benefit: the large corporations." Jack McNie is not skilled at commanding a discussion not structured according to Hoyle; in his attempts to clarify the situation,he asked few questions of his adversaries unleashing a volley of "we don't answer to you, you answer to us."

There were a few good points raised, if you knew when to listen. The first suggested by McNie, was that repayment of student loans be based on actual post-graduation earnings; the more one makes, the more one pays back. Another valid suggestion came from the assembled students: "socially relevant" fields such as sociology should become preferred fields and that the provincial government would be wise to spend money to make "attractive packages" available to train people in these fields.

In the course of the discussion it became apparent that McNie feels the plight of the extension student has been somewhat ignored and warrants more attention. The phrase "making it easier to come back" was heard more than once.

Jack McNie is not particularly dynamic as a public figure; on Friday this was unfortunate, for if McNie had been able to direct the discussion and rise above the petty heckling, some interesting issues could have been reviewed at length. As it was, the vocal minority had the upper hand, and they ran all over him.

Law Dean candid on bar conflict

Law Dean J. W. Durnford finally clarified his position on the continuing conflict between the Quebec Bar and law and Bar school students at a special meeting of the Law Undergraduate Society yesterday.

Durnford told the 150 students present that the Bar has been acting in "good faith" and that it is not trying to limit entrance into the legal profession, despite the Bar students' longstanding charges.

"I know some of the examiners," he said. "They are fair people."

However, he admitted that there is "something basically wrong" with the form of exams and training and that the law schools have to "share some of the blame."

Durnford said that he could not understand why more law students are failing exams now. "They're more educated than ever."

The Law Dean confessed that "through a herculean effort" the Bar could accommodate the demand by current Bar students for the option of serving their one year of articling now and attending Bar school next September. Yet the Bar has steadfastly refused to consider this request, on the grounds that it would result in "overcrowding."

"The funny thing about the Bar's position," commented one student ironically, "is that most lectures are already being given by television."

Durnford maintained that the students are really trying to achieve only a fairer "method of quality control."

He disclosed that the Quebec government seems ready to refer the whole question of entrance into the legal profession to an all-powerful committee, rumoured to be headed by Judge Guerin of the Sessions Court, who is respected both by the law schools and the legal profession in general. One Bar school student spokesman at the meeting described Guerin as "very fair."

The report, according to Durnford, will be far-reaching and an authoritative source for government action, and is bound to be extremely influential in resolving the issue once and for all. Law students are pressuring the government to have this report made binding on all parties.

Durnford said that the Bar, the Deans, the professors, and the Bar school students will all have a say before the Judge renders his decision. He advised the law students to "get their input in" as well.

The law students were apparently pleased with their Dean's remarks, and showed their appreciation with polite applause. According to one law student, "this is a very rare occurrence in the law faculty."

A few choice bits of information have come to the Daily's attention about the degree of repression and the quality of education in the Montreal Bar school, where students have been on strike for the past few weeks.

+ Bar students at that school voted by about 300 to 50 a few days ago to continue the strike. They also decided not to interfere with those students who wanted to break the strike and attend classes. Only four students decided to scab, but when they went to their classrooms there was no instructor to be found. The four then proceeded to the office of Director Clermont to demand instruction on the grounds that they had paid their fees. Clermont asked them to tell him which of their fellow students had unplugged the television sets in the classrooms, but this act of treachery was too obnoxious even for these budding lawyers to do. They refused and Clermont told them to "get out," since they were "as bad as the rest."

Student politicians run in election

OTTAWA (CUP) - At least four recently-retired student politicians tried their hands at the Real Thing in the federal election and met mixed success.

Former Memorial University student council president David Rooney easily won the Newfoundland riding of Bonavista-Trinity-Conception for the Liberals, a seat formerly held by the Conservatives.

Rooney was council president in the fall of 1971 when the Memorial student newspaper, the Muse, exposed Rooney's misallocation of Opportunities for Youth funds to members of his executive the previous summer. Rooney was impeached but ran for president again and was re-elected.

Sean O'Sullivan, at 20 the youngest person ever elected to the House of Commons, upset a right-wing Liberal incumbent in Hamilton-Wentworth.

O'Sullivan has been John Diefenbaker's executive assistant since last December. While at Brock University in St. Catharines he served as an editorial advisor to the Press, the student paper. He was elected president of the Ontario Young PC's in 1970 and stayed in that position until July 1971, when he became Ontario Premier William Davis' youth advisor.

Two other ex-student politicians didn't fare quite so well.

Former University of Ottawa student council president Hugh Segal lost to a Liberal in Ottawa Centre.

His showing in Ottawa Centre was considered impressive. He was running in a traditionally Liberal seat and came second by only about 1,200 votes.

Former University of Windsor student council president John Gunning was trounced running for the Conservatives in Windsor West.

A conservative in his student politics days (1969-71), Gunning lost his $200 deposit, falling 12,400 votes behind incumbent Liberal Herb Gray of Gray Report fame, and 7,500 behind an NDP runner-up.

Course evaluation not a "non-issue"

by Susan de Stein

ASUS held an open meeting on Tuesday night to discuss course evaluation at Queen's. Victor Bradley presided over the meeting as "unbiased" chairman.

The coordinating committee members for this years' Course Evaluation project are Ross Sutherland and Julie Ages. It was hoped that the discussion would bring out the opinions and sentiments of both faculty and students and thus provide some guidelines for this year's publication.

John Bankes, coordinator of Profiles '72, opened his remarks by summarizing his official report on course evaluation to the ASUS. "Rather than being a search for faults, the programme will try to contribute something useful to the university and to benefit both the students and faculty in the interests of making education as effective as possible," he concluded in his report.

Bankes outlined two major disappointments he experienced with Profiles '72. The differences in the quality of the writing from one department to another was undesirable he felt. Also, too often writers had exhibited "acute nice-itis". Secondly he found the lack of concern that the guide generated on campus disconcerting. He is concerned that course evaluation has become a "non-issue". However, he added that the attendance at the open meeting "restored his faith that course evaluation is still alive."

Bankes also voiced his disappointment in the Senate Sub-Committee on Academic Procedures of which he was a member this summer, for its lack of a commitment to course evaluation and for its failure to make some concrete recommendations. He has been encouraged however, by the number of faculties which have taken up the challenge and have established independent course evaluation committees.

Discussion on the entire concept of course evaluation began as one spokesman outlined a new idea being given consideration in the English department. In the hope of sparking more dialogue among students concerning courses, the DSC's are hoping to conduct discussions during class time, but with the professor absent, early in January. A progressive course evaluation would be more relevent it was felt than one end-of-year questionnaire-type evaluation. However, there is a definite problem it was pointed out, when a discussion is attempted in large lecture classes held in theatres. There can be no personal rapport in this case it was agreed.

Third year student Peggy Hill disapproved of the fact that the professor would be absent during such sessions. She added. "The middleman business is not acceptable."

When asked by Bradley if he had anything to say, Associate Dean of Arts and Science Peter Platenius answered, "I have far too much to say!".

Emphasizing the fact that he was speaking "as an individual and not as dean", Platenius spoke of the function of a course guide as being "informative", for student and professor alike.

He pointed out the inevitability of "hurting someone in order to improve things," as is the case in professor evaluation. Many of the problems involved in course evaluations are "hopeless" he felt. There is difficulty in establishing the validity of criticisms and in supporting the allegations made in individual answers to the questionnaires. He pointed out the tendency in large lecture classes to get "a normally distributed batch of criticisms." "You can't please all of the people all of the time." It is a question he added of "who does the professor want to believe."

There also seems no way, Platenius added, "to get around doing some sort of nose-counting, probably by computer."

Present at the meeting also, was Dr. A. J. Coleman, Head of the Department of Mathematics who joined Platenius in remarking that the question of course evaluation is "very difficult". His own procedure as head of the department in dealing with course evaluation has been to check through each questionnaire before handing them over to the individual professor. At times he explained the need to dispose of an isolated few evaluations because of unnecessarily obscene criticisms. His experience as a whole with course evaluation has been reassuring.

The impact of harsh criticisms on an individual professor were discussed. One spokesman introduced the ideas of leaving a blank space in the book instead of printing an especially derogatory evaluation. He was also concerned with the aspects of legal responsibility in an extreme case such as a professor committing suicide. John Bankes answered his query and reassured the meeting that he had been completely insured as the responsible person, and that all evaluations were printed with the best of intentions and in sincerity.

The fact that certain departments made no use of the printed course evaluation was no indication that these departments did not make use of available funds, Bankes said. Some departments felt confident in their presentations during the Orientation programme and did not feel the need to duplicate information in a written guide.

The question concerning the number of students who actually use the guide and its value was raised. There were some present of the opinion that there was no evidence that students made use of the guide. In general however, it was felt that the guide was utilized effectively.

Whether or not the guide was useful for first year students was debated. The fact that the professors in first year courses changed from year to year, and that the content of these courses often changes, invalidates the written reports, and thus makes

Bowman specified that a director's office and a reception area would be needed and that if they were included in the Centre their storage area could be shared with related functions such as Career Planning and Placement, Health Services, the Awards Office and the Office of the Registrar.

The Committee noted that the previous Director of the Student Counselling Services, Jim Whiteley felt the University Street premises to be ideal because of its informal atmosphere and its emphasis on easiness, being "off the beaten track".

However, it was pointed out that Bowman was placing greater emphasis on space needs and the accessibility which location in the Centre would provide.

Spragge suggested that the Committee might review the need for space for this kind of activity and that they leave themselves flexible at present.

The question of the location of a general ticket office was then raised in the light of the Division of Concerts' decision not to locate in the Centre.

Spragge pointed out that the locating of the Division of Concerts in the Arts Social Sciences Complex presented a problem for other ticket distributing activities on campus. He stated that the Drama Department has expressed a desire for an office which would be open on Saturdays, when the Complex is scheduled to be closed.

He also stated that the Physical Education Faculty was basically opposed to a ticket office in the Complex and that they wanted it somewhat closer.

However, Schell stressed that the committee must concern itself with the question of locating traffic generators such as a ticket booth and watch that other areas are not "robbed" of such functions, crucial to their success.

He stated that the location of food services, a book store, a bank and the ticket office all in the one Centre would attract traffic from sub-centres and that the Music and Arts Science Centres should be drawing more of such activities.

people in power

by Scoop Jackson

With the massive elections out of the way, People in Power returns to Campus once again to the pinnacle of campus power to ferret out the little grey squirrel.

This week People in Power delves into the many fascinating facets of AMS Outer Council personality and former high school valedictorian Andrew 'Drew' Pipe.

Born during the height of the Belleville Cheese Riots of the early '50's Andrew first rose to fame at Queen's by organizing the fight against unpainted football bleachers. His next move, which was virtually unknown among the political neophile of his time, was to team up with long time buddy Eric Daly over the then controversial orientation issue. With this vast amount of administrative experience behind him and coupled with the infinite amount of raw talent he possessed 'Drew' was well prepared to assume the auspiscious post of AMS Vice President thrust upon him in 1968. It is well to note that at the press conference hastily called, (all too hastily as history will show) Pipe's platform for the year was presented to an empty room.

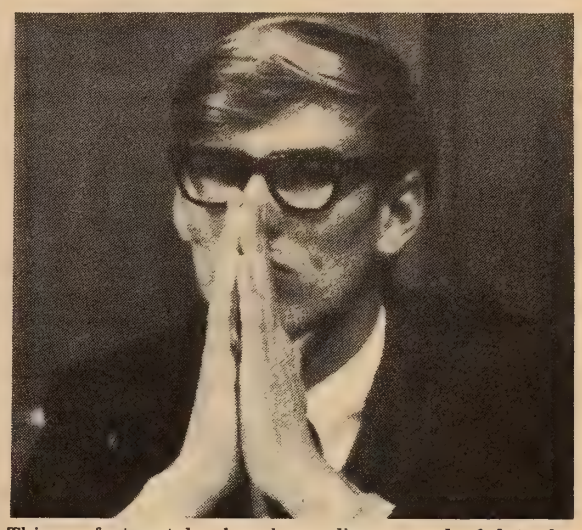
In a forgotten interview with A. Broadbent, Rector, he said of Andy, "It was a heavy move; almost as heavy as a desk." The Queen's grapevine being what it is and was Pipe got wind of the interview and immediately began re-arranging all the office furniture. This accomplished, he retired to the '50' Club to play with his roommate's trains and make futile attempts at reconstructive plastic surgery.



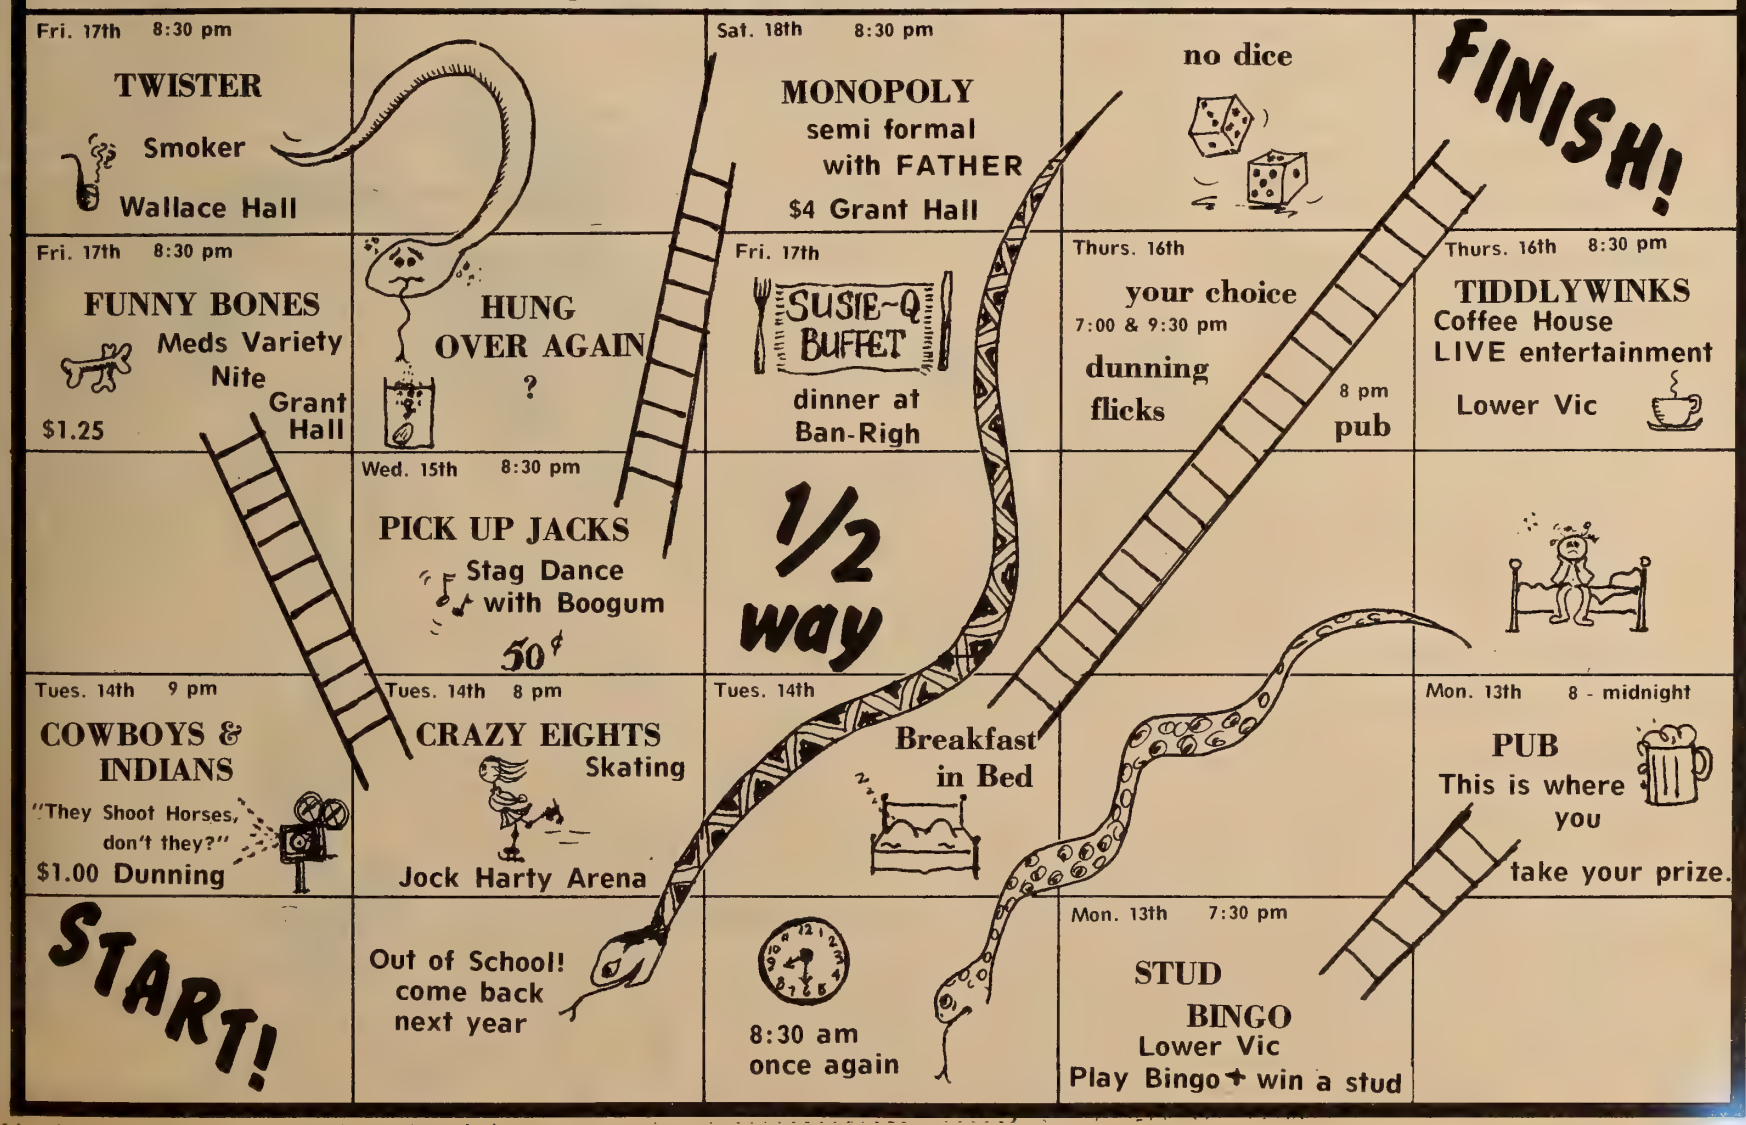
It is fondly noted by the People in Power staff that this was the year of the first and most momentous '50' Club Homecoming Blowout where the entire house sank an inch and a half.

In a later interview with A. Broadbent, Rector, he said of the '50' Club, "I was a heavy group, almost as heavy as a salamander." For several weeks Andrew was often seen walking the shores of Lake Ontario.

However, politics is only one facet of this many facetted character. When walking through campus on a wet summer day or a wet fall day or even a wet spring day you should not be surprised to see Mr. Pipe playing his drums or even playing soccer for his old team, Belleville. As John Deutsh said to our staff one evening at the Royal Tap, "He certainly is a well-rounded heavy."

Around the AMS office, where he now holds the stabilizing position of Jr. Meds. Rep., Andy is a dog for work. No chore is too small for him to handle. After the first heavy snowfall of the year Andy is the first to grab the shovel and plow his way out of McLaughlin Room. In times of emergency Andy is often brought in from the bench to run a few plays at the position of Deputy Speaker.

This, unfortunately, has been discouraged of late by Coach LeBlanc due to the fact that Andy tends to eat a lot of gavels. "I hate to stifle Council," the Coach said, "however, there comes a time when you have to put a stop to people no matter how heavy they are."



Principal Deutsch has nothing but compliments for our boy from the Cheese Riots. In his most recent comment he said, "Pipe. He's the chap that was born during the Cheese Riots isn't he? Fine looking bloke."

Stay tuned next time for more clues to the complex power structure that runs our campus for better for worse for...

Don't forget subcentres

The University Centre User's Committee has finally deigned to explain why the building of a single large centre has priority over subcentres. They are bound by Senate to make detailed recommendations concerning the inclusion of functions in the main centre but the planning of subcentres is not in their specific jurisdiction.

Building a main centre will have a direct influence on the rest of the campus. It is important that other areas at Queen's are not drained by centralizing all functions.

We agree with student committee member Sue Dowler that "we can't have subcentres made up of leftovers. They have to be valid in themselves to generate some spirit."

Provision must be made to include some traffic generators in subcentres. We need more than one hive of activity on campus.

It is time to do more than just hold token open meetings and then proceed with your business. In view of the dissent, re-evaluation of priorities is necessary even if it involves asking Senate to alter its mandate.

Sets record straight

Dear Editor,

There are many mistakes in Who's Where, I am sorry to have to admit, but one in particular has been pointed out to me by Miss Margaret Hooey, secretary of the senate, and it is insidious enough to need correction before it passes into history. It deals with the history (on page 39) of community discipline at Queen's and of alleged political repression in the famous Chuck Edwards case.

Who's Where suggests that after the Edwards case shook Queen's, the senate established a committee to study disciplinary matters -- the committee which saw its recommendations finally adopted last year in the form summarized on page 41 of Who's Where. This is not true.

In fact, a review of campus disciplinary matters was considered in the spring of 1969, and formally recommended to senate on October 10 of that year, in an atmosphere of AMS urgings and with the memory in mind of demonstrations at the University of Toronto opposing autocratic disciplinary procedures. (Flyers proclaiming, "Queen's needs Community Dicipline (sic)" papered the campus.)

On Thursday, November 27 in that year, the senate agreed to set up an eleven-member committee to study "grievance, discipline and related matters within the university community". The following Tuesday, December 2, a shocked AMS executive heard Edward's original allegations, brought forward by commissioners Tom Good and Glenn Macdonnell -- who were then censured for misusing AMS letterhead in the Edwards cause.

The following day the university senate met in a special session called by principal Dr. John J. Deutsch, and agreed to set up the Adell committee to investigate the Edwards case. The investigation and its aftermath lasted into April.

It is thus not true that the Edwards case caused senators and others to start a thorough study of campus discipline. The study was planned before the Edwards affair hit campus. However, the two matters are not unrelated. The Queen's Journal on December 4, 1969, said, "The Chuck Edwards affair has been kicking around the campus rumor mill for the past few weeks. The facts of the issue are muddied beyond belief and burried (sic) under politics." It also quoted AMS president Ross McGregor as saying that he had known about the case for about a week. McGregor was present when the senate voted, on November 27, to conduct the discipline study; his knowledge, and the "rumor mill' which must have reached such persons as influential student senator John Gray, undoubtedly contributed to a feeling that it was time to reassess the whole disciplinary situation on campus.

And, needless to say, the events of that winter and spring took place in time for full consideration in the minds of the committed which wrote a report urging a formal chain of grievance procedures for students and staff at Queen's.

Slams University Centre

Dear Editor,

In what ivory tower does the University Centre User's Committee place itself to feel immune to strong and obvious contention of the proposals it will submit to the University Senate on the use of the proposed University Centre?

In an open meeting almost two weeks ago except for a short period of introduction and a polite short speech by the President of the Alumni; the remaining time (which went into the late hours) was spent in constructive criticism of almost every proposal the committee was planning to make.

One now asks why a Committee (comprising of students and a math prof as chairman) envisions plans for the use of a "large" centre which are completely disjoint and in fact totally opposite to what the general informed university community feels it would like to have.

The answer is simple and one that Ned Franks pointed out to the committee at its open meeting. Several years ago the university foresaw the need for better facilities as the present Union was proving inadequate for the needs of the Universitie's larger body. Using an analogy "a family as it grows larger needs a larger home," hence the simple minded approach by the University "fathers" of "we need a larger union." I cannot criticize them for this as we cannot expect these father figures to be administrators, economists, psychologists and sociolists rolled into one. The criticism does start though when 3½ million (yes million) dollars was raised for this "large" centre, followed by the University establishing a User's Committee whose only purpose seems to be to "decide how to spend the 3½ million dollars on one large building to the best advantage of the University Community." Now if this is not bias, I don't know what is and this is exactly how the User's Committee seemed to approach their problem.

True the User's Committee has worked hard for a year, but have they worked hard enough or long enough? When I asked the chairman of the Committee (at the open meeting) if the criticism against a "large" centre would give them cause for re-evaluation of their proposals, the answer given was "yes" but we doubt if we will change our proposals." How much more blatant can the effects of bias be? It is stupifying to see the representatives of an intellectual group being so unobjective and unoriginal. Queen's is an old conservative Scottish Presbyterian institution which suppresses original creative thought (as reflected in the lack of fine arts studies on campus) and therefore oppresses and-or suppresses any originality in its administration.

Its time for the conservative student in this conservative institution to quit walking around as if they were looking for dimes and quarters on the ground and realize that we have every opportunity to rationally decide with the University how 3½ million dollars is to be spent so future students may become a part of a cohesive interacting community.

McArthur forgotten

Dear Editor,

I would like to pass on my congratulations to PHESA for once again organizing what looks like a very interesting symposium. However, I, like many other Faculty of Education Students who may also be interested in attending, will be unable to make it. For those of you who don't know, McArthur students are out practice teaching from October 23 to November 10, the majority of us out of town. Approximately one third of the Education students this year are in Physical Education as either a first or second option, with about 25 of us being former Queen's PHESA members. Some consideration of us next time would be greatly appreciated.

Sincerely yours,

Queen's and Tercentenary

Dear Editor,

There is an issue which has been neglected by the Queen's student community that is, the relations between itself and the city of Kingston.

It is very easy for Queen's students to restle into the surroundings of university life and divorce themselves from the notion that they are part of the Kingston community as well. Classes, social life, and, for some, involvement in campus organizations have tended to provide students with a very introverted conception of their role in the community. On the other hand, Kingston residents are inclined to think of Queen's in terms which most directly effect them; as a cause of increase in their tax burden, and a source of noisy and bothersome students.

Unfortunately, these tendencies show no sign of reversal and, if anything, seem to be accelerating. Presently, the most effective links existing between Queen's students and Kingston are drinking spots like the Manor and perhaps voting for local candidates at election time.

But as the campus expands and its student population grows, there is an ever-increasing need for improved relations with Kingstonians. Queen's should not be regarded as an entity which overshadows Kingston but, instead as an integral part of a sense of community shared by both.

The year 1973 is Kingston's Tercentenary year. It provides an extraordinary opportunity for Queen's students and Kingstonians to footer a sense of oneness which is both viable and dynamic. The External Affairs Commission of the A.M.S. is determined to take advantage of this opportunity. What is needed is a concerned and enthusiastic student body which will participate in Queen's role in Tercentenary and other areas of community relations.

Slander at AMS

Dear Editor,

This is a short letter to you, to ask your apology for misquoting me Friday within the article on the AMS on your front page. I did not say the suggestions of Mr. Cape and Ms. Whitham would demonstrate a "goddamn paternalistic attitude" on the part of the Council. What I did say was that I supported Mr. Cape's motion to restrict partisan campaigning by candidates for the rectorship as a positive statement by Council on the propriety and importance with which students should consider the office of rector. I then went on to condemn Ms. Whitham's watering down of Mr. Cape's motion as a "worse example of motherhood" than anything Mr. Cape had suggested.

Please protect us

Dear Editor:

I feel sick -- not "inclined to vomit" or even "in a state of imminant eruption of partly-digested food material"- just plain sick. Why? I've just read Brian Judge's atttack on your editing of his letter.

Please protect us from such bunk (sorry, "arrant pomposity"). Does anyone really care about the odd misplaced comma - as Mr. Judge appears to? (I am assuming here that the numerous errors with commas, hyphens, etc in the second letter were all inserted by the editor.)

He uses 88 words to say that "wield" is a transitive verb (ie - needs an object), yet he makes exactly that mistake by saying this his letter "...had shrunk" (itself?!) to 81 words".

He has offered to proof-read copy, "in the hope that at least the more glaring of the solecisms might be apprehended before getting the chance to publicly and indecently expose themselves". Does he mean "to correct the more glaring errors?"

Lets be sensible. Let's use English as a means of expression -- not as a means of showing how well (or how badly) we can write. A quotation from Somerset Maughan comes to mind -- I can't be bothered to check the wording: "It is necessary to know grammar, and it is better to write grammatically than not. But we should remember that grammar is only common speech formulated. Usage is the only test. I prefer a phrase that is natural and unaffected to one that is grammatical."

Please protect us from the Judge's of this world. Don't let them change our natural expressions into a mess of verbiage (perhaps we should call it "Judgese"). They might -- though I doubt it -- make the odd improvement, but in doing so they would ruin our language.

SIC

PS -- Please don't let him proof-read this. I'd rather you misplaced 10 commas -- that wouldn't stop the message getting through.

Typist's comment: This guy may know something about writing in its one definition, but his penmanship is terrible.

Hurray for pigs

Dear Editor,

Well, the male chauvinist pigs have done it again! Hooray! Hooray!

Their stupendous display at dinner time on November 3rd in Ban Righ dining hall did not really amaze us since we, the chosen recipients of their attentions, are becoming accustomed to such boorish displays of gentlemanly (?) behaviour.

We have one simple question. What gives them the right to judge the girls of Queen's for their physical attributes only?

Girls go to Ban Righ to enjoy their dinners in a peaceful and relaxing atmosphere, not to be intimidated by an immature study by growing boys.

If we wanted to dine in an animal atmosphere, rest assured that we are aware of our alternatives - dining at the zoo or Leonard cafeteria.

Yours truly,
Ms. Victoria Hall.

Help us help

Dear Editor:

This letter is directed to all students and faculty Members at Queen's. The Student's Memorial Union Programme Committee is alive and well and ready for action in the Union. The members of this committee are: Alan Coxwell, Patti Konantz, Victoria Kemsley, and Pam Robinson. Our Faculty advisors are Fin Bogstad, and Gerald McGrath.

Are you interested in getting space in the Union for a meeting or a special event? Do you have any ideas on the improvement of the Union in general? What kind of special events would you like to see taking place in the Union?

Any requests, comments or suggestions should be directed to any of the committee members.

Yours sincerely,
Pam Robinson

Student entrepreneurs?

Turner bandwagon

Dear Editor:

Although loath to add to an already overblown issue, as those associated with Kathy Turner on the ASUS Orentation Committee, we feel that Marvin Bloos and Kath McSweeny's letter (Q.J. , Nov. 7) does her a grave injustice.

As we understood it, the proceedings of the meeting of October 28 were to be strictly confidential. We were duly appalled by the article which appeared in the Journal of October 31, which implied that Kathy Truner's election to the committee had involved a great deal of both procedural and personal hassling. As we understood it, the "breaking of a trust" alluded to by Bloos and McSweeny, occured when that portion of a supposedly confidential meeting was made public. Since the meeting was held in camera, exactly what happened can not be elucidated, and the degree of accuracy and pertinent statements must remain questionable. Bloos-McSweeny's accusation that "as is her custom, Miss Turner has garbled the facts and issues" seems a piece of gratuitous slander; Kathy's reply was based on the facts as she then understood them. Obviously, no complete statement of those facts can be made.

Further the comparison drawn between various capabilities and commitments of Miss Turner and Miss McSweeny has very little bearing on the present case. If Miss Turner feels that she can satisfactorily handle the combined load of academics and involvement in the AMS and ASUS, she should be given the chance to do so.

We have no quarrel with the remainder of Bloos-McSweeny's argument - the major problem of university organizations is the lack of widescale and whole hearted involvement; however, as long as the primary function of the university is academic, we must work within these boundaries. Energetic involvement should be fostered rather than slandered to the point of alienation.

Public mudslinging can only impair Miss Turner's efficiency both as a member of the AMS and of the Orientation Committee. We plan to perform effectively; we must function collectively to do so.

ASUS Orientation
Committee '73.

Friends support Turner

Dear Editor:

Today I read the most incredible piece of trash that I have seen in the Journal in recent weeks. I am referring to the unscrupulous and most unwarranted attack on AMS representative Kathy Turner. My God, if this is the way we talk about one of our most conscientious representatives, I'd hate to see what happens to a really bad one.

Mr. Bloos and Miss McSweeny, who are apparently self-appointed judge and jury in this matter, start off by telling us that Miss Turner is an imbecile who "garbled the facts and issues" without any apparent proof to back up such a statement. Miss McSweeny then goes on to say that because she was not up to meeting the responsibility of the two commitments (AMS and ASUS Orientation) two years ago there is no way Miss Turner can handle them both this year.

I do not wish to resort to the mud slinging tactics which the authors of the letter used, however I firmly believe that with Kathy's qualifications having been accepted by the ASUS Orientation Committee and her good record up to now as an effective AMS representative (most recently here "beyond the call of duty" work on making referendum day the success it was), there is no better person than Kathy herself to judge whether or not she can handle the task. She has every right to work at both positions and should not now be denied that right unless her performance in the future proves her to be ineffective.

Unless and until this time arrives, I wish that Mr. Bloos and Miss McSweeny would try to spend their time doing constructive things rather than putting down one of our hardest working and most dedicated representatives.

Ed Note: Marv Bloos and Kathy McSweeny between themselves have put a lot of time into student politics and into organizing student activities.

the evaluation of these courses less useful.

It was agreed that "Freshman Studies" a publication which was to act as a supplement to the Calendar, was merely a repetition of the Calendar. It was emphasized that evaluation of first year courses is a real necessity.

It was pointed out that the format of a course and the approach of the professor may change due to comments of students on course evaluation questionnaires. The guide is then incorrect in printing such a report. It was suggested that a professor's comments about possible changes in the course for the next year be included in the DSC's report for the guide.

Victor Bradley summarized the sentiments of the majority of those present by concluding that the evaluation should take the form of a "semi-objective and semi-subjective" report, as well as being progressive, that is, being a continuous process throughout the year. It functions, he added for those out of a certain department, who need and want an evaluation of a course of which he has no first-hand knowledge.

It was felt that the final printed report should include a mid-year evaluation as well as a year-end criticism and comments from the individual professor.

The majority felt that the individual departments should be responsible for composing their own questionnaires as was done in Profiles '72, with perhaps two or three standard questions to be included. There was no decision reached in the debate on standardized questions.

Many agreed that the course evaluation guide should take the form of individual booklets for each departments and that they should be made available earlier than Orientation week.

On the question of financing a course guide, a referendum, to test student opinion on the $1.50 levy for course guides included in the Student Non-Academic Fees was proposed.

Victor Bradley echoed the sentiments of most of those present at the meeting by concluding, "Course Evaluation is a good thing."

Golden Gals set to go

The Ice Hockey version of the Golden Gals sees league action Saturday at U. of T.

The Gals started strongly last season only to slow down after the Christmas break. Despite this they made it to the semi-finals, finishing the season in third place behind Guelph and Western. Queen's had been running last in the league for years prior to this.

Only four of last season's team will not be returning. There were over forty hopefuls trying out for the team this season and the team has now been cut to twenty-three. This includes 13 returnees from last season and 10 rookies.

The team has the experience in hockey, and determination, to carry on from last season and win it all. However, The Gals will probably get off to a slow start on the season.

A number of practices were lost, and the season started late, due to concerts. With the large training camp and shortage of ice time, the practices have involved little more than basics, and lines are not settled yet in some cases. With only 7 practices behind them, conditioning is also a questionable factor. These problems should sort themselves out with a few more practices and some game experience in set lines.

U. of T. should be a tough team to beat this season. Although they were not in the top four last year, they have new coaching and some good rookies. They feel confident, and have a few exhibition games with league teams to back them up in this.

With both teams keen and out to prove themselves with an opening win, it is difficult to say which way this game will go.

The Gals' major problem last season was finishing off plays around the net. Queen's had the lowest goals - against average in the league, but barely beat this figure with goals for. Most of Queen's games were low scoring, with wins by 1 or 2 points, and a number of ties. With no changes in goal, and only one in defence - Jane Kirby, an experienced player from McMaster - Queen's needs to work on finesse and shooting accuracy in finishing off plays (in other words putting the puck in the net rather than just dominating play).

Some people to watch this season: Debby Gilmour, at McArthur now, is starting her fifth season with the Gals. A left winger turned defence in a season of need; Debby skates well, rushes, and plays solid defensive hockey. She was captain of the team last season.

Karen Howatson, also Ed. '73, has played two seasons with the Gals, and was assistant-captain both years. A high scoring centre, Karen should be noteworthy this year if her line gets after a change in midseason last year. This will be the only forward line intact from last season.

Ginny Backus, in third year Arts, has also been an assistant captain for both of her seasons with the Gals. Again, like Karen, Gin was one of the highest scorers last season, as a centre. This year she will be working with Wendy Carman, a rookie left-winger who looks promising, and Gwen Harrison, her right-winger from last year.

A third centre worth watching is Mac transfer Gail McLeod, now at McArthur, who has played five years in the Metro Toronto League as well as her four years at McMaster.

Wanda Gyde very ably handled most of the goal-tending duties for Queen's last year, and has a couple more years left after this. She played in nets for Picton of the Quinte Women's league before joining the Gals, and played for the Kingston Red Barons, as well as for Queen's last season.

For the past several years, Queen's has been able to count on McMaster to supply at least one good defenseman via McArthur. This year's find is Jane Kirby, who played five years with Burlington of the Central Ontario Ladies League before putting in four years on Mac's blueline. Rookie Leslie Ferrari, who was a scoring terror in field hockey, also looks good. She has three year's experience with Don Mills of the Metro Toronto League, who have long been the dominant team in Ontario Women's Hockey circles. So that sums it up. If the Gals are going to win a league title, this should be the year. In fact, it had better be!

From the sidelines

by Chris Boon

Here we are, back after a week's absence, and the fall field sports have finally finished up; with the exception of women's Intermediate Field Hockey, they weren't exceptionally successful, although the soccer Gaels came close, and rugby made themselves respectable at the last minute. The 2nd XV didn't have this problem - they allowed the magnificent total of 3 points all season, and generally played like champions - which, if there is an All-Ontario Seconds playdown this year, they will likely be.

So much for the fall, now that the monsoon has broken, the action moves inside, with basketball, volleyball and hockey getting underway for both the men and women. The hockey Gaels could be a pleasant surprise this season, even though several of last year's leaders have moved on. Their 4-3 loss to York was to a club playing its 5th game of the season, and the Gaels were in their second (actually, the effort against Trent barely counts; there could well be intramural teams here that could beat them), so conditioning was not exactly equal. The addition of Dave Hadden could add a little muscle in the corners later on; "Beat" looks a lot like a bigger version of John Smith on skates, and as soon as he gets his ice legs, he'll probably see action.

The hockey Gals should be improved this year, too. They surprised a lot of people last season with a big first half, and finished third to Guelph and Western overall, miles ahead of their traditional finish.

Basketball looks like it could be a different story from last year, too. Andy Daugulis has bowed to a variety of academic and personal pressures, and packed it in, but there are some new faces that could make up for Daugulis' finesse with some running enthusiasm. Forward Norm Hagarty looks more at home on a b-ball court than a football field, while John Keck, a product of Kingston high school ball, could be the point-getter to offset Daugulis' absence. Ken Sagadore, an Ottawa native who attended Brock last year, will be a help at guard, while Corky McLeery, a 6'4" centre-forward from Montreal, should take a little pressure off Paul Howard and Bruce Hemming, provided his knees hold up. Stu Beck, an undersized forward last year, moves to guard, and Dave Lefebure, who has been out of intercollegiate ball for a couple of seasons, will help out as a swing man. Rob Smart (agent 86 to his friends) will be the Gaels' on-court quarterback; his driving ability and fine ball-handling should give Queen's a more consistent offence than they enjoyed last season. Finally, some missing faces: Stu Bridgeman and Dave Wright, two of last year's subs, got the axe on Tuesday. Maybe it means something!

The B-ball Gals didn't make out too badly in Guelph on the weekend, considering that Waterloo has traditionally been a problem team for them, and they were missing Karen Carson and Laney Marshall, who score about 35 ppg between them. If Brenda Mackie has found the field general her team needed all last season, and current word is she has, the Gals could well dethrone Ottawa U. this year. That would be a very pleasant change indeed.

Both volleyball teams saw action on the weekend, with the men finishing 3rd in a tournament in Guelph, (they lost to the eventual winner) while the Gals hosted their own invitational meet here. They finished up in a fourth-place tie.

The winter sports scene will reach a pre-Christmas peak in the next couple of weeks with swimming, diving, wrestling, badminton, and gymnastics all in action, as well as the above-mentioned "big three". Life is gonna get very very hectic around here on Sunday nights.

Finally, congratulations and good luck to the waterpolo Gaels. Simon's whip-cracking has apparently paid big dividends, with a divisional title last Saturday, and a chance for all the marbles tomorrow. Give'em hell, gentlemen!.

A week of inclement weather has delayed completion of the soccer, rugby and flag football programs. Hopefully, this week will see the completion of the quarter-final rugby playoffs. Last night, Mechanical was to have played Commerce '73 and Business Grads were to meet Mining to complete the quarter-final round. Also last night, PHE were to take on Civil in the first game of the semi-finals. Results of these games were unavailable at press time.

Bews hockey got under way this week in the Harty Arena. A total of 23 teams are taking part in this year's schedule. Most of the hockey action will take place during the noon-hour slots, 11:30 - 2:30 and at night between 9:30 and 11:30 p.m.

Entries for the inner-tube waterpolo league are due no later than 6 p.m. today. The schedule will begin on Tuesday, November 14th at 10 p.m. in the Pool. Team captains are asked to pick up a copy of the rules from Simon Beitler in the pool office sometime this week.

Singles and doubles squash, tennis and paddleball tournaments are in full swing now with third round action being completed. Participants should check the notice board in the main locker room two or three times a week and make sure that their games are completed by the deadline.

Queen's men are also urged to check the notice boards for signup sheets for team sports.

Civil and Math have occupied first place in Bews standings since the opening week of the competition. A look at the standings as of November 3 finds Civil and Math with close to a 4,000 point lead over their nearest competitors. The top ten are:

1. Civil and Math	12,445
2. Mining	8,460
3. Commerce '73	8,183
4. PHE	8,057
5. Mechanical	6,461
6. Chemical	6,355
7. Medicine	5,441
8. Commerce '75	5,252
9. Commerce '76	4,870
10. Commerce '74	4,458

Words from W.I.C.

by Susanna Trebuss

Most W.I.C. activities are cancelled next week to give a chance to practice female chivalry during Suzie-Q Week.

Bowling will still be held on Sunday, however, from 7 to 9 p.m. at the Cloverleaf Lanes. There will also be another Ringette Clinic on Wednesday, Nov. 15, 7 - 8.20 p.m. We are still looking for more new players, so if you can put on a pair of skates, why not try the game?

Entries for the speed swim meet close on Thursday, Nov. 16. The meet will be held on Monday, Nov. 20.

Participation in women's intramurals had increased substantially this year. The W.I.C. is pleased that more are taking advantage of its programs and hopes that this participation will continue.

World: Nixon commands decisive victory in U.S. elections

WASHINGTON — President Richard Nixon swept the United States in a landslide victory which gave him the support of 49 states and 521 electoral votes out of 538 possible.

His opponent, Senator George McGovern managed to win only Massachusetts and the District of Columbia. Nixon's victory is precedented only by the 1936 election when Franklin D. Roosevelt defeated his Republican opponent, Alf Landon by 523 to 8 electoral votes.

In terms of popular vote, Nixon held an almost two to one lead over McGovern with about 63 percent. However the turnout was one of the poorest of any Presidential election with only about 56 per cent of those registered voting.

The Democrats were able to maintain their control of Congress, however, with majorities in both Houses; The Democrats now have 57 seats in the Senate compared to the Republicans' 43 and in the House of Representatives the Democrats managed to hold 242 seats compared to the Republicans' 192.

In his victory speech, Nixon stated that the next four years will be the time that he must make himself "worthy of that victory". He pointed out that he will work to create the "greatest generation of peace-true peace-mankind has ever seen."

LOS ANGELES, CALIF. — Voters of this state were faced with a two foot long ballot this election, including questions on twenty-two referendum issues which asked the voters to respond on such proposals as the restoration of capital punishment and the legalization of marijuana.

LONDON — British Prime Minister Edward Heath has imposed a mandatory 90-day freeze on wages, prices, rents, and dividends in a bid to curb that country's soaring inflation.

Heath told parliament that he had to resort to compulsory powers after a voluntary bid was rejected by both business and labour following extensive negotiations. The freeze will allow only a $5 a week maximum for pay raises during its imposition and price increases will be limited to 5 per cent.

The controls became effective Tuesday and could last an additional sixty days over the original ninety depending on their effectiveness, he said.

BONN — East and West Germany reached an agreement yesterday which formally recognizes the postwar division of Germany, normalizes their relations and allows them both to join the United Nations.

The agreement will now be submitted to their respective governments for approval. The treaty may prove to be the key to a victory for Willy Brandt's Social Democrats in the upcoming West German election.

SANTIAGO, CHILE — A settlement has been reached in the country-wide strike which crippled Chile for twenty-six days and the country is now returning to normal activity. The strike was in protest of President Salvador Allende's socialist regime.

The striking workers were awarded a 100 per cent salary increase to match an equal increase in the cost of living for the first nine months of this year.

Stores were reopened in the capital and the truckers who began the strike on October 11 were returning to work. Only the pilots of the state airline are still striking, awaiting a special settlement.

Minister of the Interior General Carlos Prats estimated that the strike cost the country over $200 million in lost trade and tax revenue.

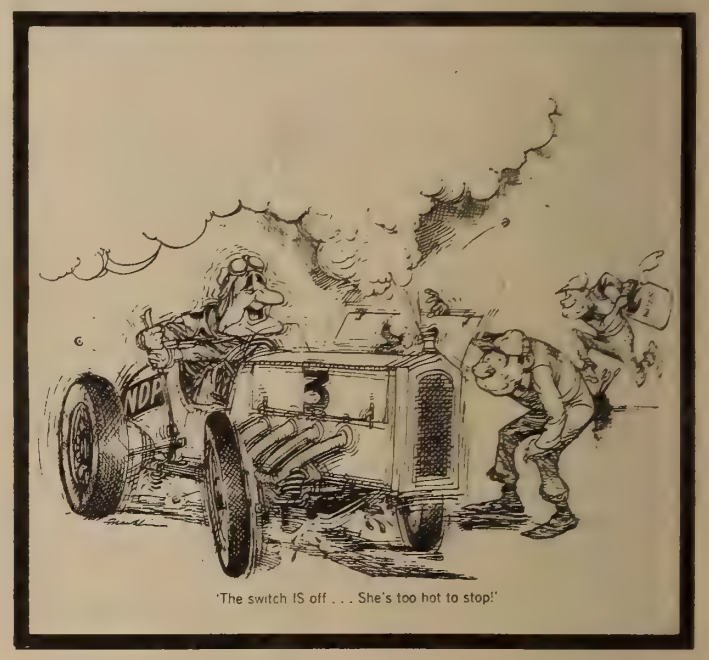
NEW YORK — Secretary of State William Rogers announced that the secret negotiations with the North Vietnamese will be resumed shortly. Communist negotiator Xuan Thuy stated that they would agree to another "final" meeting if the conditions are right. The only question, he said is the "seriousness on the part of the United States."

Rogers claimed that agreement with the Vietnamese is only "several weeks away". He pointed out that there were several "ambiguities" that had to be settled before accord could be reached. These include the definition of the role of a joint council to administer the ceasefire and supervise the elections, a timetable for positioning of an international supervisory force, and the subject of North Vietnamese troops remaining in South Vietname after the ceasefire.

NEW YORK — American space agency scientists have selected five broad plains on Mars as potential landing sites for the two unmanned Viking space craft to be launched in the summer of 1976.

The sites were selected on the basis of their warmth and moisture which makes them the most likely regions for life on the planet if it actually does exist.

Canada: NDP sets terms



OTTAWA — "The government, whatever its colour, will have to listen to the opposition and to accommodate itself to at least some of its demands if it is to continue in office", New Democratic Party Leader David Lewis announced.

Lewis at the same time listed a number of items that his party wants the Liberal minority government to take action on as a condition of New Democratic support.

The NDP wants action to minimize the effects of winter unemployment, a close watch on the operations of the Unemployment Insurance Commission to prevent undue inefficiency and delay in issuing cheques, an immediate plan for direct job creation, and tax cuts for the ordinary tax payer.

Lewis said that his party would oppose moves to cut taxes for corporations at the expense of the ordinary tax payer. He also called for action to stop the rising cost of living, particularly food costs, immediate and substantial increases in old age pensions, and reform of the laws governing election expenses.

The NDP Leader at the same time stated that he did not expect the new Parliament to last long.

'The switch IS off . . . She's too hot to stop!'

OTTAWA — In a surprise turnaround during the official recounts of the federal election, the Conservatives lost their Meadow Lake seat to the New Democratic Party candidate.

On the basis of election night returns, the Conservative Bert Cadieu was given a 28 vote victory over New Democratic Party candidate Elias Nesdoly. After the recount, Nesdoly was declared the winner with a 30 vote majority.

This brings party standings in the House to Liberals 109, Conservatives 108, New Democratic Party 31, and Social Credit 14. There are two Independents. Cadieu is expected to call for a jucicial recount of the Meadow Lake votes.

There have been six other recounts ordered, three of them automatic in ridings where there was a majority of twenty-five votes or less for the winning candidate. One automatic recount will be conducted in Drummond riding where Trade Minister Jean-Luc Pepin was declared winner over Social Credit candidate J. M. Boisvert by five votes in the official recount. A recount has been ordered in Ontario riding where Conservative Frank Mcgee leads Liberal Normal Cafik by twleve. The other automatic recount will occur in Selkirk, where the New Democratic Party candidate leads Conservative Dean Whiteway.

OTTAWA — Statistics Canada has reported that unemployment rose in October to 483,100 from 459,000 in September. It is one of the smallest rises to be recorded for October. Unemployment rose mainly in the Atlantic Provinces, Quebec and British Columbia.

The October unemployment figures represent 5.4 per cent of the labour force as compared with 5.2 per cent in September. On a seasonally adjusted basis showing the underlying trend, unemployment was shown to have fallen to 6.9 per cent from 7.1 per cent in September.

OTTAWA — Louis Rasminsky, Governor of the Bank of Canada has announced that he plans to retire, effective February 1. Rasminsky, who has been governor since 1961, was to maintain his position until July 24, 1975.

Gerald K. Bouey, senior deputy governor is seen as most likely to succeed him.

MONTREAL — Imperial Tobacco has announced that it will be raising the prices on its cigarettes by two cents a package on both packages of twenty and twenty-five. The other four Canadian cigarette companies are presently examining the situation and will make an announcement next week.

Imperial Tobacco has traditionally been the leader in pricing decisions and in the past the other companies have followed their lead.

The price increase is not being extended to packages of fine cut tobacco used in roll your owns, and it is expected to give a boost to their sagging sales. The increase has been blamed on the increased cost of goods and services, higher labour costs, and a crop shortage due to a spring frost, causing an increase in the cost of the raw product.

Behind the Lines

by Bob Mutrie

Last week the people of this country saw fit to go to the polls to elect a minority government to Ottawa to decide policy and run the affairs of Canada. This week the electors of the United States gave President Nixon one of the greatest mandates ever to be won by that nation's leader, giving him almost a blank cheque to implement his policy decisions.

Next week a ravaged Canadian minority government, not even sure that it will be in power for the full four year term must begin negotiations with the reinforced Nixon Administration which will be in power until January 1977.

In the United States, the Nixon Administration has already implemented the toughest policy toward the Canadian government of any American presidency since the beginning of the century. In Canada, the new Liberal government is going to have to reassess this country's policy toward the United States, especially in the light of needed New Democratic Party support and the latter party has shown considerable coldness toward Canadian-American co-operation of any sort.

On the other hand, Richard Nixon knows exactly where he wants to take the relations of the two countries in the next four years and he will be entering the talks with an exhaustive list of concessions he expects Canada to make to the United States.

He will be calling for a scrapping of the safeguards that are presently included in the Canada-United States Auto Pact. He will be looking for an increase in defence materials purchased by Canada, in addition to duty free allowance on Canadian tourists returning from the United states and integration of the Canadian and American oil markets.

In Canada, the New Democratic Party are demanding, along with the Conservatives a decrease in the number of American owned corporations allowed to set up subsidiaries in Canada, a halt on funds repatriated to the United States and more Canadian members on the boards of directors of American controlled companies.

This leaves the Liberal government caught between two forces pulling in completely opposite directions with equal strength. How long will it last? That's a good question.

Politics has always had influence on Olympics

by Jennifer Grass

"The Olympic games have never been devoid of political influence," Abby Hoffman, 800 meter runner in the '72 Olympics told an assembled group at the Olympic '76 Symposium.

This influence was present in antiquity and ever since the games were re-started in 1896.

In the late 19th century France was concerned about its ability to withstand Germany if a war ensued. They were also impressed with the English educational system which combined intellectual with physical exercise. "In order to shame Frenchmen into seeing that an important side of education was being neglected the games were organized" Miss Hoffman said.

The 1936 Olympics in Berlin were used most ostensibly for political purposes. "They were staged, in a theatrical sense," Miss Hoffman commented "to prove to the world that the Nazi's could produce superior athletes and a happy culture."

When Germany hosted the Olympics this year in Munich, "they felt they had to redeem themselves, and make it clear that they had changed from 1936," she said.

Another example of the politics of the Olympics is the US points competition with Russia.

Miss Hoffman pointed out that Canadians have traditionally been very defensive about their performance in the Games. Our poor performance is usually rationalized by the statement that Canada encourages participation not excellence. She also remarked that "Canadians don't have to worry about being sent to Siberia if they don't perform well."

The emphasis on the Olympics as both an athletic competition and a political festival was further explained by Dr. John Albinson, a phys-ed professor at Queen's who observed public opinion in Munich this year.

"The athletes are concerned about their own performances while the politicians and media carry on another festival," he said.

Albinson was in favour of keeping the Olympics but only if their present form was changed.

Middle distance runner, Bruce Kidd agreed that "the lesson of Munich was that the Olympics can't stay the same." "They are too costly for one country to afford, too unmanageable in terms of the number of people and too vulnerable to manipulation, either by people in power or those on the outs, like the Arabs and black Americans," he said.

Kidd lambasted Montreal's Mayor Drapeau for not consulting sports enthusiasts when he applied to host the games in '76. "He wined, dined and whored delegates of the International Olympic Committee at Expo in '67 to get the games," Kidd commented.

He then argued that Canada could not afford to hold the games in their present form. "With Quebec's high unemployment rate, cutbacks in social services which resulted from the enormous cost of Expo and the bad sewage in the St. Lawrence, which is labelled as Canada's number one pollution problem, Montreal is not in a position to host the Olympics," Kidd said.

After '76, further development in sport will be inhibited as we will be exhausted financially, he added.

Rather than stimulate enthusiasm in amateur sport, Kidd pointed out that "the allocation of resources and training would merely go to elite athletes."

He offered several alternatives to the present format of the games. By holding different sports in different places, he felt that the Olympics would be less costly and more manageable. Kidd also suggested having a permanent site for the games or staging them over a longer period of time, and having only a few sports going on at one time.

All three panelists agreed that the Olympics could "not go on as they had been without further crisis."

Contrasting concerns to those of the athletes were expressed by Olympic organizers the previous evening.

Dr. Tom Bedecki, Assistant Director of Sports Canada said that the Olympics would "stimulate enthusiasm in sports, increase development of certain unknown sports, provide a legacy of new and improved facilities in Canada and help tourism."

Julian Carroll of the Amateur Aquatics Federation commented that we "have to develop excellence and mass participation in sport in Canada." He pointed out that the most pressing need was for a good coaching program.

Cam Jones, a representative of the Kingston Olympic Sailing Committee told the meeting that "we want to build facilities for the '76 Sailing Olympics in Kingston which can be used later." The feasibility of an Olympic site in Kingston depends upon developing facilities for long term athletics here. University residences rented from Queen's will form the centre of the "Olympic Village."

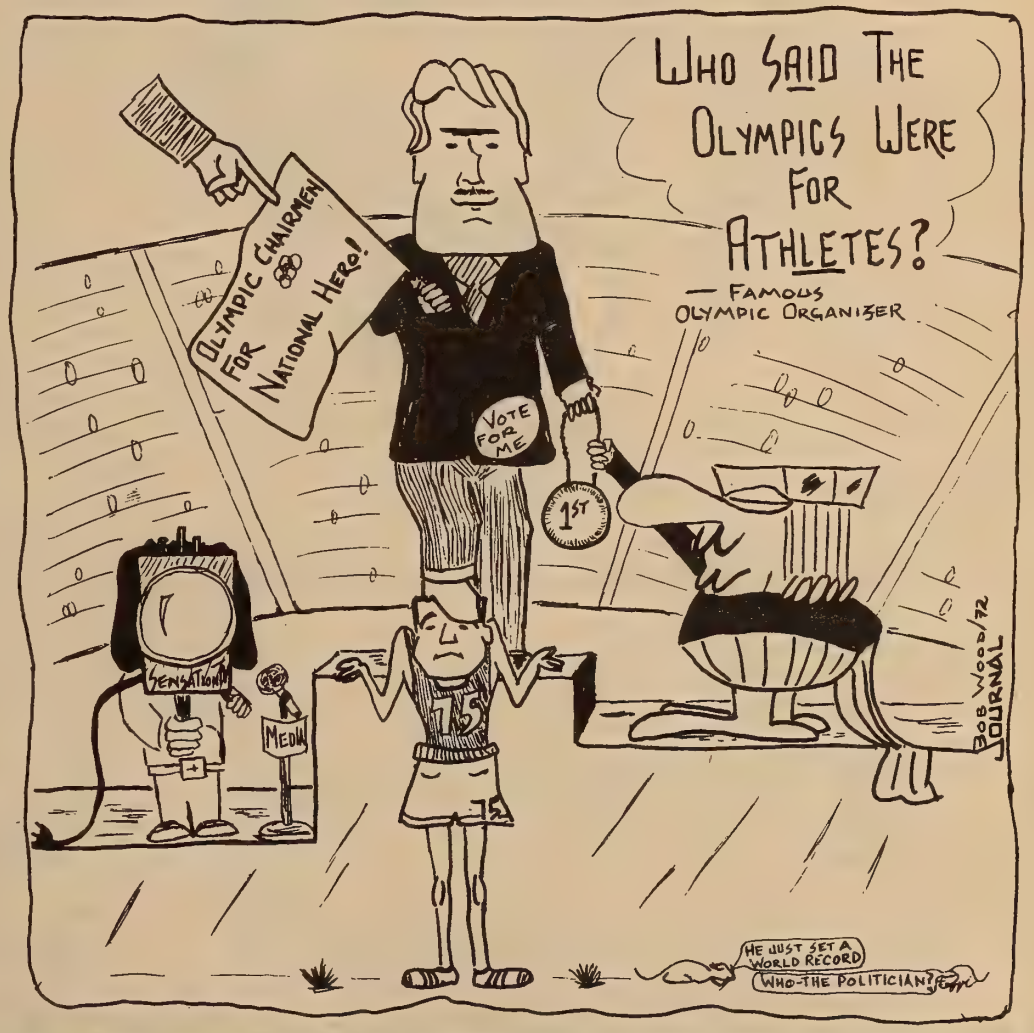
Jones said, he didn't "want to see the Kingston Sailing Olympics become a national festival as in Germany." It is important however, "to let other people see how we live in Kingston, the cultural site of the Sailing Olympics," he added.

Battling with a marshmallow

The new minister of Colleges and Universities Jack McNie and his Deputy Minister, Alan Gordon met with representatives of the OFS Craig Heron OFS co-ordinator, Eric Miglin, President of the University of Toronto Student Council, and John Theobald, President of York University Student Council on Wednesday, October 11. The purpose of the meeting was generally to sound out the new Minister on the Government's actions in the field of the financing of post-secondary education.

The student representatives raised the question of the Government's initiatives with respect to tuition fees and OSAP last spring. Mr. McNie then reiterated the position he had taken when speaking at the University of Toronto, namely, that the Government's record was commendable, that its programmes had made post-secondary education accessible to vast numbers of people in Ontario. He also said that there would be no tuition fee increase or a rise in the OSAP loan ceiling next year. When pressed further, he admitted that unlike his predecessor, Mr. Kerr, he was not making this pledge conditional to the final recommendations of the Commission on Post-Secondary Education. On the other hand, he showed no sign of yielding on the increases introduced last spring. Those, he insisted, must stand.

Mr. McNie also repeated his personal concern that student aid be extended to part-time students. When questioned on the subject of the age of independence under OSAP, the Government response was evasive. Mr. Gordon engaged in a prolonged wrangle about the definition of "independent" by insisting that students just wanted to substitute dependence on parents with dependence on the state. The only solid argument offered was the high cost of lowering the age of independence.



Generally, McNie argued that since there had been no increase in tuition fees in several years, and since the price for other services had risen, the time had come for an increase. Mr. Gordon denied that the increase had been sudden or should have been expected, since discussion of higher fees had been in the air for months. When the students suggested a more conciliatory tone might have been adopted in cutting expenditures, the officials questioned the feasibility of such an attitude. The government representatives also considered talks with the Council of Ontario Universities to be adequate consultation with the universities. The two sides strongly disagreed on this point.

The philosophy behind the Government's actions was touched upon. Mr. Gordon contended that there had been no change from the long-standing "open admissions" policy, but Mr. McNie suggested that there had been a slight change. In essence, the change amounted to an attempt to make sure that I've been told bluntly that my effort to stimulate the student vote is being wasted - I DON'T believe it! This is why I'm putting it to you.

Members of the Committee to elect Ken Rowley for alderman for Sydenham Ward will be canvassing in residence from Nov. 12-18, and 19-25. They will be passing out declarations to vote if students have not yet been enumerated

Ken Rowley:

- Wants to represent Queen's students on City Council. You are 80 per cent of Sydenham Ward, and deserve representation.
- Wants to provide better liaison between the City and Queen's University.
- Wants to look into rent structures in Kingston. He has received many complaints from Queen's students regarding high rents, absentee landlords, and poor conditions.
- Look into off-street parking. Many Queen's students have been forced to find other parking as parking spots with their apartments have been taken over for commercial parking by landlords.
- Believes that building of historical value should be saved, but not at the cost of turning these places into over-priced, inadequate dwellings for students. Sometimes People in Kingston forget the biggest industry in Kingston -- Queen's University, and maybe it would be good sometimes to show a little thanks, rather than a hell of a lot of criticism.
- Is the proprietor of Hair.
- Helped sponsor the Beer Brewing Contest, and the Science Formal.
- Is an advertiser in Golden Words, the Journal and Who's Where.

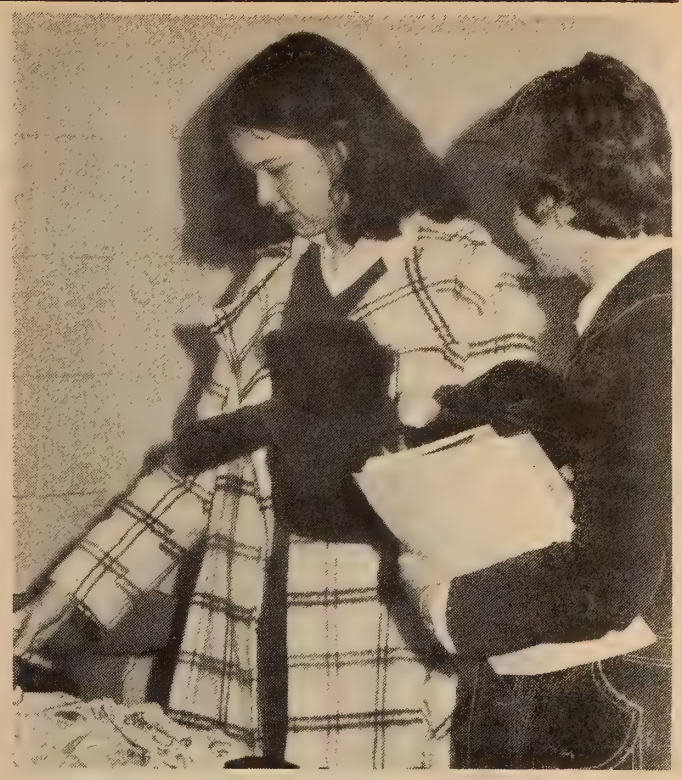
Heffalump dead; idea may live

In the closing sale of Heffalump held this week in the International Centre, all but $100-$150 worth of goods was sold. More than $2200 worth of crafts was sold this week.

The remaining goods will be taken to the Opportunity Shop downtown, and sold there on consignment basis. According to AMS president Greg Lablanc, the closing-up operation should be finished by the end of this week.



In conjunction with Festival '73 to be held in the spring, the people whose craft work appeared in the Heffalump boutique, will be invited to exhibit and sell their crafts in the Union in a small scale venture.

Leblanc saw a hope for the Heffalump idea to be continued for a week each term. In this way these people will be given the opportunity to display their goods. Thus the operation will be a less expensive undertaking, not having the high overhead experienced at the downtown location.

The smaller Heffalump will also act as a liaison between the Kingston and Queen's craft communities.

"The AMS is interested in continuing the Heffalump idea but on a smaller basis", said Leblanc.

Leblanc also commented that the overall financial loss experienced by Heffalump is not known yet.

The last pooh bear was sold on Friday during the Heffalump sale in the International Centre. The sale will not continue any longer but the remaining articles will be on sale at the Opportunity Shop in downtown Kingston.

Coed Morris will continue

Eric Grantner, Chairman of the Morris Hall Residence Council, told the Journal that the Residence Board confirmed the continuation of Morris Hall as a co-ed residence for the next academic year.

Grantner reported to the Residence Board meeting on Saturday that the floor seniors in Morris had acted as the temporary Morris Hall government until positions on the Residence Council were filled in an election on October 2.

Morris Hall recently hosted Garrett Hardin, Dunning Trust lecturer this year, at a dinner. Other Morris Hall activities of late included the beginning of a newspaper, The Morris Mouth, and the birth of a co-ed football team.

We do have societies and they do accomplish things

Arts and Science

In recent years, students in Arts and Science have become well-represented on the various governing bodies on campus, such as the Senate and the Faculty Board of Arts and Science. However, Ted Cape, president of ASUS said, "we have received a fair share of representation. We just have not done as much with it as we could have."

Senators and Faculty Board representatives have made a few significant contributions to these bodies. "They have failed to take full advantage of this representation", he added.

In light of this, ASUS has proposed the organization of an association of DSC's in the hope of coordinating student representation and giving it direction. Primarily the association would meet for the purpose of informing the student representatives of specific issues pending in Senate and Faculty Board. Student representatives would present a more cohesive and concrete front and would therefore be in a better position to make a positive contribution.

It would also allow the representative to discuss education and to formulate reforms and aims in general terms.

This association would include the DSC chairmen, faculty board reps, Arts Senators, Arts reps on the AMS and two members of the ASUS executive. This however, remains a tentative list of members. Cape stressed the point that the ASUS would function as coordintor and that it had no intention of dominating the activities or proceedings of the asociation.

A sub-committee of this caucus would deal with finances. The ASUS surplus of approximately $3500 would be used to the benefit of the individual DSC's and the issue concerning regular funding of the DSC's for educational projects would be dealt with.

Ted Cape summarized the aim of the association as a body, designed "to bring some coherence to the Arts representation across campus".

The first meeting of the association will take place this Thursday night in Goodwin Hall at 7 p.m. Hopefully, some sort of structured constitutional set up will be arrived at, which will put the association "on the road", John Bankes, former Course Guide Coordinator commented.

by Scoop Jackson

As you recall, last week we delved into the life of one Andrew Pipe. During our little foray with history we picked up the trail of another amazing little campus personality in the person of Gregory P. LeBlanc, our esteemed President.

Greg, as his friend calls him, was born on a small but prosperous potato farm in south-central Nova Scotia during the height of the Belleville Cheese Riots you know when. His great-grandfather, Bud, was a direct descendent of the Irish Potato Famine. Not happy with his lot in life Greg worked and saved peeling spuds until he had enough to go to university. He applied to North Winnipeg Mennonite College of Arts; however, an inspection of his rather dirty background got to the root of the matter and he was next discovered cropping up at Queen's disguised as an artichoke.

Having been brought up on potato wine, it was only a matter of time before Greg found his way to the Pub, following in the footsteps of immortal Bouncing Bob Buller, and soon became manager of one of the heaviest AMS projects of the time.

In a recent interview, Bouncing Bob, who now relates to high school kids for John J., commented on Greg's career. "Greg," said the Bouncing B., "was the first Pub manager to introduce beer. He was a real heavy. Who?"

Running (literally) on a heavy platform Greg advanced from medium to heavyweight class by his election to Chief Bureaucrat of a cast of thousands. Staunchly supported by A. Pipe, A. Broadbent, Rector, and a host of potatoes, Greg has added several cars to the Presidential train handed down to him from Riley and Folwell from McGregor. Unfortunately, at one point there were a few too many cars for the amount of track he had however even heavys make mistakes. As A. Pipe, campus personality said, "Even heavys make mistakes. Look at me. I made a mistake in Sept. 1953. Greg is still a hawk"

Commenting from his perch high above a stuffed mouse, Greg displayed much of the pithy substance for which he is noted. When asked about recent relevant political issues he, without any hesitation immediately replied, "Hey, Wally, you got gum?" Wally, his lackey, came back with some crackers and the interview concluded.

Later in the day P in P staff had a lengthy chat with campus trivia expert T. Garrard. Garrard remembers with fond memories the day of the 14th anniversary of the B.C. Riots when Greg had a blind date with some sour cream. He couldn't fly for a week.

As press time is rapidly approaching it should be pointed out that by an overwhelming majority People in Power staff voted 6 to 5 for Greg being an all round heavy and certainly deserves the distinction of being admitted to the P in P club playing the position of Left Hawk and alternating at Outside Heavy.

What are Buffalo chips?

What are "Buffalo Chips"? This years' director of Snowball Variety Night, Steve Sibold and its producer, Charles Hayter, are attempting to "clean-up" Queen's traditional show in producing "Chips". Hopefully the show will come on strong.

In an effort to make the production a more polished and professional display of Queen's talent, and to make for an easier "job" for all concerned, the theme of the show, "Canadiana" will be the foacl point. The official title of the production is to be "Buffalo Chips".

Many campus organizations have been approached to contribute to the "chips" and to prepare a short humorous skit centering around a momentus event in Canadian history. Suggestions have included skits revolving around Foster Hewitt's first hockey broadcast, Laura Secord and her Cow, and the Indians first encounter with Firewater. Individuals are also asked to tie in their acts with this theme.

For technical reasons, and on a recommendation by the Department of Health and Sanitation, "Buffalo Chips" will be presented in Grant Hall. There will be two shows of 1½ hours each. Thus Buffalo Chips will be seen by 400 more people than it was last year.

What exactly are "Buffalo Chips"? Call Steve, 544-9381 or Charles 549-1941 for information.

students were serious about coming to university. Placing a higher price-tag on education would encourage students to value their education more highly, Mr. McNie felt. Implicit in this comment was an assumption that post-secondary education was not the great social priority that it was once thought to be, and that support for it should be seriously re-evaluated.

The Government spokesman frequently fell back on arguments about juggling social priorities. As politicians, they believed they had to weigh the importance of post-secondary education against other social goals. Universities and colleges simply absorb too much of the taxpayers' money. For this reason, they said, no matter how loudly the students protest, the Government's first responsibility was to the public at large. They gave no indication of how they knew the public was upset with educational expenditures.

The attempts of the student representatives to rebut most of these arguments increasingly resembled a frantic battle with a benevolent marshmallow. At the end of the discussion, the governemnt representatives remained unconvinced of the validity of the student viewpoint.

OFS representatives will meet again with McNie in Toronto on Thursday, November 16.

Dear Mr. Gilliat,

Regarding People in Power, you were not meant to laugh at this article, which you did not, and in no way was it meant to be a putdown.

It has been said of late that the student government is rather inactive and apathetic. This article is written solely for the purpose of stirring up even a minor interest in campus politics. If you bear with me for a few more issues, I hope you will hear a few more people on campus asking about those who have been elected to serve our interests to the best of their abilities. These people give many hours a week and in some cases many hours a day, to try and make some sense out of what goes on in the basement of the Union. It is my hope as I am sure that it is yours, that more students at least know the names of those making the decisions around here.

Three day workweek

In a novel three-month experiment, a three-day work week is in effect at Queen's University Computer Centre. The plan involves six computer operators who work three 13 hour days and then get four days off.

After a month and a half the experiment has been hailed a great success by both staff and management. According to Bill Jenkins, director of the computer centre, "it's working out extremely well." He and manager of planning George Taylor drafted the scheme.

Some of the employees, operating the mammoth Burroughs and IBM computers entertained doubts about too much leisure time. The anticipated problems with work pressure. None of thes doubts have materialized.

Feedback on food wanted

The University Residence Board discussed residence meal services at a meeting this weekend. It was decided that pertinent information concerning meals will be distributed to the residence students, in the hope of discerning student satisfaction or dissatisfaction with the existing services. Suggestions for alternate meal plans will be welcome.

Frits Pannekoek, Grad student residence representative to the Residence Board reported that no formal complaint about Pub noise will be made. At present the problem is "not acute enough" to do so, he commented. It is difficult to say whether the noise level has been reduced since live entertainment was cut out last week, Pannekoek said.

West Campus resident representatives announced that the empty rooms in the residences may be filled by non-Queen's students from St. Lawrence College, the Metzler Business School and from other post-secondary shcools.

And still more volunteers

Another week has gone by, and SVB still has a list of urgent needs. We were quite surprised and very pleased at the response to these urgent needs columns that have been in the Journal, and we thank the Journal staff and all those students who have responded to these requests. Merci!

Would you like to assist at a Drop-In for ex-inmates? The families of inmates also use this Drop-In which is near campus.

Another program that helps ex-inmates is Stabilize. Help is need in the office, answering the phone, typing one finger variety is O.K.). This group also arranges visits to various pens in the areas. Anyone interested??

How about supervising kids at noon? There is a lunch program at Robert Meek School, for kids of the area.

There is a Drop-In in North Kingston Parish on Friday evening from 7 to 9:30 p.m. It's at Calvary United Church.

The V.O.N. has requested help for a woman who is in a boarding house who needs someone to take an interest in her. She needs a visitor, and someone who could help her with the laundry once a week, lunch a few times a week, and just SOMEBODY to chat!

A young girl who is in a body cast needs a visitor. Her Mum also needs some relief - once a week til the middle of January. Anyone interested?

Have you seen the posters about the Santa Clause Parade? If you're over 5' 4" and want to march (whee) in a sharp costume, call us!

An elderly woman is in need of assistance at home a few mornings a week. Could you help?

We have a long list of names of students who are, we hope, doing volunteer work somewhere, BUT, we don't know where. Can you come in and tell us if you haven't been contacted by the Agency. We repeat, come and see us!

The eratic office hours are between 10 a.m. and 3 p.m. There are a lot of things you can do. And to those who are already involved, once again, thank you.

Students may go to China

World University Service of Canada, which sponsors an annual International seminar, has this year departed from its regular course in order to help send a student delegation on a tour of mainland China. Since January, 1972 WUSC has been actively attempting to solicit interest in this project from student councils in universities across Canada. Meetings with Chinese officials in Ottawa indicated that China might welcome a National student delegation, although it is certainly clear that they hold the reins and would have to approve any group of students chosen for the journey.

As a consequence of this favourable response, WUSC is inviting student councils to form an ad hoc organization and to select candidates for the trip. WUSC is offering its uniquely suited services to help make contact with the Chinese officials and to coordinate and organize the venture.

To date, student councils have not responded to the proposal and time is of the essence. If the journey is to be planned for the summer of 1973, some very positive reactions must be forthcoming by the end of November.

The RECTORSHIP - candidates

The office of Rector was established by parliament as part of the University's Charter of 1912. The Rector's position historically is part of the Scottish - Presbyterian tradition upon which Queen's is based; but is a unique position in Canadian universities. It provides students with a voice on the Board of Trustees, the body which owns Queen's. Also, the rector is elected by the students for a three year term.

For the first fifty-seven years of the Rectorship, eminent Canadians held the position including O.D. Skelton, and former Prime Minister R.B. Bennet. For the most part, they treated the Rectorship as an honour, perhaps a recognition of their importance in Canadian life, and they sat on the board with little consideration of student interests.

The exception, Leonard Brockington, who made a considerable effort to consult with students to represent them as they wished. He held the position for nearly twenty years and in that time elevated it to one of great usefulness. While they reacted to their duty, however, with varying degrees of effort, the position generally became honourary.

Brockington's successor was Senator Grattan O'Leary, the fiery orator and statesman. O'Leary attended few board meetings and did not consult with students. Brockington's example combined with the rising student desire for participation in university government spelt doom for this approach. As debate whirled around campus concerning O'Leary's possible impeachment, he resigned. This was in 1968, and the post lay vacant for a year.

In the late fall of 1969, political rumblings grew louder. A group of radical students were laying plans to seize the Rectorship, supposedly as a tool to reshape the Board of Trustees. AMS President Ross McGregor intercepted an attempt to make a surprise nomination and have Chuck Edwards, a leftist graduate student and former AMS President acclaimed Rector for theree years. McGregor approached Alan Broadbent, then a graduate student in history and "Dormouse" columnist for the Journal and asked him to run for the position. In the election at the end of November 1969, Broadbent easily won.

Upon outlining the position of Rector in an open letter to the university community, Broadbent felt that the office involved " a couple of staic functions plus a wide range of possible areas for activity." First there is the representative function. The Rector is an ex-officio member of the Board of Trustees, along with the Chancellor and Principal. As such, he attends all Board meetings, and represents to it the views and feelings of the student body on various issues. As a voting member, the Rector takes an active part in the decision making. The Board meets six times each year. In addition, the Rector is a member of the Executive Committee of the Board and is eligible to be elected to all Board committees.

Secondly, there is the ceremonial function of the Rectorship. As one of the top three officials of the University the Rector is present at most official University occasions. He sits on the centre of the stage at Convocations, directly to the Chancellor's left. In addition he is usually among the welcoming party for major visitors to Queen's.

After these two functions, the flexibility of the Rectorship becomes apparent. The Rector can be an ombudsman to the campus. He can be effective in this capacity by the very nature of the position. He is not tied to any particular group in the University, the administration, the Alma Mater Society, the faculty, or the Staff, and thus can move freely between them. In addition, the prestige of the position at Queen's allows the Rector to act with authority and responsibility in the pursuit of answers to questions and solutions to problems.

In conclusion to his remarks on the Rectorship, Broadbent referred to the various other functions the Rector may perform: "He may act as the loyal opposition to the Alma Mater Society, the administration, or the faculty, when the opposition is not coming from elsewhere. He can be a link between the University and alumni, or between Queen's and her benefactors. Certainly there are many other functions of which I am not aware.".

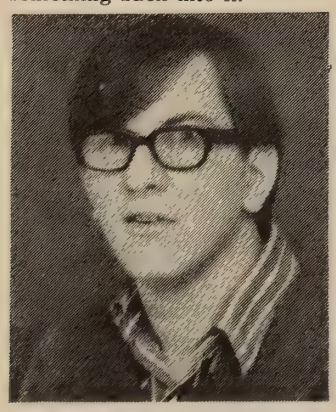
Says he's running because: "I was sick of being told I was apathetic."

The Official function of the rector is to represent all Queen's students on the Board of Trustees, which is the body that, in theory, owns the university. The rector is the only voting student member, and must be prepared to take a stand on the issues and questions that arise. He should be vocal and make his opinion known, being ready to discuss matters that come before the board. It is an opportunity for a student to sit on and be a voting member of the Board. The opportunity cannot be wasted by simply attending meetings and raising your hand on a vote.

The rector must be an active participant, and let the board know the feelings of the students, and what their problems are, and how they think the future of Queen's should be shaped. In essence, this means he will have to sound out students, find out what they think of such questions as the new University Centre, then form his own opinion, and be prepared to defend it, but always being ready to listen to new ideas and thoughts.

I believe that the rector has to become more visible in the Queen's community. It is to be a two way street, with the rector discussing issues with students, and finding out what they want, and students coming to the rector with their problems, and him getting solutions. In the expanding, and already impersonal, university, the rector can play an important role as the ombudsman for Queen's. He has an overview of both university and student governments, and can help cut through the red tape of a bureaucracy that is growing larger and larger. But if he is to be effective at all, students must know that he is there to help.

I would suggest that a regular column in the Journal, where students could write and contact the rector would be a first step in setting up a better more effective line of communication.



The rector, as well, has to start asking both university and student government some questions about their operation and make them aware of what the concerns of students are, and how he sees them. At the same time, the rector must be ready, and willing to work with these governments to begin to understand and solve the problems that face the average Queen's student.

The tremendous flexibility that the office of rector has, allows him to develop his own roles and give students a better voice in government. The rector must, when the occasion arises, be prepared to act as a "loyal opposition". Questions that come before the AMS Outer Council cannot be allowed to pass without serious, considered debate, and the rector is responsible to every student at Queen's to make sure that the voice of the silent student is heard loud and clearly.

The rectorship is a unique institution. I intend to do it justice. Primarily, the rector is the students' voice on the Board of Trustees, and then he must act as ombudsman – "loyal opposition" for the entire Queen's community, and most importantly, he must be a known member of the university. I have had experience in student government, and am not afraid of the responsibilities of this office. I see it as a challenge for both myself and all Queen's students to make the rector more accesible and to give him a more definitive role in university structure. I care about the problems of Queen's students and solicity your support on November 21.

Peter Crickmore

4th year Math & Engineering
Says he's running because: "I have taken alot out of the University and wanted to put something back into it."

The rectorship of Queen's is essentially a political position with the majority of its functions decided by the personal concerns of the person holding the office. Because of this great flexibility, it is necessary for each candidate to outline views on what he feels are the issues facing the incoming rector.

Certainly the most serious issue facing the university as a whole during the next few years is the growing restriction on funding to Ontario universities. In the past, the Board of Trustees was able to consider most university planning on its academic merit; in the future, many large decision will be made on a simple financial basis. If the needs of the students are not to be completely overlooked in the future, the rector must be an effective lobbyest on their behalf.

Communications on campus is one problem no rector could overlook. As the size of the student body edges up to the steady-state enrollment of 10,000, a sense ofcommunity could be lost. The rector is in an ideal position to act as a go-between; his role as an impartial ombudsman can present student opinion in places where it is seldom heard, let alone respected.

It is hard to talk of issues in this campaign. Essentially there are none. The rector is elected to represent the students, not to implement a programme. The rector must be truly independent of the faculty, the administration and the AMS.

The students of Queen's have two responsibilities in the rectorship election. They should try to meet and talk with the candidates to choose the representative voice they want. He should be independent, willing to serve the student community and open to student views. The second responsibility to the student body comes after November 21. The rector, being elected as a representative, needs input in order to make his position meaningful. Give backing to whomever will be the new rector; he will need your full support.

Gary Gannage

3rd YEAR HISTORY
Former AMS rep at large, Co-Director of Job Bank and other committee work.
Says he's running because: "I feel that there are a lot of shortcomings in this institution as far as being a university community and I wish to rectify this situation."

In the traditional cereal-box fashion of 500 words or less, I'm expected to convince you that my ideals, frustrations, impressions and philosophies concerning Queen's are valuable perceptions and that my desire to improve our situation, mesh with the position of rector. Let's use this limited time and space to reflect openly, what I have observed in my 3 years here and how we can influence the growth and edevelopment of the Queen's Community.

The word "community" I feel might be a misnomer in describing the situation here. I'm afraid we have grown at too fast a pace, and in so many separate directions that we have overlooked the real goals of a university - living and learning together - sharing the good and the bad.

In building a community, the organizing structures should be "open" to our frustrations and discontentment, as well as working in our best interest. Some of these formal bodies at Queen's include the faculty Societies, the AMS, residence governments, Senate committees, and student publications - all working, supposedly, for us. These groups are functioning independent of one another, lacking the co-ordination of their energies, influence and their goals.

The rector should have an overview of the Queen's community. He or she, should know what each group is doing, noting their difficulties and offering assistance when desired. I would like to see our rector take the initiative in promoting interaction between these factions, necessary for the continued development of a true Queen's community.

Another aspect of this institution which I feel is breaking down is it's Academic Devlopment. The rector should initiate movement towards the continued improvement of course structures; strengthening student participation in developing curriculum, academic regulations, interdisciplinary advancement. Multi-dimensional education, outside the classroom through a series of guest lectures, symposiums and debates should also be encouraged. We must not let our university become stagnant in its development as an academic institution.

The traditional duties of the rector include membership as the only student voice and vote on the Board of Trustees. The person that we elect as our representative to the Board should be in a position to read campus sentiment with precision and effectively present these desires to the board of trustees. The Board of Trustees decides where and why University monies should be spent. To this end, the rector must make sure that the Board disperses these funds to the areas most advantageous to student interests.

Queen's is as diverse as its numbers. It would be a grave mistake for the rector to act in the interests of certain groups. He or she is a representative of all students. Attempts should be made by the rector to aid all students in their hassles - whether they be academic or non academic. One promise that I will make, if I am accepted, the office of rector will be "open" at all times. Open to ideas, problems, help, visitors. No matter who our rector will be, we must use that person effectively and without apprehension.

If I have caused any reaction - good or bad - by what I have written, then I have accomplished what I set out to do. This is the direction that I would like to see Queen's University take. This is how I perceive the rectorship. I realize that to take this direction will involve a lot of time and energy. I don't expect to do this alone or with a small group of friends. It is a direction that, if accepted, will involve the entire Queen's "community."

Victoria Kemslie

2nd year Psychology
Volunteer with Telephone Aid Kingston and member of the Union Program Committee
Says she's running because: "I would like to see average people rather than just professional politicians in these positions."

I have been given five hundred words here, but what I'd really like to do is sit down with you individually and talk. As that's impossible I'll content myself with the printed page and hope my ideas come across.

I'd like to make it clear that I would very much like to be the Rector and I think that I can do the job. Perhaps I'm not supposed to say that, but I think motivation is an important factor by the very nature of this job. I'm truly interested in what is taking place on campus both at student and administrative levels. I'd like to see the average people like yourselves and myself with a voice in what will directly concern and affect us. Too often decisions that we have to live with are made by those who are not immediately concerned. I also feel that there is a distinct need for some impartial person to act as an ombudsman between the necessarily impersonal rules and regulations and the real people.

For those of you who don't know me personnally, I will attempt to describe a few of my activities. I am a member of "The Students' Memorial Union Program Committee." Under that officious title, we act as the body that theoretically sets the regulations and watches over the affairs of the 'Union' on behalf of the rest of the student body. I am closely involved with the telephone distress centre, TAK. We will soon be operating and yes we still do need volunteers. I write a weekly column for Golden Words called Lethargy. In that column I write about what concerns me or what I hope will bring a smile to someone's face.

From that synopsis it may be obvious where my interests lie. I am primarily concerned that the best combination of the functions of a university be realized. I'd like to see a good combination of 'book-learning' and social interaction, as we profit from both those functions.

The position of Rector, as I see it, is a job that demands only what the individual is willing to give. As one of four students on the Board of Trustees, and the only student with a vote, the position requires a good deal of co-ordination with a variety of student groups and staff members. As an impartial observer, the Rector should be able to adequately discuss, defend, or defeat any issues involving students, It is important that the position of the Rector not be misconstrued as yet another arm of the AMS. I have a good deal of respect for the AMS as a working student government but I feel that an objective observer on an equal footing with the members can be used effectively as a counter-weight. By this the Rector may challenge or defend particular clubs or organizations. I feel that often we are too busy with school or other activities and we allow the same people to hold decision-making positions, in a sort of political musical chairs. The Rector may act as a stabilizing agent to the affects of this.

There is a Meet the Candidates Night tomorrow in Victoria Hall. I would encourage you to come out and talk with us. The election is a week today, November 21. Whoever is your choice, please vote, as this is an important post. Although you only have a week to make this decision, try to make sure that the person you elect will best represent your interests in the future.

We apologize. Candidate not available to have his picture taken.

I have my down days, there are things wrong with Queen's, but I am not a prophet of doom worked up about unimportant issues. Queen's is basically good.

This is the outlook I would take with me as Rector. I would concentrate on being a low key, efficient problem solver and leave the great issues to the student government. The rector should remain a non-political red tape cutter for all the students.

Small but real problems in changing courses or housing, para-legal problems, grievances and so on are best solved by quick, quiet action. Among all the student positions, only the Rector can move quickly, because he is not hampered by things like hair-splitting committees. Also, there are some jams people get into that would make them shy to see the Padre. And worst of all is the idea of taking a grievance through formal channels and ending up before something called the "Ultimate Tribunal".

This does not mean I shun political awareness or formal channels. We need a more active student government. I would be available to try to help all levels of our government from DSC to AMS break out of their nearly universal deadlock. Action must be taken soon on things like more Canadian content in staff and courses, and closer student-professor-administration ties in the big-college era.

As a resident of the West Campus, I feel that we need someone with an important position on the main campus to air our growing discontent. There is no residence government and frustrations over bussing, cafeteria service, isolation and grad-undergrad disharmony are building up.

Another thing I would like to try is getting the back of the stadium chicken wired so that no more students get killed when they go to see a football game.

The above examples indicate that I believe in a progmatic approach. The Rector seems powerful with his vote on the Senate and Board of Trustees, but his real power is much less. He cannot decide the course of big events and so he should be down to earth where he can have real impact. This is good, too, because the Rector is not nearly as accountable as the student government. Therefore by concentrating on non-issues, he would avoid abusing his power.

I would involve myself with an issue only by suggesting to the appropriate body that it get moving on the thing. Reasonable decisions of these bodies would be binding on me, and I would push for them in the Senate and Board of trustees. For example, I support the ideas of "Awareness '72" for making education less formalized, but I would not be pre-occupied by them. That is the place of an active student government.

Sub-committee's many concerns

by Bob Mutrie

"Many specific features are overlooked during rapid growth", Kurt Gesell, Campus Planner, stated as he pointed out that during the rapid growth at Queen's it has been the responsibility of the Senate Sub-committee on Grounds, of which he is secretary, to look after these areas.

The Sub-committee has done much to oversee the influences on pedestrian and vehicular traffic of the University's expansion plans and that in the past it has proposed wide-ranging plans for coherent development of this aspect.

Gesell stated that his office has been making detailed studies of circulation movements with special emphasis on the pedestrian flow which is the major form of movement at Queen's where the buildings are within close proximity of each other.

He pointed out that the sub-committee initiated the proposal to the University Administration that they take over the maintenance of Queen's Crescent and added that the University has since been holding talks on that subject with the city. He stated that the route may be closed to vehicular traffic.

There have also been extensive talks with the city on the subject of maintenance of the boulevard along University Avenue, he said, and added that the city has granted formal approval for their development to the university.

Gesell also pointed out that the sub-committee on Grounds has taken an active interest in the area of signs and announced that they have completed a first draft of an extensive proposal for a system of identifying graphics both on and off campus.

The proposal seeks to explain circulation routes clearly and suggests that present campus directories are "poorly located and very small and not easily legible". The report also points out that the present system of signs relate more to parking areas than to pedestrian and vehicular flows.

Building identifyers which in many cases are carved in stone above the main entrance are not legible and make identification of some buildings almost impossible, he said.

In a nine point outline the report proposals include provision of campus users with sufficient information for orientation, graphics to point out essential services, a design system built around existing and future circulation routes and a system of signs that would provide continuity through similarity of styling and lettering.

The draft report also points out that a system of signs could be used to orient traffic from the major access points of the city to a focal point on the main campus at the corner of University and Union Streets.

The report recommended that signs be placed on Highways 401, 2, 33 and 15 which are the major access routes to the city and that the maximum coverage there and elsewhere in the city might be twenty signs.

As for the building identifyers, the draft report suggests a standard sign for each on-campus building, some of which would be lighted for night time use. Such night signs, the report suggested, might be placed in front of the Douglas Library, Dunning Hall, Ellis Hall, the Student's Union, and the Physical Education Complex.

Gesell also stated that the Sub-Committee is looking into a properly designed movement system that would eliminate tracks and "cowpaths" across grassy areas.

He stated that the Sub-committee is also considering ways of phasing out parking in the core areas of the university and that this may become possible with the completion of the underground parking project on lower campus. "The central core area should be open to only emergency vehicle access", he said.

Students protest discriminatory laws

CUP Quebec "community college" students may strike this month to protest repressive provincial laws against CEGEP students.

The issue is expected to be raised at a meeting of the general assembly of the Front Etudiant du Quebec (FEQ) scheduled for Quebec City Nov. 10-12.

The laws would result in limiting CEGEP enrolments to students who could afford it without performing outside employment during the school term.

The Quebec government also wants compulsory weekly class time increased to 45 hours. It plans to reduce the credit given to humanities and philoshopy classes from two to one and increase the science credit to two.

The time increase would force students working to finance their education to quit their jobs. The move would limit enrolment to middle class students.

The result would contradict the original concept of the CEGEP's which was to move toward universal accessibility to higher education. The government now charges no tuition fees to CEGEP students which results in a solid working class student population.

The FEQ was formed mainly through the desires of CEGEP students to have a provincial organization capable of fighting their provincial battles.

Its system of regional representation rather than representation by population arises from the concept of regional needs. The system is designed to provide decentralized government and to guarantee, respect and recognized the autonomy of each region of Quebec.

At last report, FEQ membership appeared to include some 42 CEGEP's, 26 private colleges and 11 universities.

Quebec school insistence on regional representation led to the Quebec delegates' walkout from the National Union of Students founding conference in Ottawa on Nov. 3-5.

Election Kingston

by Bob Mutrie

Six more candidates for alderman have announced their intention to run in various wards of the city in the December 4 Kingston municipal elections.

Ald. Kenneth Keyes and Ald. George Webb, Council veterans of longstanding have announced their candidacy for alderman in Victoria and St. Lawrence Wards respectively. Webb's announcement dispelled the rumours that he may be contesting the mayor's office against Ald. George Speal, who, so far, is the only candidate to put his name forward.

Keyes has been noted for his activity in bringing Queen's University and the Kingston Community together, having been a member of two University-city liaison committees. Keyes, who has been on council for eight years, was chairman of public works for five years and is currently chairman of traffic and streets. If re-elected he has promised an investigation into the reorganization of the police department to try and lower this city's relatively high crime rate.

Webb has been on City Council since 1957 and has served as chairman of parks and recreation for four years, chairman of fire and legislation for two. He is currently Chairman of Public Works and Vice-chairman of finance and accounts. Webb announced that he would place continuing pressure on the provincial government to botain some sort of relief for tax exempt property in the city if relected.

Two candidates have announced their intention to run in Cataraqui Ward. Niel McArthur, who has served on the city housing subcommittee and Ald. Kenneth Matthews have both announced their candidacy for Alderman.

Matthews, city alderman with the longest consecutive service on council has been a chairman of social services, fire and legislation and has served on all the standing committees.

Matthews would press for senior citizens incomes of $250 per month. He also stated that he would demand that the cost of the 1976 Kingston sailing Olympics be borne by the federal and provincial governments.

McArthur is a strong supporter of geared-to-income housing and he also stated that he would initiate an inquiry into the workings of the Kingston police force.

John Storring, a Kingston real estate salesman has announced his intention to run in Victoria Ward in the upcoming municipal election. He stated that he would run studies on police forces and crime statistics in other cities to determine how the Kingston force could be improved. He also suggested that he would encourage suggestions from the public.

Ald. Lorne McDougall, who was first elected in 1970, will be running again in Ontario Ward. He stated that he would take a strong stand on corporate income tax, especially in the case of Bell Telephone. He stated that he feels that the 1976 Olympics are a national occasion and that the city should make only a minimal contribution toward the cost. He also promised to hold the line on taxes during his term in office.

Other candidates who have announced their intention to run in the December 4 election are George Holloway and Kenneth Lamb in Victoria Ward, Joseph Hawkins in Frontenac Ward and Angus Ross, Nancy Foster, Keith Norton and Kenneth Rowley in Sydenham Ward.

Each city ward will be electing two candidates to the position of alderman on city council.

Survey shows lag growing

OTTAWA (CUP) -- Enrolment increases of full-time undergraduate university students have been reduced one half and the lack of employment prospects for graduates is cited as the major reason.

A telephone survey by Statistics Canada of most university registrars has indicated the actual increse in enrolment is .50 per cent for the fall term. It is expected that by the end of the fall term, drop-outs will reduce the growth to zero.

The survey discovered marked regional differences. Universities in Western Canada had marked decreases, while Ontario universities showed a small increase. Quebec universities experienced a fairly large increase of five per cent; Atlantic province universities have said their enrolment figures were below projections.

Preliminary figures of another Statistics Canada study indicate the major reason students dropped out of university was the lack of employment opportunities for graduation.

The Students overwhelmingly said the major reason for not returning was that they could not see going deeply into debt to obtain something (a degree) that was of questionable value.

The survey also indicated that a higher proportion of young people coming from low income families dropped out of university. This clearly shows that despite government claims of promoting universal accessibility, the poor do not have the same chance to obtain post secondary education as do the children of the better-off sector of the population.

ned to create a huge dam s more power than the he keystone in Portugese and South African strategy to strengthen their positions in Southern Africa and to counteract the activities of the liberation movements by serving as a base for increased white economic activity.

The project is financed by an international consortium, ZAMCO, headed by the Anglo-American Corporation of South Africa. The consortium includes French, Portugese and West German firms. Swedish and Italian interests have been forced to withdraw due to public pressure. The combined South African involvement in this $300 million project is up to two thirds together with an agreement to purchase 50 per cent of the power produced. Canada's involvement in this project includes Alcan's $4 million sale of aluminium ignots for use in the dam.

Besides providing power for Southern Africa the project will open up the central region of Mozambique for development. Vast irrigation projects are being planned together with schemes to bring in a million white settlers from Portugal and Brazil. Concessions to develop rich mineral deposits have already been granted to South African and foreign corporations.

Rhodesia will benefit from the Cabora Bassa project. Beside providing power for Rhodesia's industries the project is of immediate advantage because contracts to supply material for the dam are being awarded to Rhodesian companies. The project will also make the Zambezi River navigable thus providing Rhodesia with a seaport. The overall effect is to make a farce of U.N. economic sanctions against Rhodesia.

The effects of the project on the Africans are quite negative; the advantages of the dam are not for them. Over 24,000 Africans will have to be moved from the land to make room for the 150 mile long lake while thousands more will be moved to make room for the white settlers. Already an area 50 miles in radius around the dam site and along the road to the project has been cleared of all natives. This has been done to hinder the activities of the FRELIMO forces in the area. which are committed to stopping the project.

The advantages of this project to the Portugese are obvious:

1. it will develop central Mozambique making Mozambique an asset rather than a deficit to the Portugese economy.

2. it will affirm Portugese control of Mozambique by creating an extended and prosperous white settler community which will have strong reasons to defent their interests thus acting as a countervailing froce to the liberation struggles.

3. it will link Mozambique's economy more closely with that of South Africa and Rhodesia thus ensuring support in keeping control. Already there are Southern African troops involved in protecting the project site from FRELIMO activity.

The benifits of the Cabora Bassa project (and of similar projects throughout Southern Africa) to a white domonated Southern Africa are:

Michael Sachan, Commander of FRELIMO forces, with women and children

1. a stronger position for the white regimes by preventing FRELIMO from taking over Mozambique.

2. increased economic activity which can not help but be good for the ruling elites.

3. increased cooperation among the white regimes in Southern Africa further cementing their common commitment to retain control.

4. the association of European and American economic interests with the maintenance of Portugese control.

Canada is involved in giving support to the white governments in Southern Africa both through our foreign trade and investment and through our connections with NATO. Our trade policy based on the principle of 'enlightened self-interest' means that all trade and investment is encouraged as long as it is to our advantage. In this light we still extend Commonwealth trade preferences to South Africa although South Africa withdrew from the Commonwealth in 1961.

NATO, of which Canada and Portugal are members, has been important in aiding Portugal's domination in Africa. Arm and aircraft are supplied to Portugal together with training for Portugese forces. Although these arms are given on condition that they be used in Portugal its African colonies have been considered provinces of metropolitan Portugal ever since 1951.

The Canadian action in the face of what is happening in Africa is to continue as we are now doing. The policy of the government is to continue pushing increased trade with Southern Africa while claiming that our active participation in their economy is of benefit to all regardless of colour or race. It seems, however, that the people of Southern Africa are becoming more and more of the opinion that this is far from true and that they must actively pursue their freedom.

The fact that Guine-Bissau was not 'pacified' until 1936 after a number of major wars with native tribes is no doubt one of the reasons that the PAIGC did so well. The Portugese regime was not that firmly entrenched when the PIAGC started its activities in 1958. Also of advantage to the liberation movements is that Guine-Bissau is located in North West Africa isolated from Portugal and South Africa. Because of this Portugese forces are not easily re-enforced nor do they get the support of South Africa.

The PAIGC is a guerilla movement par excellance, Starting in 1958 the movement built up slowly as it gained the trust and respect of the Africans. In 1963 the Party moved to armed resistance with a number of guerilla actions and by the end of the year it had gained control of large areas forcing the Portugese to take up defensive positions in the towns. This pattern has continued through the following years. The result has been that the PAIGC controls the countryside while the Portugese forces are in the towns.

It is felt at this time that little is to be gained by direct confrontation with the army stationed in the towns since this is not where PIAGC support is located. The towns and cities belong to the white Portugese. The concentration of effort is now on building up the liberated areas. Education and medical facilities are of prime importance together with a program of building up the economy by setting up agricultural co-op's and small industry.

The PAIGC is also very committed to a program of political education in preparation for the final victory. The policy which has evolved in the PAIGC is to decentralize political power away from the centre to the village. They are aware of the neccessity for a vanguard party because of the need for armed struggle but they are also aware of the danger of a elite evolving from vanguard. This has been the plight of so many struggles for liberation. This is one of the reasons there is no hurry to take over the towns in Guine-Bissau before the people are ready to take over power themselves.

The PAIGC would seem to have a good chance of succeeding after Guine-Bissau gains full independence because there is an active incorporation into the movement of the principle that violence, although required, is only self-defeating and that therefore the whole population must be educated to enable the people to make their own lives instead of having it ruled by an elite black or white.

Franks replies

Dear Editor,

In last Friday's Journal, an article about the University Centre stated that Professor Norman claimed he had received a letter from me in effect reneging on my arguments against a large centralized university centre. I sent no such letter. The only letter I have sent to Dr. Norman recently is:

"Just so it's put on the record: I think a recital hall is essential for the cultural and social development of the Queen's community. Further, I think that a recital hall ought to have a higher priority than many of the facilities now proposed for the university centre.

As far as I can tell, because the recital hall must be located next to the music department your committee has ignored this need. This is one of the reasons that I think the Art-Music sub-centre should have a high priority. I would like to see proposals developed for its evolution and funds reserved for it, before the decision is made to spend all funds on one large centre."

What Dr. Norman referred to was a comment I made to him after the opening, that I had stated my views forcefully in order to present the arguments against the centre as clearly as possible.

I didn't want the User's Committee to feel I was disparaging their work. They have done some useful things. They have found that the campus needs more facilities for lunch. They have discovered that Technical Supplies wants more space. They have found that some people (especially professors) would like to save a ten minute walk to downtown by having a bank and other commercial facilities on the campus. They have found that the city would let the university build these commercial facilities if they are hidden away inside a building.

What they haven't found, in my opinion, is a justification for putting all these facilities in one building, or for claiming that this sort of centralization is the right way to improve the intellectual, cultural, and social character of the Queen's community.

C.E.S. (Ned) Franks

Rate-a-coed

Dear Editor,

Ms. Victoria Hall clearly established in her letter, "Hurray for pigs", in the Journal of Friday November 10, that those of the Rate-a-Coed Committee are male chauvinist pigs, and worse. As a now humble member of Fourth Brockington I feel obliged to expound the virtues of the typical female resident, Ms. Victoria Hall.

Although "accustomed to such boorish displays", Victoria was severely "intimidated" (I quote) by this "immature study of growing boys". Nevertheless, throughout that notorious meal she somehow managed to retain her poise and simply pretended to enjoy the affair as was evidenced by the lengthy, thunderous applause for R.A.C.C. And even though in an extended state of shock, she managed to draw on her vast moral and mental reserves to condemn in the Journal this outlandish behaviour. Surely this was an admirable feat!

complete the punishment with a return bout in Leonard cafeteria, the proper place for such activities. Ms. Victoria Hall wishes to reserve Ban Righ for such peaceful gatherings as the birthday party she hosted there on Saturday evening. When she feels the urge to be rowdy she goes not to Ban Righ nor to her own residence, but to McNeill to throw spaghetti around the halls or to Brockington, of all disgusting places, to smear vaseline on door knobs.

We all now realize that it was Ms. Victoria's feminine intuition told her on exactly what basis she and others had been judged-- for their "physical attributes only". When she joined Women's Lib. this same intuition which directs all females unerringly to real truth, revealed that women are at least equal to men. With this in mind our unbra'ed crusader for decency acknowledged that as a female she is authorized to withdraw our right to express our opinions of what we choose and our right to entertain.

Now that we know how boorish Fourth Borckington is and how

But to really teach us a lesson, our lady in white has planned to morally pure Ms. Victoria Hall is, I still wonder whether Victoria, dear, might further charge us with being vile deceiving hypocrites.

Insincerely,
A. R. Grynoch

People in power

Dear Editor,

I found it very difficult to laugh on reading your article "People in Power" last issue. While it may have been a well written satire, and amusing to an acquaintance of the subject of the article, I fail to see the purpose of the putdown. As Bambi's mother said "if you can't say anything nice about a person, don't say anything at all"

Chris Gilliatt

What does it mean

Dear Editor,

It's probably the job of poets to provide a quote for every occasion. The job of a film critic I have never managed to divine. However, England's treasured bard produced an apt quote for Paul Gompertz, the author of an article on "Slaughterhouse Five": "Full of sound and fury, signifying nothing." Consider this gem of prose: the three time threads themselves are all brought with chronological fidelity to a climax which is revealing in its multiplicity." What, by all that's poly-syllabic, does that mean? Granted it sounds good (and intellectual and erudite and etc. etc.) but it has precisely zero information content. And again: "It also contains many movie cliches which, because they are cliches, can anticipate the audience's reaction and deliberately establish a tension between reaction and the original action upon which it is based." Had enough? "But the movie is nevertheless a powerful evocation of the strictives of human existence." AAAAAARGH! Whatever happened to clarity of expression? And who is P.G. to invent words? The word "strictive" does not appear in any dictionary. The word he presumably tried to copy from Readers Digest is "Striction" which usually has a medical use: viz "anal striction". Hm. Maybe that's rather apt after all.

I hereby recommend a) a course in the correct use of language in communication for P.G. b) the Journal editor weed out inarticulate or pseudo-intellectual articles which offend lovers of language. Like, man, already, I mean, ya gotta do yer thing, like, it's your bag, OK? crazy man, eh? I mean, like, . . .

TV and Africa

Dear Editor,

I would like to comment on the report on South Africa in Tuesday's Journal.

The "stories" which are reported are just that, ie. stories. The fact is that television will not be introduced in 1975 in colour only.

That television will be exclusively available to the white is both absurd and groundless.

The publishing of this kind of information serves no meaningful purpose, especially on a subject about which most Canadians are uninformed.

A. P. van der Merwe.

A complaint

Dear Editor,

It appears that Mr. Peter Jensen ("A Bloody-Minded Country") is more concerned with airing his own prejudices than in sharing true information with your readers. Either that, or he is a strong supporter of the present South African government and is seeking to load the arsenal of the apartheid lobby and give even more veracity to their charges of overseas ignorance.

Mr. Jensen's misquotes and inventions do no credit to the "Queen's Journal", nor are they necessary. If he wants sensationalism, the truth will suffice.

Graham Finlayson.

Freshman guide

Dear Editor,

I feel obligated to reply to one of your most recent examples of irresponsible editorializing. In the November 7th Journal you launched a rather strong attack on Freshman Studies '72-'73, the course guide published by the 1972 Arts and Science Orientation Committee. It is apparent that you not only ignored the facts but used this distorted report to make recommendations regarding an issue of which you are obviously ill-informed.

A brief glance at the content of Freshman Studies would have revealed to the editor that very little of its material was repeated from any source, including the Arts Calendar. The claim that "it was in essence a rehash of the Arts Calendar" is an empty statement in light of the facts.

The editor was also careful to ignore the opinions of those involved in Orientation '72, and instead denounced the booklet as a "waste of money and effort". It strikes me as odd that the editor can differ so vehemently with the vast majority of faculty academic advisers, Gaels, and Freshmen who found the guide extremely useful. In addition, the material in Freshman Studies was not, as implied in the editorial, purely a faculty production. The D.S.C. Chairman of each department personally reviewed each course write-up and was asked to suggest revisions where necessary.

Finally, the editor, in her "subtle" argument for subjective evaluation of first year courses, failed to mention that Freshman Studies was devised because it was felt by both faculty and students that the type of Course Evaluation Guide used in Orientation '71 was not as useful as anticipated, and was not even being attempted for 1972.

I suggest to the editor that in the future she concentrate less on such biased and inaccurate commentary, and instead attempt a more credible and responsible approach to journalism.

Sincerely,
Stephen Sibold

Ed. Note: We agree that more comprehensive information on 1st year courses than is produced in the Arts and Science Calendar is necessary. However, the material presented in the Freshman Studies Guide was not sufficient to supplement the calendar as it only viewed courses through the eyes of professors. The proper place for such expanded information is in the regular calendar for all students to read. We feel it is necessary to include some of this information in the Course Evaluation Guide with a subjective evaluation by students and further supplement it with a numeric rating on such subjects as work load, quality of texts and other questions pertaining to courses. We referred to the Freshman Studies Guide as a waste of money and effort because large funds were expended to produce a work which only did half the job.

"Black Comedy" is hilarious at Domino

Owen Moulton enjoying some of the dramatic acrobatics of Black Comedy with Douglas Crawford. Jeannine Provost looks on.

by Sandy Naiman

The play begins in total and complete darkness. All we hear are two voices, one male and one female discussing how lovely things look, how certain colours compliment other colours, how charming it is to see this here and to see that there. The audience snickers and genuflects apparently out of feelings of discomfort for doubtless this is the first time for many that a stage play has begun as if it were to be performed for a radio audience. But as the lights go on, signifying a blown fuse in the South Kensington flat and plunging the actors into imaginary darkness, the real fun of Peter Shaffer's Black Comedy at the Domino Theatre begins.

Nancy Helwig's direction and some very fine acting allows the principle which Shaffer imposes on his play, the reversal of light and dark, to become one which is accepted totally by the audience. Not for a moment do we question the characters inabilities to see, although we know full well that their vision is just as clear as ours. They move with such convincingly bumbling precision on Robert Montheith's charmingly well appointed set, as if in total darkness, their eyes open and yet seeing nothing.

Owen Moulton's Brindsley is one of the best examples of this mastery of the light-dark problem. As the anti-hero in Shaffer's farce, Brindsley has brought his fiancee, Carol Melkett up to his flat and stolen his friend Harold's furniture so as to impress Carol's father, who must approve the match before they are to marry. In the course of the evening, Harold returns home unexpectedly and Brindsley must return the furniture to his flat next door without upsetting Colonel Melkett who is already more than a little suspicious. Other characters come in to complicate the situation, including Brindsley's not so former girl friend Clea, and Miss Furnival, the not so proper little old lady who lives down the hall.

All the visual comedy, the falling and tripping and colliding and rearranging of furniture is done with incisive clarity of form and movement. Mr. Moulton and Mary Barclay, who is a delightfully drunk Miss Furnival, both play their roles with polished understanding so as to provide many of the comic highlights of the evening. Tony Ibbotson's overtly affected Harold was also hilariously funny although he seemed to miss some of the energetic crests of his role, though his foil relationship with Brindsley was well developed. Jennifer Hodges' Clea is also beautifully juxtaposed onto the character collage which makes Shaffer's play so entertaining and her cockneyed Mrs. Punit is extremely well performed.

Unfortunately, Jeannine Provost, as Carol, the much maligned fiancee, is not able to make the most of her role. Her affectations of speech, the addition of "pegs", (ie Daddypegs, and the like), seemed uncomfortable for her and thus grated on our ears as much as they did on her lips.

Douglas Crawford, as the Colonel, although rather stiff, was moderately convincing as the protective and rather autocratic British daddy. Even the smaller supporting roles, Schuppanzigh, the man from the electricians union, played by Ian McLeod and Georg Bamberger the richest man in the world, played by Jon Frizell were portrayed well.

This is ultimately a directors play, one which centres upon choreography, for every move must be pre set with utmost precision and care so as to look totally spontaneous. Nancy Helwig managed to do this suberbly. She captured the farcical, burlesque elements of the script and visualized them perfectly. The timing and pace

Dunning Hall Series

The Israeli Trio has a good deal of growing up to do!

by Michael Hodgson

The opening concert in the Dunning Hall Series was given by the Israeli Trio, an unusual ensemble of clarinet, cello and piano. It was an interesting program-the Trio op. 114 and Clarinet sonata op. 120 no. 1 by Brahms, the cello sonata of Debussy, and the Trio op. 11 of Beethoven. However, the evening was something less than a success.

Granted Dunning Hall is a difficult place to play. The hall becomes very hot, but there is a strong draught on stage, and the result is quite a fluctuation in temperature, which played havoc with the intonation of the clarinet. Furthermore, Dunning Hall, like any hall, has its own acoustic problems: a full blooded resonant Romantic approach seems next to impossible in a hall that so deadens the sound. The piano was producing wooden and downright ugly sounds for much of the evening. But if there were problems with the sound produced, these should be blamed on the musicians, not the hall, for touring professional musicians ought to be able to adjust their playing and their interpretations to the acoustic conditions of the hall.

For most of the evening, Yona Ettlinger, clarinetist was having so much trouble with his intonation that his entries were unpredictable and his tone and phrasing only sometimes controlled. Pnina Salzman, pianist, especially in the two Brahms selections, often played unresponsively, in the faster movements played untidily and even sloppily, and in general seemed incapable of anything but extreme dynamics which made the music thumpy and melodramatic. I like to think there is more to Brahms' interpretation than booming bass blurred by haphazard pedalwork! But in fact their reading of the opening Allegro of the Brahms Trio showed pretty clearly that each of the three of them had his own idea of what Brahms was about - the pianist gave us floundering, the clarinetist gave us classical grace, and the cellist, Uzi Wiesel, alone gave us a passionate involvement with the music.

And I want to single out the cellist for special mention here, because his playing really saved the evening. He alone of the three showed a consistent ability to respond to his partners and he alone was technically and emotionally in control of the music he played. It was his playing that held the trio together in the last two movements of the Brahms Trio, and it was his playing that stunned and amused us in the passionate and comical Debussy sonata.

In fact, the best playing of the evening came in the Debussy sonata and in the Beethoven trio, both clearer and more incisive works than the Brahms with which the Israeli Trio had weighted their program. Perhaps this music was better suited to the acoustics of the hall. In any case, the readings here were sure-footed and exciting with all the parts in balance. I wish all the playing that evening had been of such calibre. But I am left with the feeling the Israeli Trio, formed only in 1971, still has a good deal of growing up to do.

The Chuck Mangione Quartet

If you don't know what a flugelhorn is, chances are you don't know Chuck Mangione. But if you do, or if you appreciate good jazz or just plain good music, I strongly recommend Mangione to you.

Chuck has just recently made his debut in popular records and on the stage, but he has been admired and respected for his talent by jazz musicians such as Dizzie Gillespie and Lew Soloff (Blood, Sweat & Tears' trumpet) since his early teens. In the last three years he has released three albums: "Friends and Love," "Together" and "The Chuck Mangione Quartet". Most of the selections which blend the music of Chuck's jazz quartet with the melodies of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, are composed and arranged by Mangione himself. Don Potter and Esther Satterfield provide the vocal talent necessary to produce a sound which is capable of exquisitely merging music and feelings in lyric. All of the personnel are truly professional and, what is rare all work together.

The Quartet has been touring the U.S. and Canada for the past few years. They have played alone at places such as the Colonial Tavern in Toronto as well as together with the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra (with Mangione as guest conductor) in Toronto's Massey Hall. The musicians' versatility of style has consistently responded to such contrasting atmospheres, demanding different musical types, in a more than satisfactory manner. Young audiences composed of people well - acquainted with contemporary classical music as well as those steeped in jazz and blues have come together with interested observers to enthusiastically applaud Mangione and his Quartet.

On November 19, at 8:00 pm in the McArthur College Auditorium the Chuck Mangione Quartet will perform. Tickets are $1.50 with concert card and $2.00 general admission, available in the John Orr Room.

Pianist Performs Friday

Pianist Gary Towlen will make his Canadian debut this Friday at 8:30 p.m. in Dunning Hall. This will be the first concert in the Musical Weekend sponsored by the Division of Concerts. The second concert features the Vaghy String Quartet with Gary Towlen on Sunday evening.

Gary Towlen has performed throughout the United States and twelve European countries in recital, with orchestra, and on television and radio. His career as a concert-pianist began in 1955 when, at the age of 12, he made his debut in New York at the Carnegie Recital Hall.

Mr. Towlen's Friday evening recital will include works by Beethoven, Faure, Prokofiev, Poulenc and Ravel. He will perform the Dvorak Piano Quintet with the Vaghy String Quartet on Sunday evening.

Tickets for each concert are availabe from the Division of Concerts Box Office, Agnes Etherington Art Centre at $2.00 general, $1.50 Grant and Dunning Hall series subscribers, and $1.00 students. Reservations may be made by phoning the Box Office at 547-6194.

Queen's Drama Department's first major production

"The Mother" gives birth painfully!

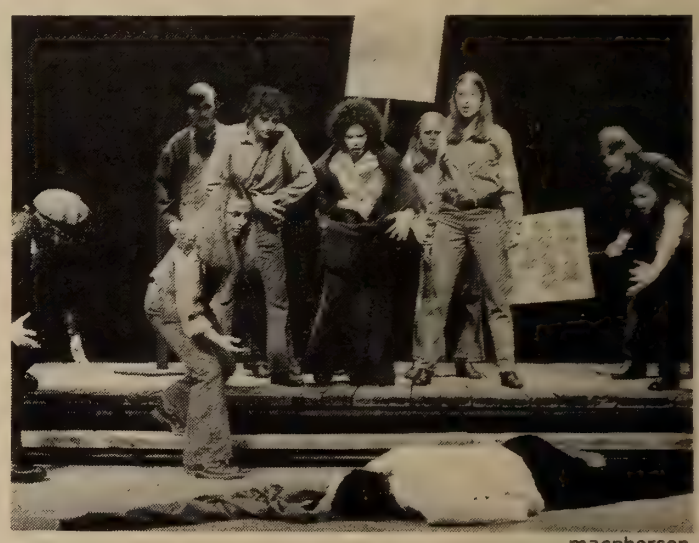
macpherson

Alan Higdon and Barb Stewart in comic encounter

by Paul Gompertz

This term's major production in the Drama Department is a Canadian premiere of Bertolt Brecht's play "The Mother". The fact that it is a premeire raises an interesting question: how has a play be someone as popular as Brecht managed to keep its Canadian Virginity for so long? Could it be that no one wanted to stage the play because they did not consider it a viable stage prospect? This production goes a long way towards resolving the enigma.

Not, let me hasten to add, that the actors didn't do justice to the material with which they were working. The most striking and rewarding aspect of the production was the uniformly high standard of the acting, which helped to make this one of the few enjoyable dramatic undertakings that I have seen in Kingston. Barb Stewart's performance as the mother was well developed and controlled, though somewhat lacking in power, range and conviction. The main fault I would find lies with the director, of which more later. Paul Moulton had a difficult role as Pavel, and the end product tended to be disjointed and a little flaccid, because he never generated any underlying power of characterisation which would congeal the parts into a whole.



Gordon McCall's characterizations were brusque but varied, and adapted themselves admirably to the demands of the scene while Alan Higdon fell one short of palling off the demands of his multi character role. Norman Campbell's 'dramatic shorthand' by which he apocopates the middle of his sentences, was irritating, though it added arcane unintelligibility to the Russian atmosphere of the play. It was a pity too, since the rest of his performance was strong and well executed. The rest of the cast managed, in varying degrees, to fit themselves to the overall endeavour of the play, and it was the depth of the acting that went so far twoards achieving a creditable production.

It is a shame that the directing was not in sympathy with the talents of the actors. The mechanics of the production were a horrifying gallimaufry of passe and conflicting dramatic modes which suggested that the play had been put together scene by scene with no thought to dramatic continuity. It ended up an unhappy compromise between the techniques of presentation and representation. The former attempts to create the scene as it is, to capture for the moment the spirit and actuality of the events being described, while the latter attempts to recreate a possible situation which may or may not have existed. Presentation creates consistent characters, with authentic props and setting in which the actors are intended to exist only as the characters they portray. Representation symbolises or realises a set of circumstances in abstraction, through mime, spken word and demand upon the audience's suspension of disbelief. The actors remain actors, who represent, for the duration of their stay upon stage, forces vested in characters which have temporarily come together for the purpose of resolution and edification.

This play not only confused the two modes willy-nilly, but employed devices from both which have long since grown effete. The characters were representational, using no makeup and making no attempt to be the character that they portrayed.(This was most obviously and painfully evident in the portrayal of the mother herself.) And yet at the same time the butcher not only had a blood stained apron but real meat as a prop, thus negating the purpose of lack of make-up. The scene is the prison used a realistic screen between mother and snon, while the other characters stood around in representational poses behind what were obviously hanging ropes. Moreover, at the end of the mother acknowledges and speaks to the audience, thus detracting from the autonomy of the scene. Pavel's death was portrayed in an age old and unimaginative device of representation which was immediately followed by a very 'real' crash as he hit the stage. His physical presence, and his mother's acknowledgement of it, were ridiculously incongruous in the subsequent scene. Not her touching acknowledgement itself was out of place, buth symbolic representation of her grief was invalidated by his obstrusive physical presence. The list is endless; even the power of the songs (even those with only four or five people) lost its autonomy as a result of the obvious contribution of the off-stage characters.

It was a great pity to see to much energy going astray as the result of ill-considered direction; and the nature of the play didn't help either. It is essentially monodynamic, so that each scene is basically a variation on a single theme. Any suggestion of a deviation is ruthlessly supressed, and laughter glosses over the more sinister implications of the once-oppressed revolutionaries' coercion of others. The songs (aided and abetted by John Reeves superb music) were like well-placed props shoring up a shaky edifice; without them the play would be a disaster under any circumstances. Even as its is, the further the play runs the more tedious it becomes, mainly because of its monodynamic predictability.

The quality of the production was a credit to the actors' undying enthusiasm and energy, which prevailed despite, rather than because of, the nature of the play and the direction. The Mother may have lost her Canadian Virginity but I suspect that Angels will still fear to tread where the importunate rushed in.

Edith Sitwell: drawing by Wyndham Lewis

Façade, a programme of poetry and music

On Wednesday, November 15, at 8:00 pm in Dunning Auditorium, the Queen's University Music Department will present Sir William Walton's Facade, an entertainment with poems by Dame Edith Sitwell. The poems will be recited by Norma Edwards and David Kemp, both of the Queen's Department of Drama. The music will be conducted by Duane A. Bates.

Facade is generally considered to be the work which established the international reputation of Sir William Walton as a composer. William (Turner) Walton was born in 1902, the son of a music teacher. Following training at Oxford College Cathedral Choir and Christ Church College, he took up residence with the Sitwell family.

In 1922 Facade was first presented as a drawing-room entertainment in the Sitwell mansion. Edith Sitwell began work on the poems, of which Facade is a sleection in 1920, and completed them the following year.

William Walton's own share in the joint effort was completed surprisingly quickly for so notoriously fastidious and self-critical a worker. To quote the composer: "Facade (an 'entertainment' for declamation, flute, clarinet, saxophone, trumpet, cello and percussion) was written in about three weeks and I never thought about it as much more than a couple of evenings' entertainment".

A revised version was given its first public performance at the Aeolain Hall in London in $923. At this performance, Edith Sitwell was perched (presumably on a step-ladder) behind a twelve-foot canvas face, one side grey and the other pink, divided down the centre of the nose, with a megaphone projecting from its mouth through which she declamed her poems.

Each poem was announced by her brother, Osbert, through another megaphone from a smaller canvas face at the side.

Frank Howes states: ". . . it is well to bear in mind that Miss Sitwell's poems are not written, as most poetry and all prose is written, to develop an idea or pursue a line of thought; on the contrary they play on words which are connected by free association, sometimes of assonanace, sometimes of sencse.

Their train of though must not be too relentlessly sought; . . . . . The flow of images is determined by exigencies of rhyme rather than of idea: the sound makes the sense. The addition of music is a substitute for ideas as the connecting thread and its function is to unify the roaming discursiveness of the poem".

Hockey Gals open with win

Queen's hockey Gals opened their league competition in Toronto Saturday, scoring once in each period to down U. of T. 3-1. The Gals got goals from Sheila Pratt, Karen Howatson and Gwen Harrison, and some excellent goaltending from veteran netminder Wanda Gyde to record their first wins of the season.

Sheila Pratt, who played a fine game on defense, scored the Gals' opening goal on a quick wrist shot from about 20 feet out with a little under four minutes gone in the first period. Varsity came back to tie the score at one-all on a power-play goal, and threatened several times late in the first period, but were unable to score.

Karen Howatson put the Gals ahead to stay mid-way through the second period when she backhanded the puck past the Toronto goalie. The score came out of a goal-mouth scramble, with Karen on her knees at the time. The insurance marker, late in the third period, was another backhand special. This time, Debby Gilmour, a four-year veteran with the Gals, split the Varsity defence and caught the far corner of the net with a sliding shot after pulling the goalie out of position.

Despite their two-goal edge, Queen's was lucky to come away with the win. The Toronto squad was in considerably better condition than the Gals (due mostly to a lack of ice-time, what with concerts and the like), and their positional play was correspondingly better. Queen's goalie Wanda Gyde (who picked up an assist on the third Queen's goal, incidentally) had to be very sharp on several occasions, since Toronto's shots on net were considerably more dangerous, if less frequent, than Queen's efforts at the other end. However, the Gals showed a real ability to dominate play as long as their skating held up, and the efforts of their defencemen were truly encouraging.

The Gals play their home openers this weekend, entertaining Guelph Friday night (6:30 pm) and Western on Saturday at 3:00 pm. Guelph and Western finished one-two in OWIAA standings last season, so a pair of wins, or even a split, would give Queen's a big lift in the pre-Christmas going. The Friday night game will be part of a double-header, with the Gaels meeting Ryerson at 8:00 pm in the second game. Fans will be appreciated for both matches.

Black Comedy

never let up and although there was no intermission the minutes slipped by too quickly and all of a sudden we were plunged into darkness again as light was restored to Brindsley's flat.

During the play, whenever a match was lit or a flashlight shone the stage lights dimmed to continue the intrigue of Shaffer's technical devise, and the lighting was as precise as the activities of the actors.

Ultimately though, Black Comedy is fun, and if pure theatrical enjoyment is what tickles the fancy, then this Domino production should not be missed, because it is one of the ticklish affairs Kingston has seen in quite awhile.

Badminton Gals on top

The women's badminton team are the surprise leaders after the first weekend of competition in OWIAA tournament play. The Gals swept their doubles matches, and lost only three singles on their way to a commanding lead in the double-round-robin event. Queen's met McMaster, Laurentian, Guelph, Waterloo-Lutheran, and the host University of Waterloo team in this first stage of competition.

In addition to an unblemished doubles record, the Gals' second, third, fourth, and sixth singles players went undefeated. Jane McMichael, Mary Lee Robbins, Pat MacKimmie, and rookie Diana Edwards proved too much for their opposition, sweeping all five matches with the other schools.

The next competition comes on November 25th, when Queen's will complete with first round-robin stage, meeting Carleton, Toronto, York, Western and Windsor at Carleton in Ottawa.

1sts win at York; 2nds finally lose

An abbreviated version of the 1st XV carried off the trophy at the York Invitational Seven-a-side Rugby Meet last Saturday. The Gaels found little difficulty in subduing the opposition of Brock, Waterloo and Guelph in the inside of the draw. The team was chosen from Lee Doney, Warren Smith, Dave Walters, Ross Stuart, Bob Common, Dave Murley, Alan Frizzell, and Jel Evanshen.

The Gaels downed Brock 20-0 in their first game, on the strength of two tries by Walters and singles from Stuart and Doney, with Murley adding two converts. Walters, Doney and Murley were again on the mark against Waterloo, with Queen's taking a hard-fought 10-0 victory to move into the final against Guelph.

In this last match, the Gaels established an early lead when Dave Walters sprinted past his opposite number for the opening try. Guelph came back with several strong runs, only to be thwarted by some fine defensive play on the part of the Gaels. However, Guelph did get three points on a penalty kick.

In the second half, Queen's reasserted their control, and an incisive run by Evanshen resulted in the second try for the Gaels, putting the issue beyond doubt.

After this sevens tournament, Queen's 2nd XV met that of Guelph for the All-Ontario University Seconds Title. Guelph pushed across 21 points to edge the previously undefeated seconds 21-7; before this, Queen's had allowed only 3 points, on a penalty kick, for the season.

Although Queen's looked sharp in the early going, the muddy conditions favoured the much-heavier Guelph pach. The game was much closer than the score would indicate, with some gruelling forward play and effective three-quarter running by both teams. Guelph managed to confine play to the forwards, where they enjoyed a distinct advantage, and in so doing, won the championship.

Despite this final loss, the seconds shouldn't be despondent. They had had an outstanding season, and their play in the championship game was outstanding.

Waterpolo 3rd in OUAA

National team vets too much for Gaels

The dominating presence of Canadian National Waterpolo Team captain Cliff Berry proved to be too much for Simon Beitler's pool sharks on Saturday, as Western beat the Gaels 5-1 in a semi-final match in the OUAA Waterpolo championships at York. The loss eliminated Queen's from the competition, and dropped them into a third-place finish overall in the league.

Western got two goals from Olympic swimmer Bill Kennedy, with Berry, Norm Craig and rich Seggal adding singles, while Queen's lone goal was notched by forward Dave Howard. Western went on to meet defending champion McMaster, who dumped U. of T. 13-4, for the title.

The game started out at a fast pace, with both sides going all-out to get the opening goal. Western stretched out to a 2-0 lead at half-time, as their superior conditioning (Western gets more than double the pool hours that the Gaels have to work with) and Berry's leadership took its toll. Howard brought the Gaels back to one down early in the third period, and had a golden opportunity to tie the score about a minute later, but his backhand drive was picked off by Western's goalie.

Seggal stretched the Western lead to 3-1, but the Gaels kept battling back. Three times, shots from George Craig, Jack Muir and Archie Nesbitt hit the inside of the net frame . . and bounced out! Western smothered the rebounds, and the last desperate effort was on.

The Gaels put six men on the attack during the last two minutes of play, but these tactics backfired, with Berry's cool ball-handling enabling the 'Stangs to move down the pool and score. Western potted two goals in the last two minutes to seal Queen's fate.

The Gaels were third in the OUAA, after winning the Eastern Division, which marks another step up for a young team. Coach Simon Beitler will again be entering a team in the Eastern Ontario Waterpolo League. Queen's won this league last season, and qualified for the Canadian championships finishing 5th in the nation. Continued fan interest in this post Christmas action is hoped for.

Admission tests discussed

CUP — In an effort to facilitate reform in American higher education, the United States National Student Association (NSA) is staging a grass-roots assault on the discriminatory nature of standardized educational admissions and testing programs, through nationwide public hearings.

Ed Rosenthal, director of the NSA educational innovations desk, said standardized testing, as it is now practised, discriminates against a significant cross-section of potential students.

"Blacks, Chicanos, Puerto Ricans, native Americans, and immigrants all contend that such tests are culturally biased and linguistically discriminatory."

"Bureaucratic incompentence" within the testing programs resulting in lost transcripts and incorrect test scores, has also been raised.

In conjunction with the public hearings, NSA plans to send questionnaires to student governments of member schools and select non-member schools, as well as instructions for holding individual hearings.

Hockey Gaels get bombed on weekend

The hockey Gaels made a two-game road trip to Montreal on the weekend, and if the game results set the tone, most of them wished they hadn't. Queen's lost 10-3 to Loyola, in a game that was dominated by the Quebec school. John Smith, Chris Clark, and Ron White scored for the Gaels, as Loyola took a 4-2 lead in the first period, stretched it to 8-2 in the second, then coasted to their easy win.

The Sunday game, against Sir George Williams, was a 4-1 effort, with Jim Adair's blast from beyond the blue line being Queen's only score. The margin of play was closer in this one, though.

The Gaels had a bad case of New York Ranger-itis: about ten passes for every shot. Adair looked to be the class player for Queen's in both games, despite a nagging ankle problem.

Volleyball Gaels on rebuilding road

Queen's men's volleyball team, who captured the OUAA crown last season, seem ready to put up a stiff defence of their title, despite a massive change in personnel from last year. Only playing-coach Vaclav Smola and Frank Massong return from the squad that placed 3rd in the Canadian finals last spring. Smola will be aided by another playing-coach, George Janota, who brings four years of intercollegiate experience at Laurentian to the team. However, these three are the only intercollegiate veterans on the team.

Potentially, the Gaels are a championship-calibre team, who will probably improve over the course of the season. But, this will take time. The Gaels finished third in their first university competition of the season, an Invitational tournament in Waterloo two weeks ago. The Gaels lost to the eventual winner, York, 2-1 in the semi-finals, after winning their section and edging Lutheran 2-1 in the quarter-finals. The games against York were close, but the Gaels' inexperience showed upl as the Yeomen did enjoy an edge in play. Experience will make the difference here; the only question is whether it will come soon enough.

The Gaels open their league play by hosting the first of four OUAA round-robin tournaments this Saturday. Seven teams, from Toronto, York, Carleton, Laurentian, Ottawa U., Ryerson and Queen's, will take part. Play gets underway at 10:00 am in the Bartlett gym.

A word about money, structure and reps

Every Arts and Science student pays to A.S.U.S. a fee of $4.50; below is an account of what the A.S.U.S. executive is doing with it. A.S.U.S. has been accumulating capital at an unsetting rate over the past few years, largely as a result of its sale of the Typing Service, a perennial money-loser. Since Arts and Science students are not paying this fee simply to fatten the A.S.U.S. bank account, we decided this year that A.S.U.S. had to rationalise its funds.

Since there are not enough people or ideas within the membership of the A.S.U.S. Executive and affiliated organisations to spend this surplus profitably, we were faced with the immediate possibility of cutting back the A.S.U.S. fee. However, we were reluctant to implement this alternative because we believed that the money could be put to good use somewhere on campus. Instead we decided to solicit projects from A.S.U.S. members and, more generally to set up an ongoing institution to tap people presently uninvolved in student politics for ideas as to how this perennial surplus could be spent to the benefit of Arts and Science students. (This institution is described later in the report).

A second problem confronting A.S.U.S. has been non-financial: Arts and Science students have gained much in the way representation on the governing bodies of Queen's in the past years - principally on Senate and the Faculty Board of Arts and Science. As of yet, however, we have not done terribly much with it. Senators and Faculty Board representatives find themselves reacting to proposals of senior administrators and committees rather than making significant positive contributions in their own right. We have reached a position where we can say yes and no but not where we propose concrete comprehensive alternatives. Arts and Science students do not control their education to the extend they should because of their own failure to take advantage of the representation they have won, rather than because of faculty-administration obstruction. (Faculty and administration at Queen's have done considerably more than could reasonably be expected to give students a voice).

We feel that what is required to harmonise and give direction to student representation within the faculty of Arts and Science is some sort of body, informal or formal in which Faculty Board representatives, Senators and others can meet several times a year for purposes of mutual enlightenment. In such a forum Arts and Science representatives to the major campus governing bodies could discuss specific issues pending in Senate or Faculty Board as they affect Arts and Science students and agree on common goals, changes etc. towards which Arts and Science representatives should be working in their various offices. In this way, we would not be going to our meetings as individuals but as members of an informal group - our action would be co-ordinated; we would be forced to think more and, just possibly we might be in a position to make significant contributions towards a better educational experience for Arts and Science students.

To resolve the financial "problems" of A.S.U.S. and the representational problem which Arts and Science students face generally, we are trying to form what has been provisionally called an Association of Departmental Student Councils. This association would consist of:

1. The chairman of every Departmental Student Council.
2. The representative to Faculty Board of every DSC (in many cases, the chairman and the DSC rep. are the same person
3. The Arts Senators
4. The Arts Reps on A.M.S.
5. Two members of the A.S.U.S Executive.

The Council would meet once a month to discuss those issues pending in Faculty Board, Senate and the A.M.S. which affect the educational experience of Arts and Science students. In addition to providing coherence to Arts and Science student representation across campus. It would allow us to discuss our education in general terms and to formulate alternatives, reforms and proposals, and to pursue their realisation. In our opinion, these possibilities alone justify the attempt to set up this association.

The association could have a financial committee to which would be allotted a fixed proportion of A.S.U.S. revenue every year (i.e. the present surplus - approximately $3500.00) The committee would consist of the DSC Chairman or delegates and would meet at specified intervals to allocate the funds at its disposal. Individual DSC's would be encouraged to apply through their representatives on the Finance Committee for money to sponsor lectures, education projects or ventures designed to bring students in a particular discipline closer together (e.g. the Ecomomics DSC ran a symposium on foreign ownership last year). Thse could be low-key, small-scale affairs (the English DSC in writing a poet to give a reading) or larger symposia (say a co-operative effort by the Politics and Physics DSC on the politics of technology). Either way, the DSC's would add greatly to the wuality of Queen's as an educational institution by moving into this field. Having discussed the idea with several people active in their DSC's, we are convinced that there are enough interested and competent people within the DSC structure to come up with the ideas and projects to make this work.

In brief then, we propose to form an Association of Departmental Student Councils to:

i. provide some direction to Arts and Science representatives across campus and focus their attention on education within the Faculty of Arts and Science.
ii. to allocate a fixed proportion of the A.S.U.S. budget each year between the various DSC's so as to encourage educational projects and DSC initiative generally.

There will be a general meeting of all DSC chairmen, Arts and Science representatives to Faculty Board, Arts Senators, Arts AMS representatives and the A.S.U.S. Executive Thursday night in Goodwin Hall, (new Mining Building) to discuss this proposal.

Canada: Consumer price index shows small increase for October

OTTAWA — The consumer price index recorded a slight increase during October despite a drop in food prices, Statistics Canada have announced. Higher housing and clothing costs sent the index to 142 from 141.8 in September and caused a drop in the buying power of the 1961 consumer dollar from seventy-one to seventy cents.

Although the price of restaurant meals showed an increase, the price of take-home food managed to fall significantly. A market basket which in September cost $14.31 was priced at $14.13 in October. This drop in food prices during October has become usual fro that month during the past few years.

OTTAWA — Trade and Commerce Minister Jean-Luc Pepin was defeated in the judicial recount of the October 30 election in Drummond riding. Declared defeated on the basis of election night results, Pepin was later given a five vote plurality in the official recount. The judicial recount, which is declared final gave Social Credit candidate Jean Marie Boivert a seventy vote victory.

The judicial recount in Selkirk riding confirmed New Democratic Party Candidate Doug Rowland's victory over Conservative Dean Whiteway.

House standings are now Liberals 108, Conservatives 108, New Democratic Party 31, Social Credit 15 and Independents 2.

MONTREAL — Bell Telephone has applied to the Canadian Transport Commission for extensive rate increases to be applied over the next two years. Bell has called for a doubling of installation charges from $11 to $22, a five cent increase in the basic monthly service charge and a twenty-five cent charge for calls to directory assistance.

The company maintains that the increases are necessary to raise their earnings to a high enough level to allow attraction of $1.2 billion in outside funds, to finance growth and expansion. Costs have soared out of the company's control, a spokesman for Bell claimed, citing mainly wages and construction costs.

OTTAWA — A report released by the Economic Council of Canada last week called for the government to hold the line on taxes and even called for an easing of them. The government, it reported, would be able to derive enough revenue for new programs without an increase in the personal income tax rate because of the strong growth exhibited by the Gross National Product and the resulting revenue this would bring.

The Council Report outlined a set of indicative targets for the economy, including an unemployment rate of 4.5 per cent by 1975, price increases held to 3 per cent a year at that time and a goal of a 6 per cent growth in GNP. During the past decade unemployment has averaged 5.2 per cent, price increases have been 3.2 per cent and economic growth has been 5.4 per cent.

KINGSTON — MP for Kingston and the Islands Flora MacDonald has begun to carry out some her campaign promises. She is organizing as many groups as she can into town hall meetings and has been attending numerous community meetings to hear city residents air their complaints. MacDonald ran on a campaign of keeping in touch with people.

OTTAWA — Anik, Telesat Canada's 30 communications satellite, was launched last week from Cape Kennedy and is presently orbiting the earth right on the company's projected schedule. It is presently being controlled by a Telesat team at mission control in Ottawa.

The satellite is orbiting in an eliptical pattern above the equator and is 22,300 miles above the earth at its farthest point and 100 miles at the nearest. The satellite will be manoeuvered into a uniform position 22,300 miles out.

Already Telsat Canada has received inquiries from four U.S. companies as to possible use of the satellite. The National Cable TV Association has asked for channels in the satellite for use in broadcasting to various member cable systems. General Electric Company of New York has also expressed an interest in using Anik to test the feasibility of building a private domestic communications satellite network in the U.S. Western Union Telegraph Corp and Western Union International have also expressed an interest in the project and the latter may request two channels in the satellite for broadcasting football games to national networks.

The following tables set out recent trends in selected areas of the economy.

World: Canada, U.S. conflict on dumping

LONDON — A battle is developing over ocean dumping of wastes with Canada and most other coastal states supporting more rigid regulations and the United States calling for relaxation of such measures in emergency situations.

After extensive debate over the past two years in Ottawa and Switzerland, the International Conference in London was called o formulate a convention on marine pollution.

The United States has demanded a change in the previously agreed upon convention control of emergency dumping of radioactive, chemical or biological warfare materials into the sea.

Only the United States, the Soviet Union and Japan have failed to sign the agreement.

TEL AVIV — Fighting on the border between Israel and Syria has been stepped up, Israeli forces have sealed off the occupied Golan Heights area of Syria and their troops have been ordered to stay on full alert.

Israeli jets have downed two Syrian aircraft, destroyed a surface-to-air missile battery and bombed artillery concentration in Syria.

WASHINGTON — The "Big 4" powers have each issued a communique recognizing the division of East and West Germany and supporting each of their bids for a seat in the United Nations.

The simultaneous declaration by England, France, the Soviet Union and the United States follows the agreement reached last week between the two Germany's extending mutual diplomatic recognition and formally recognizing their postwar separation.

The "Big 4" statements reinforce the weak places in the inter-Germany treaty dealing with the question of eventual reunification.

SAIGON — South Vietnamese President Nguyen Van Thieu has announced that all North Vietnamese troops must be out of South Vietnam before an agreement to end the war can be finalized.

NEW YORK — Prices on the New York Stock Exchange reached their highest level in history last Friday as the Dow Jones Industrial Average topped 1000 in heavy trading. The exchange was spurred by hopes of an early peace in Vietnam, a strong U.S. economy and Nixon's landslide election victory.

LONDON — A skull, at least 2,600,000 years old, belonging to "an upright biped" has been discovered in South Africa, upsetting a major theory of evolution.

The skull, discovered by Richard Leaky, Administrative Director of the National Museum of Kenya, suggests that there were members of the species "homo sapius" at least one million years before the existence of the "apeman" who was believed to be man's ancestor.

LOS ANGLEES — California voters in last Tuesday's Presidential election also voted to reinstate capital punishment in that state. The two-to-one majority approval to reintroduce the death penalty reverses a State Supreme Court decision to abolish it on the basis that executions are "cruel and unusual".

The California voters also voted against the legalization of marijuana and against stern censorship measures to combat pornography.

Looking About

by Bob Mutrie

I have followed the affairs of Chile these past two years. I must admit my interest derives not in any deep concern for its people or culture, rather in the election in 1970 of a socialist President, Salvador Allende. Mr. Allende's Popular Unity government is composed of his own Socialist Party, the Communists, and other groups to their left. It is a coalition in the nineteen-thirties tradition of popular fronts, and seeks, through its programme, the social ownership of a broad sector of the economy.

Ever since his accession to the Presidency, Mr. Allende has been beset with problems. Many are of his own making. The most serious are subtler and to those I direct this column.

Upon assumption of office in 1970, Popular Unity's first priority was to redistribute the national income and its concmitants of social power. Laudable aims, they were fudged in the application of the principle. Salaries were raised without regard to cost of living, 220,000 jobs were created in a country with a population of less than 10 million, and programmes of great expenditure on public works were begun. In 1971, the government was naturally faced with a budgetary deficit. This it 'solved' by printing more money, the volume of which rose 120 per cent during that year.

Rapid inflation is the outcome of such policies in a relatively free economy, at least as regards services. Moreover, the increases in individual income were directed toward the purchase of manufactures,most of which Chile must import. When the world price of copper,Chile's greatest export and largest earner of foreign exchange, fell by 23 per cent, the financing of such imports became extremely difficult. In these disabilities and misappropriations, one can clearly perceive the roots of the disaffection and political turmoil which have become increasingly bitter in the past year.

I think Popular Unity's problems are deeper than its mistakes. One must remember Mr. Allende was elected with a plurality and not a majority, and that it was the strict observance of the constitution by the Christian Democrats, who control Chile's parliament, which allowed him to take office.

However, there is a finer point. Popular Unity is frustrated in its attempts to impart revolutionary changes in Chilean society. If it is to redistribute social power, it necessarily must be at the expense of the group which holds it, the middle classes. If they choose to resist, as they have, they can throttle a government which attempts to proceed democratically against them. They are the managers, the educators and educated, the artisans, owners of all forms of public service, purveyors of most opinion. The fundamental problem is whether to abandon the freedom to disagree or to accept the partial implementation of its aims.

AMS discusses student unionism

The AMS Outer Council discussed the pros and cons of Queen's joining the fledgling National Union of Students at its regular meeting Wednesday night.

Leslie Bankes, in reporting on the NUS organizational conference in Ottawa last weekend, commented that she was "disappointed that Queen's hasn't shown a strong interest in joining. She said that "people question its (a national union) effectiveness, but we were just sitting back and letting it viable," rather than helping make it viable.

She stated that the NUS could be manipulated by radical campuses, in a way that would not be in the interests of student representation.

President Greg LeBlanc disagreed saying that the concept of the national union was a "bad idea" when there was trouble in the Ontario Union of students. He thought that issues on a national level could be handled by conferences on "isolated events as they arise."

Both Ken Wong, former External Affairs Commissioner, and Ted Cape, ASUS president agreed with LeBlanc.

Present External Affairs Commissioner Lyn Whitham, however, said she "sees a definite need for a National Union of Student's, especially if the federal government is going to be getting into university financing."

She said that if it were left until a crisis, the idea of isolated conferences would not be able to present a united student viewpoint. Miss Whitham favoured Queen's making a decision (by referendum) on joinging NUS in February.

Law Representative John Hill summed things up saying that there was no merit in a national union that didn't present a united student opinion. He drew parallels between the NUS and the Canadian Union of Students which died a few years ago because it became out of touch with students.

Referring to the lack of interest of members from the Maritimes and Quebec, Hill said that there was no reason in joining NUS until it gave "true student representation."

(At the NUS organizational meeting, at which Queen's was an observer, various methods of voting were discussed heatedly. The meeting ended with delegates from Quebec and the Maritimes walking out. Only Simon Fraser was mandidated by its students to join; other universities are planning referenda on the question.)

The Outer Council also defeated a resolution from the OFS general meeting calling for a permanent student-labour liaison committee. This motion has been under heated debate when the AUS meeting was declared inquorate two weeks ago.

Miss Whitham presented the resolution, but asked that it be defeated because it was not "in the spirit of OFS." She stated that, in principle, a liaison with other groups was a good idea, but considering the preamble to the motion which called for the abolition of strike-breaking and student support for the labour movement, she felt that leftists members of the OFS would use the motion to "rubber stamp" every labour demand that came up."

She reiterated her earlier statements that the OFS is just a fledgling organization, stating that its purpose in life is still to be defined; but warned that it is already beginning to lose credibility with students.

Ted Cape argued most vehemently in favour of the motion saying that organized labour is in favour of accessibility, the same as students, and disputed the claim that the OFS would be a rubber stamp. Cape said that the motion was not committing support to anything, and that with no ability to make policy, a liaison committee could do no harm.

Wong accused Miss Whitham of contradicting herself by asking for the support from organized labour for the OFS demands regarding tuition and student awards, but then opposing setting up a committee to work with labour.

Education rep Dave Hudson asked if labour had asked for support. "No," was the reply. "Then OFS should mind its own business," stated Hudson.

There was also long debate on the Tricolor awards. Doug Prichard, Grad President, presented a new election by-law which lowered the number of required Outer Council members on the Tricolor Award selection committee, allowed for the committee itself to make nominations, and provided that a recipient did not have to be a currently registered student.

An ammendement to the motion reinstated the requirement of current attendance at Queen's for qualification. Another amendment to abolish nominations from the selection committee itself was defeated. The by-law still requires third reading.

Vice-President Wally Palmer explained the changes in the concert committee which were presented at the last meeting.

He said that the new structure which provided for house managers, publicity managers and others for concerts to be paid a stipend for their efforts was quite in keeping with the spirit of the concert committee as that committee was responsible for the administration of the fund -- but not for the actual nit-picking details of administering an individual concert.

Palmer pointed out that last year, the concert committee was lucky to have excellent people who had the time to do both jobs, while this year, there are only three persons on the committee who have been able to work heavily on the detailed promotion of individual concerts.

He said that if the new system were not instated, there would be no one to do the concerts.

Twenty-six members was the maximum number of members at the meeting. At times it dipped, and towards the end only 14 (5 less than quorum) remained.

Other action at the meeting included:

Ratification of Ian MacIntyre as new Campus Activities Commissioner, and Steve Sugar as Concert Committee Chairman.

Tabling of a motion to set up a typing room in the Union for general student use. The matter will probably be brought up at the next AMS general meeting.

Final reading was given to the Queen's Student Agencies By-Law.

Passed a motion calling for the establishment of a person to serve as a liaison between the Opportunities for Youth office and OFY recipients. This is to cut down on students being stung because of personal difficulties with OFY officials.

AMS fee increase asked

The AMS will ask students to raise taxes by a dollar and a half next Tuesday. A referendum called at Wednesday's AMS meeting will ask "Shall the AMS specific fee be raised from $6.50 to $8.00?" A simple majority is required for passage.

In explaining the need for the referendum, Vice-president Wally Palmer said that in the past few years, the AMS has been having problems balancing its budget, and that it has been having to turn down requests for money from students wishing to sponsor projects. "People are not happy," he said.

Palmer said that over half of the AMS budget of $60,000 is needed to run the AMS bureaucracy to enable there to be meetings, elections, an office, and so on. He pointed out that costs of the office have been rising for the past few years, while revenue has been only increasing as more students register.

OFS demonstration on

There will be an OFS "Day of Protest" (demonstration) in Toronto this Tuesday afternoon. The demonstration goes on even without the support of the students from Queen's Western, and the University of Toronto.

(The demonstration has been an off-again, on-again thing for the past few weeks, and is not being supported by a number of campuses because they think it is a waste of time and effort.)

Physed centre to have guards; check ID

Guards will be employed to control entry to the Physical Education Centre and the Arena. This move is designed to eliminate the threats to the physical well being of some employees and users which result from the intrusion of undesirable persons into these facilities and also to curb resultant acts of indecency, vandalism and theft.

Signs will be posted indicating that entrance to the building will be possible only through the main doors off Union and Clergy Streets. All other doors, including those in the Arena, will be locked on the inside. The Arena doors will be locked only for access to intercollegiate and other such events.

Students and faculty must present the appropriate membership card when entering the building. It will also be necessary to make advance arrangements at the administrative office when bringing guests into the building.

User's committee discusses centre concept

by Bob Mutrie

The University Centre Users' Committee regular meeting last Monday opened to a statement by Committee member D. A. Soberman, Dean of Law, who suggested that the people who have chastised the Users' Committee for not giving enough consideration to the possibility of sub-centres, "have not read the planning reports".

The University Centre Users' Committee received considerable criticism at an Open Meeting held on October 27 for discussion of the University Centre concept. A number of persons at that meeting pointed out that one large central building was not desirable and that the possibility of a number of sub-centres should be considered.

Soberman pointed out that although the original AMS study initiated in 1969 supported a "gigantic enterprise" the planning committee which followed scaled it down and added sub-centres. "We are now talking about something smaller than Dunning Hall," he said, referring to the main centre. The report included the development of a number of sub-centres.

The report of the University Centre Planning Committee compiled in 1971, called for a new centre comprised of 66,000 square feet in addition to the present 40,000 square feet contained in the Union.

Soberman pointed out that with 20,000 square feet of the new centre assigned to a bookstore, and 10,000 square feet to commercial space, 30,000 square feet would be left for improvement of food facilities.

"We are not talking about a massive centre", he said, but added that sub-centres without a main centre is also "utterly ridiculous". The centre would provide the needed focal point, he suggested.

A lot of people are misinformed, he commented, and consequently they are talking about a "massive monolythic building". Soberman suggested that "people haven't done their homework" and that they should read the reports of the previous committees.

Both the Steering and Planning Committees agreed that the University Centre should be a system with several sub-centres including the Arts Social Sciences Complex, the Drama and Music Buildings, and Ontario Hall. The Users' Committee function now is mainly just to determine and assign the space.

However, Soberman cautioned that the centre must be at least a certain minimum size to be successful. "If the main building is broken down much more than it is, sub-centres will become added amenities for the people who work there", he warned.

At the same time Soberman suggested that there be an organization in which sub-centre management be co-ordinated with the management of the main centre.

Soberman called for, and the Committee agreed to the publishing of a statement to inform the University Community on the status of the centre.

Users' Committee Chairman R. D. Norman, Professor of Mathematics told the Committee that he would compile a summary listing of the types of services which the Committee has agreed to include in a university centre-sub-centre system and list with them the reasons for and against their inclusions as discussed by the committee. He pointed out that the list would serve as a preliminary guide to the architect as well as a list for organizations to check and that it would be reversible. The list he said could be challenged and the point would then be gone over again by the Committee. It would allow opportunity for questions to be raised again, he said. Norman also stated that the list would not be frozen for at least three or four weeks.

Norman also pointed out to the meeting that the letter he mentioned he had received from C.E.S. Franks, Professor of Political Studies outlined his views on the inclusion of a recital hall in the University Centre System, and not to renege his views expressed at the October 27 Open Meeting, as the Journal previously stated. However, Norman pointed out, that the communication he received from Franks on the latter subject simply stated that Franks had expressed his views on the inclusion of sub-centres more forcefully to make his suggestion clearer.

Students can still vote in city

The municipal elections will be held on Dec. 4.

If you are not presently enumerated for the election, to have the right to vote, you must go down to the Election Office at City Hall at 19 Queen Street. You will receive a form that will entitle you to vote and which must be presented when voting.

It is possible, although this practice is discouraged, to go to the polls with suitable identification and fill in the appropriate certificates there. However, if you are not enumerated you are encouraged to go down to the City Hall.

There has been a problem lately with people wanting to change the ward in which they were registered to vote. There has been great interest shown in the Sydenham ward. However, it is now too late to switch wards if you have already been placed in one.

At present, out of 1000 students in the Leonard Field residences, 555 have been enumerated.

In women's residences on campus out of 1113 students 604 are eligible to vote at present — 54.2 per cent of the women residents.

Students in Adelaide, Ban Righ and Chown residents will vote at a station set up in one of these residences. Similarly, there will be a poll set up in Brockington-Gordon House, in Leonard Hall and in Victoria Hall. Residents of Morris and MacNeil Halls will vote in a poll set up in one of these two residences.

Soberman, in reply to Frank's suggestion for a recital hall, stated that the subject had been discussed at great length last year and he pointed out that the great cost of including such a facility in the system was a bad use of facilities at this time.

It was suggested that a recital hall that would seat two hundred to three hundred people could cost as much as a quarter of a million dollars.

However, it was suggested that a recital hall could be included in a sub-centre and that it might be looked at in the renovation plans for Ontario Hall. The Committee decided that the suggestion would be put on the list for consideration.

A report on food services compiled by A. Erickson, the architect of the new centre, was distributed to the Users' Committee, listing present dining facilities and those projected.

The report, first presented to the October 23 regular meeting, was revised to take account of services being offered by the proposed Health Sciences Complex which will be serving a projected 600 noon meals, and the Arts Social Science Complex which will be serving 300 noon meals.

Erickson's figures showed that the Union was presently accommodating 789 seats and estimated that 1,095 seats would be a suitable goal. This, the architect suggested, at a turnover rate of just a little over 2, would provide for 2300 noon meals. It is presently serving 1100 meals.

Committee member R.N. Poole suggested that a 50 per cent participation rate from off-campus students was unrealistically high and that many of these people might be eating at home.

Soberman, however, stated that a more optimistic view could be taken and that the present 39 per cent participation rate could be attributed to the fact that the union is so unpleasant. Many go there as a last resort, he said, and pointed out that if made more pleasant, the union could experience an increase in patronage.

Soberman said that 1,000 seats and 2,000 meals was a reasonable estimate and that the centre should aim for nothing less than that. The turnover rate could then be increased to 2.5 times and 2500 people could be accomodated if pressure builds, he said.

Soberman also stated that the proposal would make provision for an additional 100 seats in a sub-centre other than the Arts Social Sciences Complex.

The total increase, Soberman said, is not all that large, going from the present 800 seats to the projected 1000.

The Committee passed Erickson's recommendation and also agreed that one hundred seats would be made available in possibly a buffeteria room in a sub-centre.

It was also agreed by the Committee that a suggestion be made for the expansion of dining facilities in the future if pressures build.

Students Reginald Rickaby and George Smith then presented a proposal for facilities needed by the Pub in a new centre.

The report which they compiled pointed out that the Pub's present facilities are packed to capacity and that they are forced to often exceed regulations.

They pointed out that their storage facilities are presently located in the basement of the Union near the Journal office and that this presents a problem of transporting the cases at the end of the night.

The report also suggested that the Pub lacks adequate facilities for cooling beer. It also pointed up the need for facilities for formals, smokers and other campus events, emphasizing the cost of converting other buildings on campus for these events.

The report called for a large enough room for multipurpose events which at the same time could be a permanent base for the Pub and accomodate various other events. It suggested locating somewhere on the ground of basement floor where loading and unloading beer could be made easier and where it would be apart from other functions to avoid noise complaints. The proposal also called for consideration of a refrigerated room although it is not presently essential.

Soberman pointed out that the Pub's permanent need was basically for a storage room and that easting areas could be converted at night for Pub use.

Smith suggested that a room that could be converted for use for 1000 people would be ideal for use at Smokers and that during other times it could be divided off by use of portable walls.

Soberman stated that one large room in a small building would create architectural problems and said that given the Arena and Grant Hall, he was "not sure we want a pub converted to these affairs" to the exclusion of others. "We cannot have facilities like that to give one group a monopoly over them".

Student member Marney Cousins stated that Grant Hall is very effective for semi-formals and that space such as this on campus also helps draw people to other areas besides the Centre.

Rickaby pointed out though, that the use of these other buildings is at the expense of the Centre. He said that a major reason for groups losing money is the great cost of converting buildings and moving things around. He also pointed out that the floors in these areas while suited to dancing, were unsuited to pubbing.

Soberman suggested that Grant Hall could be given permanent facilities to make it more useful.

The Committee also noted that some kind of "quiet pub" facility is needed.

Norman then suggested that the Committee was really not yet in a position to reach a conclusion and suggested further more detailed study of the matter before committing themselves.

Rector candidates complain of apathy

Student apathy was the order of the evening as the five candidates for rector outlined their platforms to an incredibly small audience of about fifteen people Wednesday night.

"I am not sure that there is apathy at Queen's," candidate Brian Copeland stressed, and he stated that he wants a term as Rector to prove it. He pointed out that the Rector must be the ombudsman for the university and that he must be visible to help.

Candidate Gary Gannage, pointed out that student organizations are losing the faith of the student body, that they are losing sight of the student interest and that they are in danger of falling apart and dying. Gannage suggested that as Rector, he would try and promote interaction among groups and encourage collective goals for them to work towards.

Victoria Kemsley, Candidate for Rector, put forward the proposition that apathy is becoming a cliche and that people are interested, but that "each individual has different priorities". Some people believe in strictly work, she said and added that the Rector should encourage people to be more interested in outside areas. This might be accomplished with better communications.

Candidate, Peter Crickmore, suggested that in a state of growth, the members of the university community find it harder to interact on a person to person basis. He said that he would encourage individuals to work together in the community.

Eric Salsbury, Candidate for Rector, stated that the issues that student government is concerning itself with are really not those of the students. He pointed out that the "governing elite" is going off by itself, on its own.

In the apathy discussion, Kemsley took a strong stand on the issue that the rector and the AMS must tell the students what is going on and that the result of this action would be less apathy. Students would gain a greater respect for the AMS if they know what they are doing, she said.

Copeland stated that we must get away from the idea of everyone getting involved, but added that "if the Rector can get just one person involved, then his job is accomplished". He stressed that it is not that the students don't care, but that they really aren't prepared to get involved. "Why hassle them?"

Gannage pointed out that to lash out at apathy is wrong and that some are naturally more apathetic than others. However, he warned, the way the AMS is moving, it is "turning people off". It is the job of Rector, he noted to bring them back...

Salsbury agreed that students cannot be blamed for apathy and stated that the rector must take an interest in the little problems in his role as ombudsman. The Rector must be able to tell the students when and how to go about solving their problems.

Copeland claimed that the Rector must go out to the students, knock on doors, and discuss issues with individuals.

Present Rector Alan Broadbent stressed that what he felt the most important role of the office was that the Rector must be consistent if he is to avoid confusing the people he is working with.

Any person who takes the office of Rector must find that consistency in a constant view of people and relationships, he said.

Broadbent also pointed out that the university is based on individuals dealing with each other and that problems must be solved on a face to face relationship. If this is not ensured, Broadbent stated that they could "screw up the system with the bureaucracy" and that there will be a lot of institutional problems that can hurt people. He also said that a lot of people will then not operate as well as they are able.

Deutsch criticizes university financing

by Jennifer Grass

"The new system of student aid operates in such a way as to be a handicap to low income students," Principal John J. Deutsch told the Committee of University Affairs in Toronto on Tuesday.

With the delegation from Queen's consisting of both faculty and students, Deutsch presented the annual brief on the university's plans and problems to the CUA, and gave a sneak preview of what could be expected in the final draft of the Wright Report. The CUA is supposed to advise the government on all matters concerning education, although it was not consulted on the matter of fee increases and student award decreases this spring before the provincial budget was handed down.

Deutsch specifically labelled the aid program for graduate students as a "system of harrassment and attrition" and urged that the governments policies be made consistent with their actions.

"If universal accessibility is their decision, then allocation of resources must be consistent with it but if limited accessibility wins the day then we will have to adjust our policies," he said.

Deutsch called for a review of "a system aimed at middle and high income groups."

When asked which of the two government moves, was acting as a greater deterent to low income groups, Deutsch emphasized that both factors have this effect.

He referred to the soon to be released final report of the Wright Commission, of which he was a member, which recommends a graduated scale of aid.

By applying the means test on the basis of family income, a low income student would receive most of his aid in the form of a grant while higher income students would have a progressively smaller grant and larger loan.

This scheme first articulated in a draft report last spring had no effect on the government budgetary decisions in March.

Deutsch argued that it appeared the fee increase was intended to discourage numbers. If the government needed more revenue he felt it was a "ragged way of going about it."

University Finacing

The problem of declining resources was outlined with specific reference made to the need for a review of how universities are financed.

In the 1960's rising overhead costs were absorbed by expansion but this is no longer the case.

To control overhead, "we have tried to put the computer centre and other kinds of instructional technology on a self-supporting basis," Deutsch said but added "we can only do this sort of thing for so long before we will be forced to make harmful cuts."

The progress, expansion and improved quality of post-secondary institutions in the 1960's received special emphasis. But these advances were cloaked with the fear that if resources were cut any more quality would be in jeopardy.

The effects of declining enrolment have already caused financial embarrassment in some institutions as well as a "disorderly competitive struggle" for students.

Deutsch called for an extensive review of the present methods of financing universities on the basis of enrolment. The government's grant to a university is calculated according to the basic income unit of a student. Each student has a BIV weight, a term which refers to the cost of educating a student. The BIV has been increased each year by 5 to 6 per cent but this year the increase is only 2 per cent.

Deutsch suggested that government funding be calculated in terms of a target grant not based on enrolment. "This would take pressure off the sheer lumping of bodies to get revenue and would give greater stability to universities," he commented.

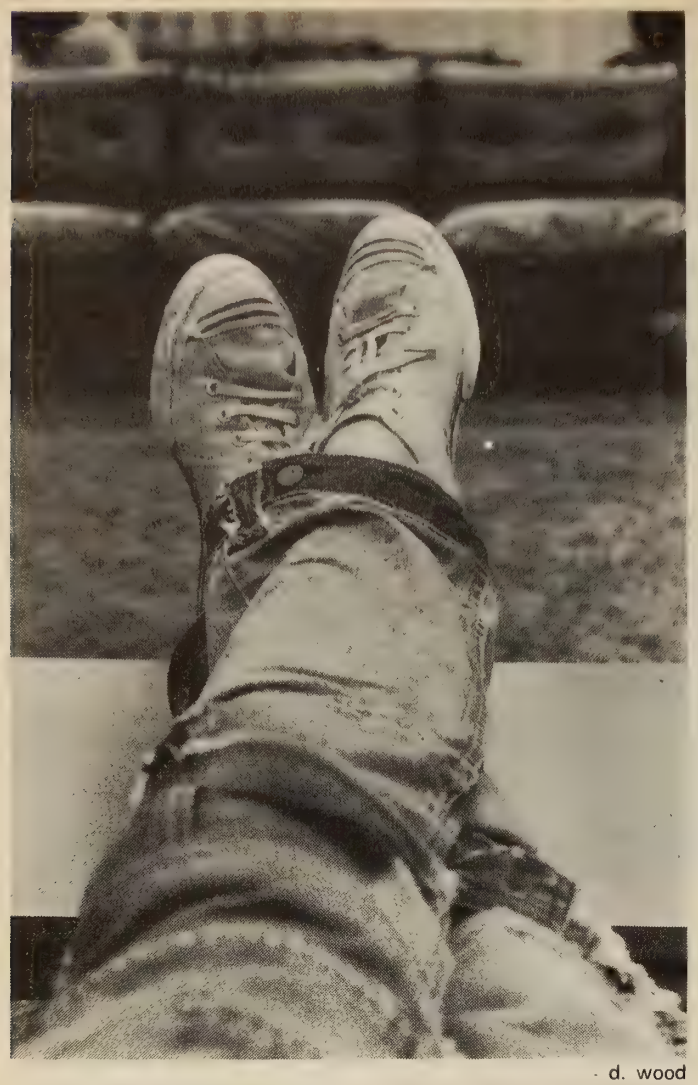
After the presentation H. H. Walker, Deputy Minister of the Department of Colleges and Universities timidly remarked that the problems facing "universities were similar to those facing the government--not enough funds." He pointed out that "in the 8 years ending in 1971 the government had accumulated a deficit of $350 million, $45 million a year."

Deutsch retaliated with the comment, "I think universities have taken a sharper cut than other activities."

J. D. Gibson, chairman of the Board of Trustees warned the committee that Queen's "can't keep up the quality of its program on a 2 per cent increase in the basic income unit grant."

Steady State

A policy of slow growth which was undertaken in 1968 has spared Queen's from experiencing a shortfall which is a fact of life at many other institutions. Since that time "enrolment has been dead on target" Deutsch said.



There have been many shifts within that target from arts to the natural and life sciences while the slackness in engineering has been offset by an increased interest in business.

The implication of the steady state policy are serious.

As a result of the expansion of the 1960's, many new professors joined the staff at Queen's. Retirements and resignations will not result in a substantial number of vacancies in the coming years, so there will be limited opportunity to bring new faculty members in at the lower levels. The rise in the average age of the faculty will bring a subsequent demand for increased compensation. This will be costly but policies have been formed to wrest with this problem. New staff are being hired on a term basis without the prospect of tenure and it is hoped that "more flexibility will be gained by developing the leave policy".

However, R. W. Mackenzie, president of the faculty Association expressed concern that such adjustments might "make career prospects uncertain." "Cutbacks should not fall unfairly on faculty", he commented.

Deutsch complained that the department of colleges and universities has given Ontario universities "few guidelines for the future." Temporary financial arrangements have been made for graduate students this year but without a long-range policy, universities "will find it hard to attract high quality graduate students," Deutsch said.

Gosh, it's nice to sit and relax in spite of the approaching doom of exams and essay deadlines.

York deficit not so bad

CUP — York University senate has apparently taken the fire out of the demand that 160 faculty members be fired, with the revelation Wednesday Nov. 8 that the university is only $700,005 in debt, not $4.1 million as originally reported by president David Slater in early October. The revision came after a freeze in faculty and library budgets.

After a two-week investigation the senate committee on alternatives revealed the new figures in an attempt to fight an order from York's board of governors that the 160 faculty members be released.

One senator moved that no faculty be released on budgetary grounds this year. The motion was referred to the senate's next meeting.

Slater said, "My opinion, based on a legal opinion we have received, is that we could not terminate probationary or tenured faculty this year. I feel sufficiently firm on this that I think such terminations not be open options for us. My recommendation to the board will be based on this position.

The senate committee was established two weeks ago to propose alternatives to the Board's order to cut faculty. It received a mandate to continue its blitz appraisal of York's position and will report again Nov. 22.

The York University Faculty Association (YUFA) executive pulled out of the senate committee. YUFA plans to take an observor role. The committee, composed mainly of deans, administrators and some faculty members, successfully dodged a motion that it be disbanded.

An Atkinson College professor charged that "unnecessary panic has caused considerable anxiety, apprehension and consequent erosion of morale among faculty and staff."

The senate committee's report continued the confrontation which began last month when the board of governors ordered the faculty dismissals. Faculty reaction was hostile. Many accused the administration of releasing inadequate and confusing financial information.

Rector candidates

emphatic on the position of Rector representing students' views to the Board of Trustees. "The Rector is the only person who can project a student voice to them", he claimed.

Crickmore pointed out that as only one of thirty-five members of the Board, the Rector really doesn't have much voting power, but that only the Rector, the Principal and a few others can bring genuine student complaints to the Board, the majority of whom are removed from campus.

He pointed out that the Board of Trustees of the university will become more and more important as financial issues become increasingly important. In this vein he stressed that the rector must also become stronger and stronger.

Broadbent asked the candidates whether it was the role of Rector to act as intermediary in all problems brought before them or whether it would be preferable for the Rector to possibly refer the person to others who are knowledgeable in the problem area.

Kemsley pointed out that the Rector cannot take on every problem but that the person filling the position must do everything they can to help the individual.

Gannage suggested that the Rector must have as much of an overview as possible but that he must seriously consider whether he can take a particular problem on himself, or act in an advisory capacity. He stressed that the advisory position is important.

Copeland stated that the Rector should act as an advisor, but also stated that if this "backfires", he should take it upon himself to make sure that he gets the answers.

Salsbury took major issue on the Rector's role in integrating West Campus with Main Campus. He pointed out that the West Campus residences have no student power organ and that he will work with them to ensure their representation until some form of student government is set up. "This is the only area where I would be political", he said and added that he would usurp power to bring it about.

Gannage pointed out that the West Campus residences are missing out on the services being made available, but that it would be a mistake to take too deep an interest in it. "Their government is up to them. They know the situation better", he said.

However, Gannage pointed out that the Rector should help West Campus to come out of isolation and that he recognized it to be very much a part of Queen's. "It would be an error if we didn't make an attempt to bring them back into the fold", he said.

Kemsley stressed that the Rector during this time of university growth must help to maintain our unique traditions, "We don't want to sacrifice the atmosphere at Queen's", she said.

She also claimed that the Rector may be important in their activity as a checking body on the AMS. According to Kemsley, every governing body needs an opposition to point out the "other side of the coin" and that the person performing this function must be a "no bullshit person"

Salsbury showed great concern for definition of powers on campus, pointing out that the Departmental Student Councils and the Faculty Boards are deadlocked because their areas of jurisdiction are poorly defined.

Broadbent pointed out that it is possible for the Rector to usurp the power of the AMS in his ability to talk to the senior administrative offices of the University. He stated that the Rector could take things that the AMS is essentially concerned with and argue it out before the AMS has a chance to look at it.

Salsbury stated that he would worry about this possibility because the Rector is elected for three years with no checks and balances on his position. He pointed out that there is "no guarantee that he will remain truly representative" Salsbury stated that the Rector, instead, should help the AMS and that he mustn't 'ramrod' anything through.

Gannage agreed that the Rector must not override the power of the AMS but must also check where the AMS is not doing its job. He suggested that the Rector, the President of the AMS and the Faculty Society must get together and see where they can get.

Copeland suggested that the Rector must be a political force at times, standing behind what is necessary and, giving directions to questions such as those, involving the University Centre.

Kraftco is cheesing people off

by Frank Okoh

"The government's farm policy if left to run its course will adversely effect every man, woman and child in Canada except those of us who happen to be psychiatrists," said Walter Miller, Vice-President of the NFU.

"Kraft means strength in German and Kraftco is indeed big and strong--28th largest multi-national corporation. We have no illusions. We need perserverance and solidarity in this struggle. We must stop this multi-national monstrosity from treating Canadians as imbeciles," commented Don Kossick, National Kraft Boycott co-ordinator.

"The struggle against Kraft should be seen in the context of the struggle for Canadian independence...Only a constant struggle can stop the drift towards fascism."

Strong words but they fitted the mood of the over one hundred people from Kingston and area who came to listen to the National Farmers Union case against Kraftco. They greeted such remarks with enthusiastic applause. If anyone in the audience had anything to do with Kraft he did not make a public confession. The speakers wished Kraftco were available to answer for themselves. Kraftco has consistently turned down any offers of a public debate. In fact, Kraftco refuses to acknowledge that there is a boycott against their products. "We wonder what their Moose Jaw manager thinks. Since the start of the boycott last year sales have dropped 40 per cent. Kraft has sent in someone to find out what is wrong," Kossick said.

Earlier in the lecture Miller gave a brief history of the NFU and described the situation farmers face. "We do not have collective bargaining. What we have is collective bagging." In Ontario, for instance, milk is marketed through the Ontario Milk Marketing Board. Farmers are represented here. But this representation does not amount to much because all the decisions of the Board are subject to ratification by the Ontario Milk Commission--a body of civil servants appointed by the government. It is as if the senate had to ratify all the decisions of the AMS. When government spokesmen say that farmers already have bargaining rights it is this farcical situation that they have in mind. The OMC decides what price farmers get for their products but have absolutely no control over prices Kraft and others charge for their finished product. Nothing could be better from the point of view of virtual monopolies like Kraft. It has the best of both worlds--it buys cheap and has the consumer at its mercy. To add the icing to the cake it gets generous grants called "forgivable loans."

The capitalist has always made profits at the expense of his workers and the public. In the good old days of laissez-faire capitalism profits were regarded as rewards for risk-taking. These days the public takes the risk and the multi-national corporation take the profits home. To rounds of applause, Walter asked rhetorically "can there be a better case for nationalisation than this?" "The NFU is not using the consumer as cannonfodder in its fight against Kraft," he said in answer to a question from the floor. "We are not asking you to support us. We are asking you to join us in the fight as allies. The Kraft business affects farmers more directly but there are other things which may affect you more directly and there you can count on our support." An overhaul of the OMC will result in lower prices for the consumer. As an enthusiastic member of the audience put it "The NFU is asking us to pay 94 cents for cheese instead of $1.12."

One got the impression that the hall was full of veteran Kraft boycotters. "I have been boycotting Kraft for ten years," boasted one man. "It is not hard to convince oneself that Kraft cheese tastes awful," said another speaking from experience. However, a friend of this reporter in conversation admitted to having eaten and enjoyed Kraft cheese sandwiches for a long time. "I guess I have to stop," he added almost ruefully.

At the end of the lecture, the Community support Group, organisers of the lecture passed the hat round to get funds for the fledgling "Kingston Kraft Boycott Committee." They netted in about $30 and another $12 from the sale of buttons and bumper stickers. It seems Kingston will be hearing more from the committee. Twenty-nine people who attended the lecture volunteered to work hard to spread the word. Kossick pointed out that boycotts were not won by merely wearing buttons. If Kraft is to become "schwach", the NFU and its allies in the cities have to work hard. To those who went to say goodbye to them after the lecture Miller and Kossick had one word of advice--STRUGGLE.

More on Kraft boycott

CUP- Campus action against Kraft food products continued to score successes last week with the decision of caterers at York University to respect the National Farmers Union boycott against the American owned monopoly.

Lyn Brooks, York manager for Versafoods Ltd., said student pressure caused him to eliminate most Kraft products from York cafeterias. Kraft could supply some 50 to 60 per cent of campus food needs, Brooks said, but this will now be cut back to 10 per cent.

Meanwhile, a member of the Laurentian University student council in Sudbury will ask the council to remove all Kraft products from its store at its next meeting. The store continues to sell a large number of Kraft products despite the NFU boycott.

At the University of Lethbridge, continued student pressure persuaded the administration to remove most Kraft products from its cafeterias.

Salsbury statement

Unfortunately Eric Salsbury's picture and part of his statement were left out of the rector candidates section of Tuesday's Journal. We apologize to him, and are running his complete statement and photo below.

I have my down days, there are things wrong with Queen's, but I am not a prophet of doom worked up about unimportant issues. Queen's is basically good.

This is the outlook I would take with me as Rector. I would concentrate on being a low key, efficient problem solver and leave the great issues to the student government. The rector should remain a non-political red tape cutter for all the students.

Small but real problems in changing courses or housing, para-legal problems, grievances and so on are best solved by quick, quiet action. Among all the student position, only the Rector can move quickly, because he is not hampered by things like hair-splitting committees. Also, there are some jams people get into that would make them shy to see the Padre. And worst of all is the idea of taking a grievance through formal channels and ending up before something called the "Ultimate Tribunal".

This does not mean I shun political awareness or formal channels. We need a more active student government. I would be available to try to help all levels of our government from DSC to AMS break out of their nearly universal deadlock. Action must be taken soon on things like more Canadian content in staff and courses, and closer student-professor-administration ties in the big-college era.

As a resident of the West Campus, I feel that we need someone with an important position on the main campus to air our growing discontent. There is no residence government and frustrations over bussing, cafeteria service, isolation and grad-undergrad disharmony are building up.

Another thing I would like to try is getting the back of the stadium chicken wired so that no more students get killed when they go to see a football game.

The above examples indicate that I believe in progmatic approach. The Rector seems powerful with his vote on the Senate and Board of Trustees, but his real power is much less. He cannot decide the course of big events and so he should be down to earth where he can have real impact. This is good, too, because the Rector is not nearly as accountable as the student government. Therefore by concentrating on non-issues, he would avoid abusing his power.

I would involve myself with an issue only by suggesting to the appropriate body that it get moving on the thing. Reasonable decisions of these bodies would be binding on me, and I would push for them in the Senate and Board of trustees, for example, I support the ideas of "Awareness '72" for making education less formalized, but I would not be preoccupied by them. That is the place of an active student government.

What I am offering is my time to foster the image of at least one place of human concern in this sometimes grey, cold place. To back up the image, my door would always be open and I would try to get results on a person-to-person basis.

Kemsley:

In Tuesday's section on the rector candidates we mispelled candidate Victoria Kemsley's name. We regret any inconvenience this may have caused her.

Gilbert turned off his television set one Sunday evening to discover that he was the only person in the world. It was not a startling discovery, but rather a satisfying one, for he had always suspected as much and this only served to confirm his suspicions.

"It's just as well", thought Gilbert, "I've always felt awkward in a crowd."

He turned on the tap and filled the kettle. "It's odd this, being the only person in the world", he thought. "Probably full of unforseen consequences". He paused and then with a shrug of heroic resignation sadly announced to the refrigerator, "there probably won't be any milk delivery tomorrow morning." He knew indeed that there would never be any more milk deliveries, ever. Nor would there be bread deliveries, Boy Scouts on Apple Day, the laundryman, door-to-door salesmen, Jehovah's Witnesses, people selling raffle-tickets, and mailmen.

"I wonder if I should go to work tomorrow", he pondered while scrounging around the kitchen shelves for the coffee jar. "After all, they were expecting me." It was true they had been expecting him to show up for work on Monday morning. They had been expecting him to show up every morning for the past ten years and he had yet to disappoint them. Perhaps the best thing to do was to carry on as if nothing had ever happened like the bush pilots who crash in the North woods but continue to shave and do pushups. "After all, if there was nobody at work tomorrow, checking up on me, then I won't have to work as hard." He smiled smugly. "And I can take an extra five minutes on my coffee break." Things could work out very comfortably indeed.

Measuring out the coffee and sugar for his mug, Gilbert considered what attitude he should adopt towards this new development. Courage was by all means essential and as he reflected upon the odd destiny to which fate had called him, he was swept away by the heroic magnificence of his plight.

"I'm the only person in the world", he announced to the puzzled reflection curiously scrutinizing him from the bathroom mirror; "perhaps even the universe."

The universe, it had only occured to him now. The universe: vast beyond vastness beyond dimension and an emptiness so magnificent that it tumbled soared and swirled on forever; cold imponderable galaxies that spun callously away into darkness, and a terrible frigid loneliness without solace or limit.

Gilbert shuddered; things were getting quite out of hand. If it were necessary to be the sole human being, then the world was quite sufficient. A man needed dirt to anchor his feet in and trees to talk to. (He had once talked to a parking meter for a quarter of an hour before realizing it wasn't a tree.)

"The universe," Gilbert thundered into his coffee cup, "a man could go mad just thinking about it".
